LOS ANGELES GAS & ELECTRIC CO. v. AMALGAMATED OIL CO. (L. A. 2,387.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 16, 1909.)

1. CONTRACTS (§ 335*)—ENTIRE CONTRACTS—ACTION FOR BREACH—PLEADING AND PROOF.

In an action for breach of an entire contract containing mutually dependent covenants, plaintiff must aver and prove that he has performed his covenants, or give a sufficient excuse for his nonperformance.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Contracts, Cent. Dig. §§ 1664–1676; Dec. Dig. § 335.*]

2. CONTRACTS (§ 171*) — CONSTRUCTION — ENTIRE OR SEVERABLE.

Whether a contract is entire or severable is a question of interpretation; the intent of the parties to be ascertained from the language employed and the subject-matter of the contract.

3. SALES (§ 62*)—CONSTRUCTION OF CONTRACT—WHEN SEVERABLE.

When the price of goods is expressly apportioned by the contract, or the apportionment may be implied by law to each item to be performed, the contract will generally be held to be severable.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Sales, Cent. Dig. § 175; Dec. Dig. § 62.*]

4. SALES (§ 62*)—CONSTRUCTION OF CONTRACT—WHEN ENTIRE.

A contract will be treated as entire even when the obligation of the one party consists of different acts to be separately paid for, where the nature and character of the agreement shows that it was intended to be entire.

5. SALES (§ 62*)—CONSTRUCTION OF CONTRACT—DEPENDENT COVENANTS.

An oil company agreed to sell and deliver to a gas company and the latter agreed to purchase and receive from the former, a sufficient quantity of crude oil to operate all plants operated by the gas company, except as otherwise then contracted for from other parties, during the term of the contract, on certain terms at a fixed price per barrel, payments to be made on the 15th of each month for all oil delivered during the preceding month. Held, that the covenants to sell and to receive were mutually dependent, and that the contract was entire.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Sales, Cent. Dig. §§ 171–175; Dec. Dig. § 62.*]

6. Sales (§ 62*)—Construction of Contract—Entire and Severable.

Held, also, that, though the contract was entire as to the mutually dependent covenants to buy and sell, it was severable as to the payments due for the oil actually received.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Sales, Cent. Dig. §§ 171–175; Dec. Dig. § 62.*]

7. Sales (§ 62*)—Construction of Contract—Entire or Severable—Effect of Terms of Contract.

The construction of the contract as entire would not be affected by the fact that no fixed quantity of oil was contracted for, as the oil company had the right to insist that all the oil needed would be taken by the gas company.

8. Sales (§ 98*)—Rescission of Contract—Mutually Dependent Covenants.

Under a contract containing mutually dependent covenants to buy all the oil needed in running a gas plant, and to furnish all such oil needed, a failure to demand all the oil needed to run the plant justified a rescission of the contract by the seller.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Sales, Cent. Dig. § 263; Dec. Dig. § 98.*]

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Curtis D. Wilbur, Judge.

Action by the Los Angeles Gas & Electric Company against the Amalgamated Oil Company. From a judgment of nonsuit, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Herbert J. Goudge, Wm. A. Cheney, Thomas E. Gibbons, and J. Frank Thomas, for appellant. Ward Chapman, Warren E. Lloyd, and O'Melveny, Stevens & Milliken, for respondent.

SLOSS, J. Action to recover damages for an alleged breach of contract. At the trial the defendant's motion for nonsuit was granted and a judgment of dismissal entered. From this judgment plaintiff appeals.

The contract involved was in writing, and was executed by the Associated Oil Company, as party of the first part, and the Los Angeles Gas & Electric Company, the plaintiff herein, as party of the second part. The defendant Amalgamated Oil Company succeeded to all the rights and obligations of the Associated Oil Company under the contract, and may, for the purposes of this discussion, be considered as having in the first instance entered into said contract with plaintiff. In the interest of brevity, we shall herein designate the plaintiff as the "gas company" and the defendant as the "oil company."

By the terms of the contract, which is dated the 1st day of February, 1905, the oil company agrees to sell and deliver to the gas company, and the latter agrees to purchase and receive from the former, a sufficient quantity of crude oil to operate all plants now or hereafter to be operated by the gas company in its business of manufacturing gas and electricity in the city of Los Angeles over and above the amounts heretofore contracted for to be delivered to the gas company by others than the oil company during the term of the contract. The term of the agreement is declared to be from February 1, 1905, to December 31, 1910, inclusive. In addition to various provisions regarding the character of oil to be furnished, the manner of delivery, and deductions for impurities, the contract provides that the gas company shall give three days' notice of its requirements, and fixes the purchase price at 45 cents per barrel, payments to be made on the 15th day of each month for all oil delivered during the preceding calendar month.

The complaint alleges that, after making various deliveries during the years 1905 and 1906, the defendant on December 31, 1906, notified the plaintiff that it no longer considered itself bound by the contract. On several occasions during January and February, 1907, the gas company, plaintiff, requested and demanded of the defendant oil company that it furnish and deliver to plaintiff a quantity of crude oil aggregating 24,700 barrels. Of this amount 11,616 barrels was the quantity of oil sufficient (over and above the oil otherwise contracted for as provided in the aforesaid contract) to operate plaintiff's plants. The plaintiff, it is alleged, has duly performed all the obligations imposed on it under the contract; but defendant has refused to deliver any of the oil demanded during said months of January and February, 1907. The lowest market value of oil of the quality described in the contract since the 1st day of January, 1907, was 75 cents per barrel. The prayer of the complaint is for $3,484.80, being the difference between the contract price and the market value of the 11,616 barrels, which, as plaintiff claims, the defendant should have delivered.

Of the answer it will be sufficient to say that it denies that "plaintiff has duly, or at all, performed all, or any, of the obligations imposed on it under the said contract."

At the trial there was no dispute about the terms of the contract, the refusal to deliver on demand as alleged, or the market value of oil at and after the refusal. The gas company did not, however, make any attempt to show that it had during the period prior to January, 1907, demanded or received from the oil company a quantity of oil (over and above amounts otherwise contracted for) sufficient to operate its plants. The motion for a nonsuit was based on the failure to produce evidence on this point, and, stating the same proposition in more general terms, that plaintiff had failed to prove its allegation that it had duly performed all the obligations imposed on it under said contract.

By the agreement the gas company agreed to take of the oil company, and pay for, all the oil required by it over and above specified exceptions. The oil company agreed to deliver, as called for, all such oil at a given price. If the contract is to be construed as entire with respect to these covenants—in other words, if such covenants were mutually dependent—the court below was clearly right in holding that plaintiff could not recover for a failure to deliver without alleging and showing either performance, or a sufficient excuse for the nonperformance, of its obligation to take of defendant all oil required to operate its gas and electric plants. Daley v. Russ, 86 Cal. 115, 24 Pac. 867; Easton v. Montgomery, 90 Cal. 307, 318, 27 Pac. 280, 25 Am. St. Rep. 123; Marchant v. Hayes, 117 Cal. 670, 49 Pac. 840.

The appellant's contention is that the contract was severable into as many distinct agreements of sale as there were months in the term during which deliveries were to be made. We do not regard this position as tenable. Whether a contract is entire or severable is a question of interpretation. The intent of the parties is to be ascertained from a consideration of the language employed and the subject-matter of the contract. 2 Parsons' Contracts (9th Ed.) 672; Sterling v. Gregory, 149 Cal. 120, 85 Pac. 305. It is, no doubt, well settled, as has been repeatedly declared by this court, that "when the price is expressly apportioned by the contract, or the apportionment may be implied by law, to each item to be performed, the contract will generally be held to be severable." More v. Bonnet, 40 Cal. 251, 6 Am. Rep. 621; Herzog v. Purdy, 119 Cal. 99, 51 Pac. 27; Sterling v. Gregory, supra. But this rule is not universal. It is subject to the limitation that a contract will be treated as entire, even when the obligations of the one party consist of different acts to be separately paid for, where the nature and character of the agreement show that it was intended to be entire. Thus, in Norris v. Harris, 15 Cal. 227, Field, C. J., said: "But a contract, made at the same time for different articles at different prices is not an entire contract, unless the taking of the whole is essential from the character of the property, or is made so by the agreement of the parties. * * *" Similarly, in Wooten v. Walters, 110 N. C. 251, 14 S. E. 734, 736, cited by this court in Sterling v. Gregory, supra, the "more reasonable rule" is said to be that, "where there is a purchase of different articles at different prices at the same time, the contract would be severable as to each article, unless the taking of the whole was rendered essential either by the nature of the subject-matter or by the act of the parties."

In the case of the contract before us, we have no doubt that the subject-matter and the stipulations of the parties were such as to make the taking of the oil contracted for essential to the right to demand further deliveries. The seller undertakes to hold itself in readiness to meet all the requirements of the buyer and to fill these requirements at a given price. In return it has the privilege of supplying at that price all oil that the buyer may require for its plant. These provisions—the obligation to furnish and the obligation to take all oil needed—are necessarily reciprocal. Each goes to the essence of the agreement. It is not to be supposed that the oil company would have been willing to bind itself to furnish oil for a term of years at 45 cents a barrel, regardless of the actual state of the market, unless it had been assured a continuous outlet for a large quantity at that figure. And, on the other hand, the gas company was, as must be assumed, undertaking to buy oil of the oil company at a fixed price in view of the fact that it was by the agreement securing a steady supply which would be sufficient for all its needs. To hold such a contract severable would open the way to great hardship and injustice. Either party could refuse compliance with the agreement when it desired, and still hold the other when conditions made such course advantageous. The one in default would, to be sure, be liable in damages for its breaches of the several contracts, but such liability would be far from an adequate protection to the other party. Let us suppose, for example, that for a period of two years after the making of the contract the market value of oil should be less than the contract price, and that during that time the gas company should find it to its interest to fill its requirements by purchasing of others than the defendant. In such event, the oil company would, under appellant's contention, be bound to continue to hold itself in readiness, during the entire term of the contract, to furnish oil if called for, and to seek its only relief for past breaches by actions for damages. While it could not know whether its future output would or would not be taken by the gas company, it could not safely enter into any contract to dispose of that output to others. Such construction of the contract would produce great confusion and uncertainty and would, to a great extent, deprive the parties of the substantial benefit of the respective covenants to take and to furnish all oil required.

The fact that the gas company does not agree to take any specified quantity of oil is of no consequence. It agrees to take all that may be needed in the operation of its plants. The exact quantity is subject to fluctuation with the conditions of its business, but the seller does not thereby forfeit the right to insist on furnishing all that shall be actually required. The agreement does not, in respect to the point under discussion, differ from one for the purchase and sale of a fixed quantity to be delivered and paid for in installments. While there is some conflict among the decided cases, the great weight of authority, at least in the United States, supports the proposition that such agreements are entire, and that a refusal without sufficient cause by the seller to furnish, or by the buyer to take or pay for, any installment, justifies a repudiation of the contract by the party not in default. 2 Mechem on Sales, §§ 1144–1148. The rule has been applied alike to contracts for the sale of fixed quantities and to those calling for the delivery of amounts to be fixed by the requirements of the buyer's plant or business. Norrington v. Wright, 115 U. S. 188, 6 Sup. Ct. 12, 29 L. Ed. 366; Williams Cooperage Co. v. Scofield, 115 Fed. 119, 53 C. C. A. 23; Loudenback Fertilizer Co. v. Tennessee Phosphate Co., 121 Fed. 298, 58 C. C. A. 220, 61 L. R. A. 402; Kokomo Strawboard Co. v. Inman, 134 N. Y. 92, 31 N. E. 248; George H. Hess Co. v. Dawson, 149 Ill. 138, 36 N. E. 557; King Phillip Mills v. Slater, 12 R. I. 82, 34 Am. Rep. 603; Providence Coal Co. v. Coxe, 19 R. I. 380, 35 Atl. 210; Fullam v. Wright, etc., Co., 196 Mass. 474, 82 N. E. 711; Pacific Lumber Co. v. Iowa W. & P. Co., 35 Iowa, 308, 112 N. W. 771; Ross Meehan F. Co. v. Royer Wheel Co., 113 Tenn. 370, 83 S. W. 167, 68 L. R. A. 829. The same conclusion has been reached by this court in two cases. In Twomey v. People's Ice Co., 66 Cal. 233, 5 Pac. 158, the defendant agreed to furnish ice to plaintiffs for one year at the rate of $5 a ton; the vendor agreeing to sell ice to plaintiffs alone, and the plaintiffs agreeing to take ice from the defendant alone during the term of the contract. The plaintiffs having broken the contract by purchasing ice from third parties, it was held that this breach released defendant from any further performance. To the same effect, substantially, is Dunn v. Daley, 78 Cal. 640, 21 Pac. 377.

The holding that the contract is entire with respect to the covenants we have been discussing is in no wise inconsistent with the view that it is apportionable with respect to payments for oil actually delivered. 2 Parsons' Contracts (9th Ed.) 673, note. An action could be maintained for the price of any delivery as soon as it became due. This is the holding, and the extent of the holding, in Veerkamp v. Hulburd, etc., Co., 58 Cal. 229, 41 Am. Rep. 265. But, as we have said, the contract may be entire with regard to the obligations to buy and sell the whole amount contracted for, notwithstanding the fact that payment for installments actually delivered may be enforced separately. Dunn v. Daley, supra; Barrie v. Earle, 143 Mass. 1, 8 N. E. 639, 58 Am. Rep. 126; Milske v. Mantel Co., 103 Md. 235, 63 Atl. 471, 5 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1105, 115 Am. St. Rep. 354.

For these reasons it must be held that the motion for nonsuit was rightly granted.

The judgment is affirmed.

In re HANCOCK'S ESTATE. (L. A. 2,425.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 17, 1909.)

1. Divorce (§ 326*) — Presumption as to Judgment of Court of Record.

The judgment of a court of record of another state in a divorce case is entitled to the presumption that it was authorized by law, provided jurisdiction of the subject-matter may be assumed.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Divorce, Cent. Dig. § 827; Dec. Dig. § 326.*]

2. Judgment (§ 818*)—Foreign Judgment of Court of Record—Conclusiveness.

A judgment of a court of record of another state differs in its conclusive effect from a judgment of a court of record of this state, in that it is always open to one against whom it it attempted to be used to show, by evidence other than its record, and even opposed to its recitals, that the court was without jurisdiction either of the cause or parties.

3. Judgment (§ 822*)—Foreign Judgment of Court of Record—Collateral Attack.

If lack of jurisdiction, either of the cause or parties, is not made to appear, a judgment of a court of record of another state is as final and conclusive on collateral attack as would be a judgment of one of the superior courts of this state; but, if it is made to appear, the judgment must be regarded as a nullity.

4. Judgment (§ 818*)—Foreign Judgment—Service by Publication—Insufficiency of Affidavit.

An affidavit for publication, stating merely affiant's belief that plaintiff has a cause of action, does not comply with a Colorado statute requiring that such fact shall appear thereby, and so service based thereon was ineffectual for any purpose, and the court never acquired jurisdiction as to the nonresident defendant, and the judgment is subject to collateral attack in this state.

5. Evidence (§ 80*) — Presumptions — Laws of Other State.

In absence of contrary evidence, the laws of another state are presumed to be the same as the laws of the forum.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. § 101; Dec. Dig. § 80.*]

6. Judgment (§ 489*)—Prematurity as Defect Going to Jurisdiction.

If a premature judgment is given after the court has acquired jurisdiction by a valid service, the defect does not go to the jurisdiction so as to render the judgment open to collateral attack.

7. HOMESTEAD (§ 150*)—CONCLUSIVENESS OF ORDER SETTING APART HOMESTEAD.

An order not appealed from, setting apart a homestead for use of a decedent's family, made on an application as to which there was no adverse appearance or contest, or controversy as to the question of widowhood, is conclusive as to the property so set apart, but not as a judicial determination of widowhood binding in all future proceedings in the estate.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; James C. Rives, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of Milton Taylor Hancock. Proceeding to determine the heirship to the deceased. From the decree and an order denying a new trial, Mollie Hancock McNatt and another appeal. Reversed.

Powers & Holland, for appellants. Tom C. Thornton, for respondents.

ANGELLOTTI, J. This is an appeal from a judgment and an order denying a new trial in a proceeding instituted under the provisions of section 1664, Code Civ. Proc., in the matter of the estate of Milton Taylor Hancock, deceased, to determine the "heirship to said deceased." By the decree it was determined that the heirs at law of deceased are his surviving wife and three minor children of said deceased and said surviving wife, all born prior to the year 1902, and Mollie Hancock McNatt and John Philip Hancock, children of said deceased and Nancy Hancock, a former wife of deceased. This appeal is taken by the last two named heirs; their claim being that the deceased and the surviving wife were never husband and wife.

The deceased and Nancy Hiers Hancock were married in the state of Georgia in December, 1877. The issue of this marriage consisted of four children, the appellants, and two children who died in infancy. The husband and wife resided together in the state of Georgia for several years next succeeding the marriage. Mrs. Hancock resided in that state until the time of her death, June 18, 1902. The deceased left that state some time in the eighties. On June 22, 1886, deceased instituted an action for divorce from his wife in the county court of Bent county, state of Colorado, and this action resulted in a decree made by said court on August 19, 1886, purporting to dissolve the marriage. On August 31, 1886, deceased and the respondent surviving wife obtained a license to intermarry, and under this license their marriage was thereupon solemnized by a clergyman in Prescott, state of Arkansas. They lived together as husband and wife at various places of residence from that time until deceased died. His death occurred on July 20, 1905, at which time he was residing in the county of Los Angeles, in this state, with his surviving wife and their three children.

Appellants' claim is that the Colorado divorce decree was void and ineffectual for any purpose, with the result that Nancy Hiers Hancock continued to be the wife of deceased to the time of her death in the year 1902. It is not claimed by counsel for appellants that this condition in any way affected the legitimacy of the children of deceased and the second wife (see section 84, Civ. Code), but simply that it excludes the alleged surviving wife from participating in the estate of deceased. The trial court found that the deceased and his wife "were divorced" by said decree of the Colorado county court. The findings do not show the date of death of the first wife or that she died before deceased. In the present condition of the record, we deem the finding that the deceased and Nancy Hancock were divorced by the Colorado decree essential to the judgment, and if it be not sustained by the evidence, as is claimed by appellants, the judgment must be reversed.

The county court of Bent county, Colo., was, under the express terms of the Constitution of Colorado, a court of record, and any judgment given by it is entitled to the benefit of the presumption that it was authorized by law (see 2 Freeman on Judg. § 565), provided, however, it may be assumed, the jurisdiction of the court in matters of divorce is shown (1 Nelson on Marriage & Divorce, § 19). A judgment of a court of record of another state differs in its conclusive effect from a judgment of a court of record of this state in one material respect, viz., that it is always open to the person against whom the judgment is attempted to be used to show by evidence other than the record of the judgment, and even by evidence opposed to recitals contained in such record, that the court purporting to give the judgment was without jurisdiction either of the cause or of the parties. If such lack of jurisdiction in one or the other of these respects is not made to appear, the judgment is as final and conclusive on collateral attack as would be a judgment of one of our own superior courts; but, if such lack of jurisdiction is made to appear, the judgment must be regarded as a nullity. See 2 Freeman on Judg. § 563; Thompson v. Whitman, 18 Wall. 457, 21 L. Ed. 897; In re James, 99 Cal. 377, 33 Pac. 1122, 37 Am. St. Rep. 60; Greenzweig v. Strelinger, 103 Cal. 278, 37 Pac. 398; Code Civ. Proc. § 1916. It was said in the James Case, cited above: "We agree with appellant that it is competent to collaterally impeach the record of a judgment rendered in another state by extrinsic evidence showing that the facts necessary to give the court pronouncing it jurisdiction to proceed did not exist; and this is true although the record sought to be impeached may recite the existence of such jurisdictional facts."

The question before us, then, is whether or not it was affirmatively made to appear that the Colorado court was without jurisdiction of the cause or the parties.

By the laws of the state of Colorado, the county courts were given jurisdiction concurrent with that of the district courts, in certain classes of actions for divorce, and we shall assume for the purposes of this decision that the record of the divorce action instituted by deceased against his first wife showed that the action was one which, under the terms of the statute, was within the jurisdiction of a county court. We shall further assume for the purposes of this decision that the trial court was sufficiently warranted in concluding, in accord with the allegation in the divorce complaint and the finding of the Colorado court, that deceased was a resident of the state of Colorado at the time of the commencement of his action and had been such a resident for one year prior to that time as required by the laws of that state, though it must be conceded that the evidence introduced in the superior court on the trial of this contest (see In re James, 99 Cal. 377, 33 Pac. 1122, 37 Am. St. Rep. 60) indicates very strongly that deceased was never a resident of that state.

Assuming all this, we are nevertheless unable to see how, in view of the evidence introduced on this trial, it can be held that the Colorado court ever obtained jurisdiction as to the defendant in the divorce action.

An exemplified record of the divorce proceedings was introduced in evidence by the appellants, with the express consent of respondents, duly certified to be "a true, perfect, and complete copy of all records, papers, and files in said cause." It appears therefrom that the complaint was unverified, and that the judgment rests entirely upon an attempted constructive service by publication of summons. The statute of Colorado authorized service of summons by publication "when the person on whom the service is to be made resides out of the state, or has departed from the state, or cannot, after due diligence, be found within the state or conceals himself to avoid the service of summons, and the fact shall appear by affidavit filed in the office of the clerk of the court in which the action is pending, and it shall in like manner appear that a cause of action exists against the defendant in respect to whom the service is to be made, or that he is a necessary or proper party to the action."[1] (The italics are ours.) It will be observed that this statute is practically the same as ours, except that the filed affidavit is required by the Colorado law to show the essential facts, while our statute allows the verified complaint on file to show the existence of a cause of action. The evidence shows that the only affidavit for publication was one filed at the time of filing the complaint, and which was as follows: "State of Colorado, County of Bent. In County Court. Milton T. Hancock v. Nancy Hancock. John W. Jay, being duly sworn on oath says that as he is informed and verily believes the plaintiff on the above-entitled cause has good cause of action and that the defendant is a nonresident of the state of Colorado and that her last known place of residence was Boston, Georgia, and that he makes this affidavit for the reason that the plaintiff is absent from the county at the present time. John W. Jay, Atty. for Plaintiff. Subscribed and sworn to before me this 22d day of June, A. D. 1886. Joseph Bradford, Judge."

An order that service be made by publication of summons was made on the same day, and the affidavit of publication shows publication of a summons not purporting to be signed by the clerk of the court or under seal of the court, as was required by the Colorado law, but only signed by plaintiff's attorney, and not complying with the requirements of the Colorado law in its statement of the time within which the defendant must appear, in the Los Animas Leader, a weekly newspaper, on June 25, July 2, 9, and 16, 1886. On August 17, 1886, the defendant's default for not answering was entered, and on August 19, 1886, judgment of divorce, based on said default, was entered.

There can be no doubt under our decisions that the affidavit for publication hereinbefore set forth, which upon the record before us must be taken as being the only affidavit presented in support of the order of publication, was insufficient to give the county court of Bent county, Colo., jurisdiction to order service on the nonresident defendant by publication, and it does not appear that the Colorado Supreme Court has been less mindful than this court of the necessity of requiring compliance with every material requirement of the statute of Colorado relative to such service. In O'Rear v. Lazarus, 8 Colo. 608, 9 Pac. 621, that court, speaking of an attempted constructive service by publication, said: "This method of obtaining service is in derogation of the common law; consequently the proposition is universally recognized that every material requirement of the statute in relation thereto must be strictly complied with." Speaking of our own law as to publication of summons, this court said, in Ricketson v. Richardson, 23 Cal. 152: "Those sections are in derogation of the common law, and must be strictly pursued in order to give the court jurisdiction over the person of defendant. A failure to comply with the rule thus prescribed in any particular is fatal where it is not cured by an appearance." It is established by our decisions that it must be made to appear by the affidavit for publication or by the verified complaint on file that a cause of action exists in favor of the plaintiff, and that if this is not so made to appear the court is without jurisdiction to make any order for publication, and any order made under such circumstances is ineffectual for any purpose, and any attempted service made thereunder is insufficient to give the court jurisdiction over the person of the defendant. As we have seen, the Colorado statute required this to be shown exclusively by the affidavit filed with the clerk of the court. It is further established that a statement such as that the plaintiff "has good cause of action" is not sufficient. Such a statement is nothing more than the mere opinion of the party as to the effect of the facts upon which he relies as constituting a cause of action. As said in Forbes v. Hyde, 31 Cal. 353: "It is merely the statement of the opinion of the witness in relation to a point upon which the judge is required to form his own opinion upon facts which must appear by affidavit. * * * Facts are the proper and only proper subjects to be set out in affidavits under the provisions of the statute to serve as the basis of judicial action. The affiant's general expression of opinion or belief, without the facts upon which it is founded, is in no sense legal evidence, and does not tend in any degree to prove the jurisdictional facts without which the judge had no authority to make the order." Upon the propositions we have stated, the following cases are in point: Ricketson v. Richardson, 26 Cal. 149; Braly v. Seaman, 30 Cal. 610; Forbes v. Hyde, 31 Cal. 342; County of Yolo v. Knight, 70 Cal. 431, 11 Pac. 662; Columbia, etc., Co. v. Warner, etc., Co., 138 Cal. 445, 71 Pac. 498. In some of these cases the attack on the judgment was direct, being made on appeal from the judgment, but in all the defect was recognized as jurisdictional. In two, Braly v. Seaman and Forbes v. Hyde, the attack was collateral. In Ricketson v. Richardson, Forbes v. Hyde, and County of Yolo v. Knight, it is expressly held that an affidavit which merely repeats the language or substance of the statute as to the existence of a cause of action is not sufficient, and in Columbia, etc., Co. v. Warner, etc., Co., the rule as to the essentials in the matter of a showing of a cause of action is clearly set forth.

[1] Code Civ. Proc. § 44.

Ae we have seen, all that the affiant in this case said in this regard was that, as he was informed and verily believes, the plaintiff "has good cause of action," and upon this statement of opinion and without the sworn testimony of any one, in complaint or elsewhere, as to a single fact essential to a cause of action, the order for publication was made. We do not believe that a decision can anywhere be found sustaining a judgment against a nonresident defendant based upon such a constructive service by publication, where the defect in the showing for publication was legally made to appear. Were we dealing with the judgment of a court of record of this state, such a defect could be legally made to appear, of course, only on the face of the record, the judgment roll, as is fully shown by such cases as Hahn v. Kelly, 34 Cal. 391, 94 Am. Dec. 742, People v. Davis, 143 Cal. 673, 77 Pac. 651, and Estate of McNeil, 100 Pac. 1086, and as shown in such cases recital in such a judgment of due service is sometimes effectual as against an affidavit contained in the judgment roll showing an ineffectual attempt at service; the presumption consistently obtaining in favor of the recital in the judgment that other showing of proper service had been made to the court. It is also true that, were this a judgment of a court of this state, it could not be held by us to be void on its face because of the insufficiency of the affidavit for publication, for the reason that at the time it was rendered the affidavit for publication constituted no part of the judgment roll (see Estate of McNeil, supra), and in the absence of evidence to the contrary, this was presumably the law of Colorado at that time. We are not dealing, however, with a judgment of one of our own courts, but with a judgment of a court of another state, and this, as we have seen, makes a material difference. It was open to any party assailing the judgment collaterally to show by evidence aliunde the record of the judgment, and even in direct contradiction of recitals therein contained, facts establishing the want of jurisdiction of the court rendering it. Whether the affidavit for publication was a part of the Colorado judgment roll or not, the evidence received without objection and by express consent of respondents established that the only affidavit for publication filed in the cause was the one that we have discussed. The record so received was certified to be "a true, perfect, and complete copy of all records, papers, and files in said cause heretofore tried," etc. We are forced to conclude that the service of summons by publication based on this affidavit was ineffectual for any purpose, and that the Colorado court never acquired jurisdiction as to the defendant. It follows that the finding of the trial court in this proceeding to the effect that the parties were divorced by the Colorado decree was not sustained by the evidence.

Other points are made by appellant against the validity of this decree. The summons published did not comply with the Colorado law in some very material respects, but it is not necessary to determine whether the defects were such as to render the judgment void on collateral attack. The judgment was prematurely given; but it was given after the court would have acquired jurisdiction had the service been valid, and the defect in this respect was consequently one that does not go to the jurisdiction. In view of our conclusion as to the insufficiency of the affidavit, it is unnecessary to determine definitely as to any of the other points made against the judgment.

The record on this appeal does not show that the question who is the surviving wife of deceased was adjudicated by the superior court in granting letters of administration in this estate, and the question as to the effect of such an adjudication in subsequent proceedings in the matter of the estate is therefore not presented. It is shown that the alleged surviving wife was appointed administratrix, but it nowhere appears that she based her claim to letters on the ground that she was the surviving wife, or that any such issue was ever tendered or presented to the court for determination. It is admitted by the pleadings that she subsequently presented her petition for the setting apart of a homestead for the use of herself, as surviving wife, and her children, and that the probate court granted such application and set apart certain real property as a homestead for the use of the family of the deceased; but it does not appear that there was any adverse appearance or contest on this application, or that the question of widowhood was ever controverted. The conclusive effect of this order, which was not appealed from, may be conceded as to the property so set apart; but we do not see how it can be held to operate, if the question of widowhood was never controverted, as a judicial determination as to widowhood binding in all future proceedings in the estate. See Est. of Harrington, 147 Cal. 124, 81 Pac. 546, 109 Am. St. Rep. 118; Est. of Nolan, 145 Cal. 559, 79 Pac. 428; Howell v. Budd, 91 Cal. 342, 27 Pac. 747.

It has been assumed by respective counsel that appellants, the surviving children of the first wife, are entitled to assail collaterally the Colorado decree of divorce after the death of both of the parties thereto, notwithstanding that the validity of the second marriage was never questioned by either of the parties thereto or by the first wife, and that the first wife died prior to the death of deceased, and we have here accepted that assumption as well founded, as, indeed, it may be. As that question has not been discussed, and as there may be some doubt of the right of appellants under the circumstances stated to now assert the invalidity of the second marriage, we deem it proper to declare that this opinion shall not be taken as establishing the law of the case thereon. As we have seen, this question is not squarely presented by the findings, as it does not appear therefrom that the first wife died prior to the death of deceased.

The judgment and order appealed from are reversed.

We concur: SHAW, J.; SLOSS, J.

LARSEN v. BLOEMER et al. (S. F. 5,012.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 15, 1909.)

1. Master and Servant (§ 108*)—Master's Duty—Machinery—Safety Appliances.

That an accident to a laundry worker's hand, by catching it in a mangle roller, occurred at a part of the mangle which could not be protected would not excuse the employer from fitting the machine with the usual appliances for minimizing the injury, such as a proper lever for quickly stopping the mangle.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. § 203; Dec. Dig. § 108.*]

2. Master and Servant (§ 127*)—Injury to Servant—Machinery—Repair.

Even if a mangle, in which a laundry employé caught her hand, could not have been guarded at that point, the employer was negligent where he permitted the lever controlling the mangle to get out of repair so as to prevent stopping the machine sooner to avoid serious injury.

3. Master and Servant (§ 264*)—Injuries to Servant—Actions—Issues.

In an action for injury to a laundry worker, by catching her hand between the mangle rollers, allegations in the complaint that at the time of the accident plaintiff was a minor, inexperienced in working about a mangle, and had not been instructed that it was unsafe and defective, as stated, and that while working, she being uninstructed, her fingers were caught between the rollers and injured, raised the issues of plaintiff's minority and lack of instructions as to the danger of her employment.

F. A. Cutler and F. R. Sweasey, for appellant. H. L. Ford and T. Crowley, for respondent.

MELVIN, J. Plaintiff, by her guardian ad litem, sued to recover damages for injuries to her hand and wrist, received while she was working at a machine known as a "mangle." The case was tried before a jury. A motion for nonsuit was granted in favor of May E. Bloemer, but judgment was given in favor of plaintiff against John H. Bloemer for $2,250. From this judgment he appeals.

There were two causes of action pleaded. In the first it was alleged that at the time of the accident Bertha Larsen was a minor, inexperienced in working about a mangle, and that she had never been instructed in the dangers or hazards of employment on or near said machine; that "the said mangle of the said defendant upon which the plaintiff was put to work was unsafe, defective, unsuitable, and dangerous for such use, for the reason that the said mangle when once set in motion could not readily be stopped, there being no lever near the hand of the operator for that purpose; that the said lever had become broken or out of repair, so that the mechanism for starting the mangle had to be put on by the operator stooping down and with great force pushing or pulling it in place, and then, in order to keep it in place, was obliged to securely tie the same with a rope or string, and, in order to stop the said mangle while in motion or in operation, was obliged to untie the said rope or string, and with great force release the machinery and thereby stop the running of the mangle, which defective, unsafe, and dangerous condition of said mangle and the apparatus and machinery thereof was unknown to the plaintiff, and was well known to the said defendants"; that while working at said mangle, in the course of her occupation, and without fault on her part, she being inexperienced and uninstructed in the dangers of said machine, her fingers were caught between the heavy rollers used for the ironing of clothes, and, owing to the condition of the mangle, the operators thereon were unable to stop the machinery until the plaintiff's hand was so badly injured that amputation was made necessary. The second cause of action is based upon allegations to the effect that defendants provided Bertha Larsen an unsafe and dangerous place in which to work: that while busy at said mangle, and while attempting to smooth the cloth on the rollers thereof, and without fault on her part, "her fingers were caught between the rollers of the said mangle as aforesaid, which said mangle, by the carelessness and negligence of the said defendants as aforesaid, could not be readily stopped, and by the reason of the facts of the dangerous, defective, and unsafe condition of the said machinery and appliances of the said mangle the operators thereon were unable to stop the running of the said mangle until the same had crushed, cooked, and burned the right hand of the said plaintiff, Bertha Larsen, and crushed the bones and flesh thereof, and greatly bruised and wounded the said plaintiff, Bertha Larsen."

According to appellant, as there is no allegation that the mangle was inherently dangerous, or that its use or danger were unknown to Bertha Larsen, she must have been guilty of contributory negligence in getting her fingers caught at all, and "plaintiff seeks to recover for that portion of the injury occasioned to her hand by the alleged negligence of defendant in maintaining the mangle in a condition so that it could not be readily stopped after the fingers were caught therein." Appellant's counsel assert that the courts of this state do not recognize the doctrine of comparative negligence, and that plaintiff cannot recover for the portion of the injury caused by defendant's fault, citing Hatch v. McCloud River Lumber Co., 150 Cal. 111, 88 Pac. 355; Sego v. S. F. Co., 137 Cal. 407, 70 Pac. 279. But in neither of the cases cited did the obligation of an employer to his servant exist. Here the jury determined in effect that, owing to the youth and inexperience of Bertha Larsen and defendant's failure to warn her, she did not appreciate the dangers attendant upon her occupation, and was therefore not guilty of contributory negligence in putting her hand into a place where it might be caught by the rollers. While the accident occurred at that part of the mangle which is not, and, in the nature of things cannot be, protected by a guard, this does not excuse the defendant from the obligation of fitting his machinery with the usual modern appliances for preventing or minimizing injury.

In Quinn v. Electric Laundry Co., 101 Pac. 795, defendant and appellant advanced the theory that as no guard could make the mangle absolutely safe, it was not negligent in failing, through its servants, to keep a certain guard properly adjusted. But we there held as follows: "If it was the duty of defendant to keep this guard in proper position in order that the danger might not be obviated entirely, but materially lessened, then the failure to perform such duty would be as reprehensible as the neglect with reference to some safety appliance which might be attached to a piece of mechanism in such a manner as to exclude all danger of accident. It is certain that one's fingers would pass more easily through a space one inch wide than through an aperture but one-fourth of an inch in width." So here it might be said with equal force that one is less apt to lose a hand in a mangle which may be quickly stopped than in a machine not fitted with modern appliances for throwing off the belt by an easily accessible lever. There was abundant evidence that for a long time prior to the accident the lever, by which the belt had formerly been thrown easily and quickly off the pulley controlling the operation of the mangle, had been out of order, and that the machinery was stopped or started by a cord fastened to a portion of the mechanism, and leading, not to a place near the front of the machine, but to a location near that part of the mangle where the clothes were folded after passing between the rollers. It was necessary to stoop down in order to reach this cord, and several of the girls who had worked in the laundry testified that at times it was difficult to stop the machinery by the method in use after the lever was out of order. There was testimony by Bertha Larsen and other employés in the laundry that after the girl screamed for help considerable time elapsed before the machine was stopped. One of the girls who saw the accident testified: "If the machine could have been stopped when she holloed, I should not think it would have mangled or hurt any more than the ends of her fingers."

This case in its facts is much like that of Sibbert v. Scotland Cotton Mills, 145 N. C. 308, 59 S. E. 79. There the "shifter" for throwing the belt on and off the pulley was out of order. Plaintiff, while working about the machinery, was caught by the sleeve, and his arm was drawn into certain cogs, and injured by reason of the fact that the belt could not be quickly moved. There the learned court used the following language: "It may be conceded that the frames at which plaintiff was put to work were of proper construction and in good condition; that there was no evidence on the part of defendant, either in respect to the frames or the travis gear; that defendant was guilty of no negligence in failing to instruct plaintiff in his work. It may be further conceded that his sleeve getting caught in the travis gear was an accident for which defendant was not responsible, or that plaintiff did not exercise due care to avoid the danger of getting caught in the cogs. The question arises whether there was negligence in permitting the levers of the shifters, provided for the purpose of starting and stopping the frames, to be 'out of fix,' and whether such negligence was the proximate cause of the injury. It appears that the wheels, upon which were the cogs of the travis gear, move slowly, and that, if the shifters had been in good repair, and had performed the office for which they were intended, the frames could easily have been stopped by pushing the lever, throwing the belt from the tight to the loose pulley, and plaintiff would not have sustained any injury further than tearing his shirt sleeve. The plaintiff, assuming, as we must do, the truth of his testimony, was pursuing instructions—working as directed by the 'head boss.' There is always more or less danger that employés working in mills, even when the machinery is in proper repair, will become entangled in the wheels, cogs, etc. This is one of the dangers incident to the employment. Where there is no negligence in respect to the construction, repair of machinery, or in failing to give instruction as to the manner of operating the machine, an injury sustained by the employé is attributed either to accident or the negligence of the employés. The risk of such injury is assumed. Recognizing the danger of such accidents, employers use such safety appliances as are in general use, either to avert the danger or to stop the machine in the event that an injury is imminent. Defendant had attached to the frames upon which plaintiff was employed shifters controlled by levers, easily operated, by which, in an emergency, the frames could be stopped. It was the duty of defendant to use reasonable care, by proper construction and frequent inspection, to have and keep them in working order. If it failed to do so, there was a breach of duty to plaintiff." We thoroughly agree with the doctrine so clearly expressed by the learned Supreme Court of North Carolina, and regard the case at bar entirely within the principles above announced.

In this case the court submitted to the jury (and we think properly) the questions of Bertha Larsen's minority and her lack of instruction regarding the dangers of her employment. This was within the pleadings previously quoted. There was a conflict of evidence both as to her instruction or lack of it, and in reference to her knowledge of the dangers of putting her hand upon the rollers on the "receiving" side of the mangle where the clothes were taken out and folded after they had been ironed. With such conflict we have nothing to do if there is any evidence tending legitimately to sustain the plaintiff's theories on these points. Bertha Larsen testified that she had received no warning or instruction with reference to the dangers to be encountered in working about the machine. At the time of the accident she had been employed by defendant just four weeks. She testified in part as follows: "I never paid any particular attention to the machine on the folding side because I did not realize there was any danger there where the clothes came out. The machine had just started up before I was injured, and the rollers were turning very slowly. The rollers were covered with a canvas or cloth. That cloth would sometimes become wrinkled, and they were straightened out by our hands. If it was running we would do it while the machine was in operation." Speaking of the manner in which her fingers were caught, she said: "I don't know exactly how I got them in that day unless I was smoothing the cloth." She was corroborated in many of her statements by other witnesses. We cannot, therefore, disturb the conclusions of the court and jury regarding her minority, her ignorance of machinery, and her lack of instruction with reference to the dangers of her work at the mangle. But appellant contends that the peril was so obvious that she must be presumed to have been fully cognizant of it. With the record in this case are photographs of the mangle, accompanied by an explanation of its mechanism. From this it appears that while she must have observed the cloth-covered rollers from her station at the folding bench or shelf, she could not see the heated cylinder which produced so much of the damage suffered by her. As was said by this department in Quinn v. Electric Laundry Co., supra, referring to a hidden roller: "It would seem that the position and function of this roller at least should have been fully explained by defendant to any person who was directed to guide clothes into this ponderous machine." Whether or not, under all of the circumstances revealed by the evidence, plaintiff was negligent is a question peculiarly for the jury. Buchel v. Gray Brothers, 115 Cal. 421, 47 Pac. 112.

We have carefully examined the instructions, and find no errors therein.

There was some controversy with reference to an amendment to the complaint which, according to appellant's counsel, was inserted in the record after the trial. Appellant filed an affidavit by the county clerk that said amendment was not permitted during or before the trial. This was met by a counter-affidavit by respondent's attorney to the effect that the amendment in question had been allowed at the trial, but had not been copied into the pleading by the clerk, as ordered by the court. This matter was heard by the judge of the superior court at a time when counsel for all the parties were present, and determined adversely to appellant's contention. When and under what circumstances an order permitting an amendment to a pleading is made, and the substance of such amendment, are matters peculiarly "within the breast of the court." We will not disturb the correction in diminution of the record thus made.

We concur: LORIGAN, J.; HENSHAW, J.

PEOPLE v. ARGENTOS. (Cr. 1,498.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 13, 1909. Rehearing Denied Jan. 12, 1910.)

1. Criminal Law (§ 369*)—Evidence—Other Offenses.

On a trial for a particular crime, evidence which shows, or tends to show, the commission of another distinct offense by accused, is, in general, inadmissible.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 822–824; Dec. Dig. § 369.*]

2. Criminal Law (§ 371*)—Evidence—Other Offenses.

Where, in a prosecution for homicide, it was claimed that defendant had falsely represented to deceased that he had mining claims, which he would convey to induce deceased to sign a bail bond for him, and that he killed deceased to prevent his withdrawal from the bond on his discovery of the falsity of the representations, evidence of conversations between defendant and deceased immediately prior to their departure to examine the claims after deceased had signed defendant's bond, and deceased's statement that unless defendant showed him the claims and carried out his agreement he would withdraw from the bond and surrender defendant to the authorities, was not objectionable as evidence of defendant's commission of another crime; the evidence being within the exception that, where evidence has a direct bearing on the question of guilt, it is admissible, though it tends to show the commission of another offense.

3. Criminal Law (§ 369*)—Evidence—Other Offenses—Accusation.

The rule that evidence showing a distinct offense other than that for which accused is being tried is inadmissible extends to proof of an accusation of another crime, as well as to evidence of its actual commission.

4. Criminal Law (§ 371*)—Evidence—Other Offenses—Motive.

Evidence showing that defendant was accused of another offense for which he had given bail with deceased as surety was admissible to show motive, where it was claimed that defendant killed deceased in order to prevent the withdrawal from the bail bond and surrender of defendant on ascertaining the falsity of defendant's representations as to his ownership of mining claims which he had agreed to transfer to deceased as security.

5. Homicide (§ 166*)—Evidence—Identity—Motive.

Where, in a prosecution for homicide, defendant's identity was attempted to be established by circumstantial evidence, evidence showing that he had a motive for killing deceased was material and could be proved by any testimony reasonably having a tendency to establish it.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homicide, Cent. Dig. §§ 320–331; Dec. Dig. § 166.*]

6. Criminal Law (§ 815*)—Instructions—Assumed Facts.

In a prosecution for homicide, the court charged that failure to show any motive was a circumstance in favor of defendant which the jury should consider. The court also fully instructed on the presumption of innocence, reasonable doubt, the necessity of proof of every fact essential to guilt beyond a reasonable doubt, or, failing this, that defendant should be acquitted, and requiring that circumstantial evidence relied on for a conviction must exclude to a moral certainty any other hypothesis except defendant's guilt. The court also told the jury that they should not understand that the court expressed any opinion on the weight of the evidence, or any part of it, or on the truth or falsity of any witness' testimony, or that any alleged fact in the case was or was not proved, that the questions of fact, weight of evidence, etc., were solely for the jury to determine. Held, that an instruction, after declaring that direct affirmative proof of motive need not be given, assigning as one of the reasons therefor that the individual whose motive is sought might remain silent, or if he spoke might speak untruly, and that resort must therefore be had to actual physical manifestations of motive, exhibited by the results, as the safest, if not the only, proof of motive, was not erroneous as impliedly charging the jury to disregard defendant's testimony, and as authorizing them to infer that robbery was the motive for the homicide from evidence that accused had decedent's property in his possession shortly after the killing.

7. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 822*) — INSTRUCTIONS — CONSIDERATION.

In determining whether a jury has been correctly instructed, the charge must be considered as a whole.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Inyo County; Walter L. Lamar, Judge.

Thomas R. Argentos was convicted of murder, and he appeals. Affirmed.

P. B. Forbes and Wm. J. Clark, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and George Beebe and J. Charles Jones, Deputy Attys. Gen., for the People.

LORIGAN, J. The appellant was charged with the crime of murder, convicted of murder in the first degree, sentenced to imprisonment for life, and appeals from the judgment and order denying his motion for a new trial. Reliance for reversal is based exclusively on certain rulings of the court, on the admission of testimony, and the giving of a particular instruction asked by the people, with respect to all of which it is claimed the trial court erred. No point is made as to the sufficiency of the evidence to sustain the verdict, so that only a summary of the evidence need be given.

The defendant and the deceased, John Pavlovich, friends and engaged in the occupation of prospecting for mines, were together in Goldfield, Nev., and in the early part of July, 1907, departed together for Inyo county in this state, apparently for the purpose of visiting certain mining claims of which defendant claimed to be the owner. Some time prior to their departure the defendant had been arrested for an offense, the nature of which the record does not disclose, and, as security for his appearance, the deceased had gone on his bond under an arrangement between them that the defendant should convey to the deceased some mining claims which he asserted he owned in Death Valley; that it was for the purpose of examining these claims that the defendant and the deceased left Goldfield for Inyo county, the deceased having stated to the defendant that if he could not show him these claims as agreed he would bring him back to Goldfield and withdraw from his bond. The two left Goldfield on a freight train on the 9th or 10th of July, getting off at a place called Bonnie Claire, or Montana station, where they remained all night. They had breakfast the next morning at a hotel kept by Mrs. Mitchell and, having borrowed a mule and cart from her, proceeded to a place called the "Steininger ranch," in a lease of which the defendant appears to have been interested. They sent back the mule and cart borrowed from Mrs. Mitchell and remained all night at the Steininger ranch with a relative of the defendant. The next day about noon, having obtained another mule and cart from the Steininger ranch and provided themselves with provisions, they started apparently on a prospecting trip in the direction of Scotty's camp, located on the edge of Death Valley. About 5 o'clock the next morning one of the men on the Steininger ranch, from which the mule and cart had been procured, found the mule attached to the cart standing outside the ranch corral with no one in charge. Neither the defendant nor Pavlovich returned to the ranch, and the latter was not again seen alive. On July 12, 1907, between 11 and 12 o'clock, John Astley, the keeper of a hotel on the desert about a mile from Bonnie Claire or Montana station, saw the defendant coming alone and on foot towards the hotel from the direction of Death Valley. He stopped at the hotel for a short time, where he exhibited two revolvers and pledged one of them—a 38-caliber Colt's—to Astley for the loan of $15. The evidence showed that when the deceased left Goldfield with the defendant he carried on his person a 38-caliber Colt's revolver. From Astley's the defendant walked to Mrs. Mitchell's hotel at Montana station, where he lunched. Mrs. Mitchell, who had known defendant and deceased for a long time, inquired of the defendant where he had left Pavlovich, to which he replied that the latter had gone prospecting for three or four days. The defendant while eating his lunch was nervous and uneasy to such an extent as to be particularly noticed by Mrs. Mitchell. That evening the defendant left Montana station for Goldfield. On the 19th or 20th of July, 1907, a cousin of the deceased, accompanied by a friend, left Goldfield for the purpose of looking for the deceased and found his dead body on the desert near Scotty's camp at the edge of Death Valley, and some six or seven miles from the Steininger ranch. The body, with two bullet holes in the head and wrapped with blankets, was found a short distance from the road. It was attired only in undergarments. The outer clothing and hat of deceased, together with his pistol holster, were found at different places and some distance from the body, thrust under clusters of bushes. His pistol could not be found. In fact, without further detailing all the circumstances leading to that conclusion, it was quite evident that the deceased had been murdered apparently while he slept. A short time after the discovery of the body, the defendant was arrested in Goldfield and charged with the murder of the deceased. There was no evidence that the defendant owned any mining claims in Inyo county or elsewhere. Many additional incriminatory circumstances might be stated; but, as no point was made of the sufficiency of the evidence to sustain the verdict, the above statement of the main facts is all that is necessary.

The evidence against the defendant was entirely circumstantial, and the theory of the prosecution was: That the defendant, to induce the deceased to go upon his bond in the undisclosed criminal charge against him, falsely represented to the deceased that he owned certain mining claims in Inyo county which, in consideration of his becoming surety for him, he would deed to the deceased; that the deceased was importuning him to show him the claims and carry out his agreement, and was threatening that unless he did so he would withdraw from his bond; that in response to such importunity of deceased both he and defendant started from Goldfield for the purpose of having the defendant show the deceased these claims; that the defendant had no claims as represented, and his knowledge that deceased would withdraw from his bond on the discovery of the falseness of his representations was the motive which actuated the defendant to kill the deceased. In support of this theory the court permitted the prosecution to show certain conversations between the defendant and the deceased immediately prior to their departure from Goldfield with reference to mining claims claimed by the defendant; the fact that deceased was on the bond of the defendant for his appearance to answer some criminal charge; that defendant had agreed to convey said claims to the deceased in consideration of his having become a surety on said bond; and that the purpose of their leaving Goldfield together was to visit the defendant's claims. The principal point made by appellant is that it was error to admit this evidence in as far, at least, as it tended to prove the commission by defendant of some other offense than the one for which he was being tried; but this evidence was not admitted with a view merely of proving that defendant had been charged with another offense. It was offered, and we think properly admitted, as bearing on the question of motive. The general rule, undoubtedly, is that, upon a trial of a particular crime, evidence which shows, or tends to show, the commission of another and distinct crime by a defendant, is inadmissible, and it is prejudicial error to let it go before the jury. This rule, however, has its exception, and, where it appears that evidence of the commission of such other crime has a direct and logical bearing upon the question of the guilt of the accused as to the crime with which he is charged, evidence of the commission of such other offense is admissible.

In the case at bar it is to be observed that there was no evidence that the defendant had committed any crime other than the one with which he was charged. The evidence only was that he had given bail on an accusation made against him for some offense, the nature of which is undisclosed by the record. The principle contended for by the appellant would, however, apply even to proof of an accusation of crime as well as proof of its actual commission, because the injury to an accused lies in the fact that proof of either actual commission, or accusation of another crime, is calculated to prejudice the defendant in the minds of the jury; but, while the general rule is as contended for by appellant, still it is not inflexible. It is equally the established rule that on the trial of criminal cases any fact or circumstance which in any degree is relevant to any material fact in issue is admissible, and it is none the less admissible because such evidence has a tendency to show him guilty of an offense other than the one of which he is charged, and hence may serve to raise a prejudice against him before the jury. "Proof of the commission of another crime may be given where it tends to show motive for the homicide in question." Wharton on Homicide, § 596. The admission of such evidence is sanctioned by the authorities in this state. People v. Suesser, 142 Cal. 363, 75 Pac. 1093; People v. Cook, 148 Cal. 341, 83 Pac. 43; People v. Soeder, 150 Cal. 15, 87 Pac. 1016. Within the limitation to the general rule, the evidence that some offense had been charged against defendant, and that deceased had gone upon his bond, given in connection with the other evidence relative to the mining claims, his agreement to convey them to deceased, the threat of the deceased to withdraw from his bond and redeliver him to the authorities, their departure from Goldfield for Inyo county, and the nonexistence of such mining claims, was all admissible as bearing upon the question of motive upon the part of the defendant actuating him to slay the deceased. In a case where the identity of a person who commits a crime is attempted to be proven by circumstantial evidence, such as in the case at bar, evidence of a motive on the part of a defendant charged is always a subject of proof, and the fact of motive particularly material. In proof of motive, the prosecution has a right to offer any testimony which reasonably and fairly has a tendency to establish it, and we are satisfied that the evidence which was admitted by the court, and of which appellant complains, was relevant to, and had a logical bearing upon, the subject. What weight that evidence might have was a question for the jury; but that it was admissible, notwithstanding it showed the defendant was charged with some other offense than the one for which he was being tried, and though its tendency might have been to prejudice him in the minds of the jury, is not, under the authorities, open to question. People v. Sanders, 114 Cal. 216, 46 Pac. 153.

With respect to the only other point made as to the admission of testimony: A witness was permitted to testify, over the objection of defendant, that the pistol pawned by the defendant to Astley resembled one which he saw in the possession of deceased just before his departure with defendant from Goldfield, and he further testified that he could point it out if placed among 50 others. The evidence elicited in these replies went to the proof of the identity of the pistol, and that there was no impropriety in asking the questions appears so plain that it would be idle to discuss the subject.

As to the instruction complained of: The court instructed the jury on the subject of motive partially as follows: "You are instructed that, with regard to the grounds from which motive may be inferred, the law has never limited them. Therefore it is immaterial whether the motive be hatred, wealth, or in gratification of desires or passions, or arising from any other cause, so long as the motive exists. You must bear in mind that motive, being an auxiliary fact from which, if established, in connection with other necessary facts, the main or primary fact of guilt may be inferred, it may be established by circumstantial evidence the same as any other fact in the case. If the motive of a party in committing a crime has been declared by him, or direct evidence can be given of it by the prosecution, then such proof would be admissible; but the law does not require at the hands of the prosecution any direct affirmative proof of the motive of any person committing crime, and one of the reasons for this rule, among others, is that the individual whose motive is sought to be ascertained may remain silent, or if he speaks, and has a crime to conceal, may speak untruly, and thus our minds are compelled from necessity to revert to the actual physical manifestations of the motive exhibited by the results produced, as the safest, if not the only, proof of motive. Therefore, in determining the question of presence or absence of motive in the commission of crime, it is in accordance with our general observation and experience to infer motive by reference to the laws which have been generally and usually found to control human conduct. This rule is based on sound reason and universal experience."

Taking this instruction on the subject of motive as standing alone, the appellant contends that in giving it the court violated section 19, art. 6, of the Constitution, prohibiting judges from charging juries as to matter of fact, the specific claim being: That it is in effect an instruction to the jury to disregard the testimony of the defendant; that it directly assumes the agency of defendant in the death of Pavlovich, and tells the jury to infer robbery as a motive to account for that fact; that it informs the jury that the body of Pavlovich is actual physical manifestation of the motive of defendant and a result produced thereby. It is proper to state here, as bearing on the claim of the appellant that this instruction tells the jury to infer robbery as a motive for the killing, that there was evidence in the case that about the time Pavlovich and defendant left Goldfield together the former was in possession of some money—not a very large amount—none of which was found in his clothing or about him when his dead body was discovered, and, inferentially, it appeared from the evidence that defendant, when they started from Goldfield, had no money. Aside from this, there was evidence that deceased was in possession of a Colt's revolver when he left Goldfield, which could not be found when his body was discovered.

Recurring now to the instruction: The particular portion of the instruction which appellant criticises is that part where the court, after declaring that direct affirmative proof of motive need not be given, proceeds to assign as one of the reasons for this that the individual, whose motive is sought to be ascertained, may remain silent, or, if he speaks, may speak untruly, and hence resort must be had to the actual physical manifestations of motive exhibited by the results produced as the safest, if not the only, proof of motive. The defendant was sworn as a witness in his own behalf, and testified that he left the Steininger ranch about 3 o'clock on the morning of the second day after the arrival of deceased and himself there to go to Goldfield to bring another man to the ranch, that he did this at the request of deceased, and left the latter at the ranch when he departed for Goldfield. In the light of this evidence, and the further proof of the disappearance of the revolver and money of deceased, it is insisted by appellant that the giving of this portion of the instruction was erroneous and highly prejudicial to the defendant. The argument is that the question whether the deceased was killed by defendant was to be determined from circumstantial evidence alone, and under such a condition of the evidence the absence of any motive on his part for the killing was a circumstance in favor of his innocence; that the presence or absence of motive and the circumstances from which it was to be determined were matters exclusively for the consideration of the jury; that the court in instructing the jury that an individual whose motive is sought to be ascertained may remain silent, or, if he speaks, being accused of crime, may speak untruly, told them in effect that they were to discredit the testimony of defendant in his denial of responsibility for the death of the deceased, and were to look to the actual physical manifestations of motive exhibited by the results produced. As to this latter part of the instruction, it is insisted by appellant that the jury were told by it that there was in fact a physical manifestation of motive on the part of defendant exhibited by results produced proven in the case—a matter exclusively for the jury to determine—and was in effect an instruction that these physical manifestations exhibited by results produced showed that the defendant killed the deceased in order to rob him.

We are not particularly impressed with the reasoning whereby the appellant reaches the conclusion that the constitutional provision against the court charging a jury as to matters of fact has been violated by the giving of this particular instruction. As we look upon it, and as the jury must have understood it, it was entirely impersonal. It was a general instruction—not as lucid as it might be when addressed to "actual physical manifestations" and "results produced"—in which the court was defining the method whereby motive might be arrived at in cases of homicide where the evidence was purely circumstantial. In reality a fair view of what the court was endeavoring to impress upon the jury is that there was no fixed rule by which the presence or absence of motive could be ascertained, but it was to be determined by a consideration of those laws which generally influence or control human conduct; in other words, a jury in considering the matter should be governed by the results of experience and the application of common sense. It is true the court in the instruction refers somewhat to the reasons why, in the end, motive or want of motive must be settled by a reference to the rules of human conduct, and in that respect may be open to the criticism that it is argumentative; but we do not think its character as laying down a general rule on the question of motive is open to the objection that it assumes any fact exclusively for the determination of the jury, or that it is directed to any particular circumstance in the case, or that any inference could be drawn by the jury from it prejudicial to the defendant. It was proper for the court to instruct the jury on the subject of motive, and the instruction appears to us to have been but an abstract declaration on the subject, without reference to or comment on any particular circumstance in the case. It does not assume that there was a motive, nor does it assume the existence of any fact from which motive may be inferred. As an element in the crime of murder proper for consideration by the jury, it suggested a rule which might be adopted for ascertaining the existence or nonexistence of motive, and, while a statement of the general rule to the jury would have sufficed, we cannot perceive how, with any plausibility, the incorporation of the reasons for the rule in the instruction can be said to have amounted to a discrediting of the testimony of the defendant by the court, or an assumption on its part of the existence of any fact, the existence of which was to be determined exclusively by the jury.

In support of his attack on this instruction, counsel for appellant relies particularly on the cases of People v. Vereneseneckockockhoff, 129 Cal. 497, 58 Pac. 156, 62 Pac. 111, and People v. Enwright, 134 Cal. 527, 66 Pac. 726, both cases where it was held that an instruction given relative to motive was erroneous. It is claimed by appellant that there is no difference between the instruction now under consideration and the instructions held erroneous in the cases cited. There is, however, this radical difference: In both the cases cited the instruction was substantially the same, and practically informed the jury that they would be warranted in finding a motive for the conduct of the defendant without any proof whatever, which was clearly pointed out in the cases to be erroneous. In the instruction at bar the jury are not so informed. They are instructed that motive may be established by direct affirmative proof or inferred from circumstantial evidence, and that in inferring motive they may take into consideration those rules which are found to usually influence human conduct.

But, assuming that the instruction standing alone might be open to the objection which appellant urges against it, still it is quite evident, when all the instructions given to the jury are considered, that the court in the instruction criticised did not intend to imply that the testimony of defendant should be disregarded by the jury, nor did it assume that defendant had killed the deceased, and that his motive for doing so was robbery, or that by reason of the language used in the instruction the jury could have understood the court as intimating a belief as to any of these matters or in any other respect. In determining whether a jury has been correctly instructed, it is not proper to take into consideration an isolated portion of an instruction or a single instruction alone, but resort must be had to the entire charge. It is to be assumed that the jury in considering a case have in mind the instructions of the court as a whole, and if, examined as a whole, they correctly state the law and are sufficiently explicit so that a jury of ordinary intelligence would not be misled by them, or become impressed with the view that the court was intimating that it believed any fact to be established by the evidence, then the instructions are not susceptible to criticism.

Now, while appellant directs his complaint against that portion of the instruction which we have been examining, he does not give due consideration to this rule which requires an examination of the entire charge, and overlooks the fact that immediately following the instruction which he attacks the court gave a further instruction as to motive which in reality was a continuation of the instruction criticised. The court said: "When the evidence fails to show any motive to commit the crime charged on the part of the accused, it is a circumstance in favor of his innocence; and in this case, if the jury finds by careful examination of all the evidence that it fails to show any motive on the part of the accused to commit the crime charged against him, then this is a circumstance which the jury ought to consider in connection with all the other evidence in the case in making up their verdict." It is clear, when the two instructions are read together, that the court was not assuming anything as to motive, or giving any intimation as to its belief of the agency of the defendant in the killing of deceased or the existence on his part of any motive for his doing so. It is apparent, when this last instruction is taken into consideration with the criticised instruction of which it is a part, the jury could have understood nothing else therefrom than that the court was instructing them on the subject of motive as an element in the crime of murder, leaving to them exclusively the determination from the evidence whether it was proved in the case or not.

Aside from this, the court, among other instructions, further instructed the jury fully, as is customary, on the presumption of innocence; the doctrine of reasonable doubt; the necessity of the prosecution proving every fact essential to establish guilt beyond a reasonable doubt, or, failing this, that defendant was entitled to an acquittal; on the subject of direct and circumstantial evidence; and that where the latter is relied on for a conviction it must exclude to a moral certainty, beyond a reasonable doubt, any other hypothesis except the guilt of defendant, or the jury must acquit him. The jury were also told at the request of defendant that the defendant had a right to testify in his own behalf or not, or to testify so far and to such facts as he saw fit, and any omission or failure on his part to testify to any facts, or particular fact, must not be considered as a circumstance against him, or be considered by the jury at all. At the very beginning of the charge the jury were told that the duty of the court was simply to instruct them on the general principles of law, and that they were to distinctly understand "that the court in no manner or form was expressing, or desires to express, any opinion on the weight of the evidence, or any part of it, or on the truth or falsity of any witness' testimony, or that any alleged fact in the case is, or is not, proved. With questions of fact, the weight of the evidence, the credit you should give to any witness sworn, the court has nothing to do. These are matters entirely within your province, and which you as jurors, under your oaths, must determine for yourselves." This principle of the exclusive right of the jury to determine what facts were or were not proven, the weight of the evidence, and the credibility of witnesses, was subsequently reiterated during the giving of the charge. Taking into consideration the entire charge of the court on the subject of motive, coupled with the other instructions, particularly the one we have last quoted, where the court announces the rule as to the respective duties of the court and the jury, and it appears quite clear that no intelligent juror could have understood the court in the face of its express denial of any right, or intention to do so, as implying in the instruction on motive that the testimony of the defendant was to be discredited, or that the court was assuming that defendant had feloniously killed the deceased, or that motive on his part for doing so was proven, or that any motive had at all been proven.

This case, in its general features as to instructions, is similar to the case of People v. Besold, 154 Cal. 363, 97 Pac. 871. The particular instruction there criticised was one given on the matter of intent; it being claimed that as given the court assumed that defendant, who was being prosecuted for murder, had killed the deceased. It was held that on an examination and consideration of the entire charge given to them the jury could not so have understood the court as intimating. The rule is there fully discussed and clearly declared (the authorities in support of it being collated) to the effect that, in determining whether the law has been properly declared to a jury in any particular case, the charge as a whole must be considered. Applying this rule to the case at bar as it is declared in the Besold and other cases, we are satisfied that the claim of defendant that the court was assuming any fact as proven in its instruction on motive, if the instruction itself examined alone was susceptible of such criticism, is plainly untenable upon a consideration of the entire charge of the court.

The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

MORTGAGES (§ 148*)—TERMINATION OF TRUST — NONPERFORMANCE OF CONDITIONS BY BENEFICIARIES.

The T. Company owned lots subject to a mortgage to a bank and was indebted to W. and H. and a firm of which complainants and cross-complainant were members, and, to provide for the payment of such indebtedness, conveyed the lands to cross-complainant, subject to certain trusts declared by him, first, in favor of W. of $10 an acre, second, in favor of H. of the same amount, and, third, in favor of the firm for the residue for which the lands might sell, but the declaration provided that the rents and income were insufficient to pay interest on the mortgage to the bank and the taxes, and that W., H., and the firm should each pay one-third of the interest and taxes, to be repaid after discharging the mortgage debt before the proceeds of the sale of the land were applied to the other trusts declared. The beneficiaries failed to pay the interest on the mortgage debt, and the mortgage was foreclosed, and the land purchased by the bank, and thereafter defendant purchased from W. and H. their interest in the trust and obtained from the bank an assignment of its certificate of purchase. Complainants, who have acquired cross-complainant's interest in the trust, seek to have the land sold free from any claim under the mortgage sale, and the proceeds distributed as provided in the trust declaration upon their paying one-third of the taxes and interest on the mortgage debt, and a fair proportion of the principal, and cross-complainant, the trustee, asks the same judgment. Held, that under the trust any sales of the lands were to be made prior to foreclosure of the mortgage, and, as complainants were equally at fault with W. and H. in failing to pay interest and taxes, they thereby abandoned the trust, and the foreclosure of the mortgage ended all relationship between the beneficiaries except that between them and the T. Company as creditors, so that complainants were entitled to the lands or the proceeds only after satisfaction of all prior claims, including those of W. and H.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; N. P. Conrey, Judge.

Action by George H. Smith and another against Cyrus F. McNutt, as trustee, and others, in which defendant named filed a cross-complaint. From a judgment sustaining demurrer to complaint and cross-complaint, plaintiffs and cross-complainant appeal. Affirmed.

George H. Smith and Joseph E. Hannon, for appellants. C. F. McNutt and John J. North, for respondents.

ANGELLOTTI, J. This is an appeal from a judgment entered upon sustaining demurrers to an amended complaint and to a cross-complaint, in an action wherein plaintiffs and cross-complainant McNutt seek the same judgment.

On May 17, 1901, the Lake View Town Company, a corporation, hereinafter designated the "town company," was the owner of the lands involved in this proceeding, being lots in Riverside county aggregating 1,000 acres scattered throughout the extent of a larger body of arable lands, comprising some 6,000 acres. The land of the town company was subject to a mortgage held by the San Gabriel Valley Bank, hereinafter designated as the "bank," securing the payment of $5,000, with interest. The town company was also indebted to John Wolfskill and to L. P. Hansen, and to the law firm of Smith, McNutt & Hannon (composed of the plaintiffs and cross-complainant). To provide for the payment of such indebtedness, it conveyed the land on May 17, 1901, to McNutt, by deed of grant, bargain, and sale, subject to the mortgage held by the bank, and also 1,000 shares of water stock supposed to be appurtenant to the land. McNutt accepted the conveyance with the understanding in parol between him and the town company that he would take, hold, and dispose of the land on certain trusts which he should thereafter declare in writing. On October 10, 1903, he made such written declaration. It recited the conveyance to him, and also the adoption of resolutions by the town company intended to fix certain trusts on the property, being: First, a trust in favor of John Wolfskill of $10 per acre; second, a trust in favor of L. P. Hansen of $10 per acre; and, third, a trust in favor of Smith, McNutt & Hannon for the whole amount of the residue for which said lands and water stock might be sold by him after paying and discharging from the proceeds of such sales the debt of the bank and interest thereon, the taxes on said lands, the expenses of sale, $10 per acre to Wolfskill, and $10 per acre to Hansen, and declared that he held the lands subject to said trust. This was followed by this preamble and condition, viz.: "But, whereas, the said debt to the said San Gabriel Valley Bank, together with accumulations of interest thereon and certain taxes against the said lands, remain unpaid and are a first lien against the said lands in my hands; and, whereas, the rents and income from the said lands have not hitherto been sufficient to keep down such interest and taxes; and, whereas, the same must be kept down to prevent the foreclosure of the said mortgage and the sale of such lands for such taxes: I hereby make it a condition in the declaration of the said trusts in favor of the said Wolfskill, the said Hansen and the said Smith, McNutt & Hannon, that they shall, from time to time as the same is needed for the purpose of keeping down said interests and taxes, pay to me, or to said bank, and upon such taxes, sums of money sufficient to keep the same fully paid, as they shall respectively from time to time, become due and payable, that is to say, the said Wolfskill shall furnish one-third of such sums of money, the said Hansen one-third and the said Smith, McNutt & Hannon one-third, the said sums of money to be reimbursed to the several parties, with interest, next after the payment of said mortgage and of all taxes due, before any of the proceeds of the sales of said lands shall be applied to the other trusts herein declared; and if at any time there is sufficient income from the rents of said lands to pay said taxes and interest and to reimburse the said parties for moneys advanced upon that account, the same shall be used as soon as received for such purposes."

McNutt delivered this written declaration to Hansen, who received it on behalf of himself and the other beneficiaries, all of whom agreed thereto, and it was duly recorded in the office of the county recorder of Riverside county. The beneficiaries failed to furnish the trustee with money wherewith to pay the interest on the indebtedness secured by the mortgage held by the bank, and such interest was therefore not paid. The mortgage falling due by reason of such nonpayment, the bank brought its action to foreclose the same, and this action resulted in a judgment fixing the amount due, directing a sale by defendant Harvey Potter, appointed commissioner for that purpose, and "foreclosing the equity of redemption" of McNutt as successor of the town company. The judgment was affirmed by this court. On April 3, 1907, the commissioner duly sold the mortgaged property, the bank being the purchaser, for the sum of $7,806.31, which was the amount then due under the judgment. The commissioner thereupon executed and issued a certificate of sale to the bank, as such purchaser. Thereafter and prior to July 18, 1907, one A. B. Miller, acting for defendant the "Nuevo Land Company," a corporation, hereinafter designated as the "land company," purchased from Wolfskill and Hansen their respective interests in said trust, and on July 18, 1907, for a recited consideration of $9,050, obtained from the bank an assignment of the certificate of purchase executed by the commissioner. On July 24, 1907, Miller assigned said certificate and the claims or interests of Wolfskill and Hansen to the land company. The property is now of such value that it could be sold in parcels, "and, as contemplated by the scheme of said trust," for enough to pay all the "trust debts."

Plaintiffs Smith and Hannon, who have acquired all of the interest of McNutt, claim the right against the land company, as the successor in interest of their alleged co-beneficiaries, Wolfskill and Hansen, to be admitted to a participation in all rights acquired by such land company by reason of its purchase of the certificate of sale, and insist that, upon payment by them to the land company "of their just share to reimburse the said defendant of its necessary outlay to relieve and release the said land and said water stock from the lien and burden of the said mortgage and sale made under the decree foreclosing the same," the trustee should be required to execute his trust by selling the property free of any claim under the mortgage and sale thereunder, and to distribute the proceeds of such sales in the manner provided by the declaration of trust. They have made no offer to the land company to do anything more than pay one-third of the interest that has accrued on the mortgage debt and one-third of any taxes "that should have been paid by the debtor in the said mortgage," and "a fair proportion of the principal." The land company denies the right of plaintiffs to become entitled to the benefit of its act in taking over the certificate of purchase from the bank, by contribution of any portion of the expenses incurred in so doing, and claims to hold said certificate of purchase just as any purchaser who had no interest in the trust would hold the same.

Plaintiffs seek by this action an accounting on the part of the land company as to the amounts expended by it in acquiring its certificate of purchase, and a determination of the amount of the portion thereof which they shall pay, by way of contribution, to extinguish the lien of such certificate, and also an injunction preventing the commissioner from executing any deed on such certificate, and further a decree providing for the execution of the trust by the trustee. As we have before stated, the trustee asks practically the same judgment.

The foregoing constitutes substantially the case made by the amended complaint and the cross-complaint to which demurrers were sustained.

It may be conceded for the purposes of this decision that plaintiffs had such an interest in this land as would have given them the right to obtain such relief as would practically constitute a redemption thereof, even though they may not have been entitled to redeem under the statutory provisions relating to redemption. It may be that it could be held that they were substantially the owners thereof, subject to the prior claims of the bank, Wolfskill, and Hansen, and that a court of equity might be warranted in requiring a conveyance to them by the land company upon payment of the amounts due on such prior claims. However this may be, plaintiffs are seeking no such relief by this action, and their amended complaint does not state a cause of action in that behalf. The same equitable principles that might authorize the granting of such relief to plaintiffs would put Wolfskill and Hansen in the position of creditors having superior claims to plaintiffs, who were entitled to redeem for the protection of those claims, and would require, as a condition of such redemption by plaintiffs, the payment by them of the whole amount properly paid in making the purchase, with interest, and also the amounts due on account of the Wolfskill and Hansen claims.

We are of the opinion that at the time of the purchase of the certificate by the land company, successor of Wolfskill and Hansen, there was no such relation existing between it and plaintiffs as would give plaintiffs the right to have the purchase held to be one made for the benefit of the so-called "trust." The general principles relied on by plaintiffs in this regard, applicable in such cases as those of joint tenants, tenants in common, and generally persons placed in a situation of trust or confidence with respect to the subject of its purchase, may be freely conceded to be correctly stated by them in their briefs. If there is such a relationship that, in the language of Chancellor Kent in Van Horne v. Fonda, 5 Johns. Ch. (N. Y.) 407, "it is not consistent with good faith, nor with the duty which the connection of the parties, as claimants, of a common subject, created, that one of them should be able, without the consent of the other, to buy in an outstanding title and appropriate the whole subject to himself and thus undermine and oust his companion," the one acquiring such outstanding title will not be allowed to retain it for his own exclusive benefit. But, of course, this principle can have no application in the absence of the relationship which constitutes the whole reason for its existence. In the case at bar it appears clear to us that whatever obligations of this nature may have existed as to Wolfskill and Hansen prior to the foreclosure of the mortgage, if any, such obligations were absolutely terminated by such foreclosure and the sale thereunder. The declaration of trust makes it apparent that it was the intention of all the parties that, so far as any sales of the lands by the trustee were concerned, such sales were to be made prior to any foreclosure of the mortgage. Such sales were to be primarily for the purpose of paying the mortgage claim, and the beneficiaries were not to be called upon to advance any portion of the principal due thereon. It was expressly made a condition of the declaration in favor of the three beneficiaries that they should each advance one-third of such sums as should be necessary to pay interest on the mortgage debt and taxes, in order to prevent the foreclosure of the mortgage and the sale of the land for taxes. This they did not do as to amounts necessary to pay interest on the mortgage debt, and the mortgage was consequently foreclosed. Plaintiffs failed in this behalf, as well as Wolfskill and Hansen. No reason whatever is assigned for such default on plaintiffs' part. It is simply alleged that the beneficiaries failed to furnish the money wherewith to pay such interest. It cannot be assumed that Wolfskill and Hansen were unwilling to furnish their portion of this money had plaintiffs been willing to furnish theirs, and of course they could not be held derelict in failing to pay their portion if plaintiffs were unwilling to pay their own one-third. So far as appears by the complaint and cross-complaint, plaintiffs entirely abandoned their part of the arrangement in a most essential particular, and Wolfskill and Hansen in failing to make the necessary advances were not guilty of any bad faith or of any act inconsistent with any duty devolving on them by reason of the arrangement between the parties. Under these circumstances, the consequent foreclosure of the mortgage, which renders it impracticable to execute the trust in the manner designed, terminated all relationship between the various beneficiaries except the relationship that may have existed between Wolfskill and Hansen, on the one hand, as creditors of the town company having a lien on the land involved here for the amounts due them respectively, subject to the claim of the bank, and plaintiffs, on the other hand, as being entitled to the land or its proceeds after full satisfaction of all prior claims, including those of Wolfskill and Hansen. We know of no equitable considerations that would warrant the granting of any greater relief to plaintiffs than to permit them to take this land upon payment by them of all prior claims. As already said, they have shown no disposition to do this, and the complaint and cross-complaint make no case in this behalf. We are therefore of the opinion that the ruling of the court sustaining the demurrers was correct.

The judgment is affirmed.

DEMPSEY v. UNDERHILL et al. (DESERT MINING CO., Intervener). (L. A. 2,400.)

2. Appeal and Error (§ 1061*) — Harmless Error—Ruling on Motion to Dismiss.

Any error in denying plaintiff's motion to dismiss a complaint of intervention for delay in prosecution is harmless, where the court on its own motion dismissed the entire action on the same ground, and plaintiff did not appeal from the latter order.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Kern County; J. W. Mahon, Judge.

Action by C. F. Dempsey against J. H. Underhill and others, in which the Desert Mining Company, a corporation, intervened. From a judgment dismissing the action for delay in prosecution, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Campbell, Metson & Campbell and F. E Barton, for appellant. M. W. Conkling and C. W. Pendleton, for respondent and intervener.

ANGELLOTTI, J. This is an appeal by plaintiff from a judgment dismissing an action for the reason that the same was not brought to trial within five years after issue joined by answer between the intervener and plaintiff.

The action was one commenced September 24, 1900, to quiet plaintiff's title to an undivided interest in certain mining claims as against certain persons named as defendants. The defaults of all these persons were entered in the year 1901, the last of such defaults having been entered on October 15, 1901; but no judgment has ever been given as against any of said defendants. By leave of the court the Desert Mining Company filed its complaint in intervention on October 26, 1900, claiming all of the property as against both plaintiff and defendants. Plaintiff's demurrer to this complaint in intervention was overruled, and he filed his answer thereto on November 24, 1900. On September 25, 1906, plaintiff gave notice of a motion to be made for an order dismissing the action in intervention on the ground that the issues tendered by the intervener had not been brought to trial within five years after the plaintiff had filed his answer, and that such neglect had not been due to any stipulation of the parties in writing or otherwise. Code Civ. Proc. § 583. This motion was heard on November 26, 1906, and the facts stated as grounds therefor shown to exist. On December 6, 1906, the lower court made its order denying plaintiff's motion to dismiss the action in intervention, and adjudging that "the said action and the whole thereof be and the same is hereby dismissed, for the reason that the same was not brought on for trial within five years." This order, which constituted a final judgment within the meaning of the provisions of the Code touching appeals, and which finally and entirely disposed of the whole case (see Marks v. Keenan, 140 Cal. 33, 73 Pac. 751), was entered June 6, 1907, and plaintiff appealed therefrom within six months thereafter.

It may be seriously questioned whether the lower court was warranted by the facts stated in dismissing plaintiff's action as to the defaulting defendants. But plaintiff makes no complaint in his briefs on this score. The sole points are: (1) That the intervener never perfected its intervention as provided by the law and therefore has no standing in the litigation; (2) that the complaint in intervention did not state a cause of action; and (3) that the court erred in denying plaintiff's motion to dismiss the action in intervention. Solely for the purposes of this appeal we may concede that all of these points are well made, but we are nevertheless utterly unable to see why a reversal of the judgment of dismissal should be had on account thereof. The effect of the judgment of dismissal was necessarily to dismiss the intervener's action, the very thing plaintiff was seeking to have done by his motion. While denying plaintiff's motion, the court on its own motion made an order which granted all that plaintiff asked in regard to the intervener. So far as the disposition of the intervention is concerned, plaintiff has nothing substantial to complain of. If the court erred in denying his motion, it was error without prejudice.

If plaintiff has any ground of complaint whatever, it is that the lower court by its order made on its own motion erroneously prevented him from obtaining a judgment against the defaulting defendants. But, as we have said, he makes no complaint as to this in his briefs. His points relate solely to his rights as against the intervener.

None of the points made warrant a reversal.

The judgment of dismissal is affirmed.

On the trial of a person who, while undergoing a life sentence, committed an assault, which under Pen. Code, § 246, is punishable by death, the record of the former commitment is admissible.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Convicts, Dec. Dig. § 5.*]

5. Convicts (§ 5*)—Crimes—Information—Description of Weapon.

In a prosecution under Pen. Code, § 246, providing that every person undergoing a life sentence in a state prison who, with malice aforethought, commits an assault "with a deadly weapon or instrument" is punishable with death, an allegation in the information that the assault was with a deadly weapon is sufficient, without specifying the nature of the weapon.

6. Criminal Law (§ 373*)—Assault with Deadly Weapon—Evidence—Information—Admissibility.

In a prosecution under Pen. Code, § 246, making an assault with a deadly weapon, by a person undergoing a life sentence, punishable by death, evidence is admissible to show the use of two weapons, and is not objectionable as tending to show the commission of two offenses, where the evidence showed only one assault in which both weapons were used.

7. Criminal Law (§ 678*)—Trial—Election as to Offense.

Where, in a prosecution for assault with a deadly weapon, the evidence tends to show one assault in which two weapons were used, such evidence does not tend to show two or more distinct offenses for each of which defendant might be prosecuted, and therefore the district attorney need not elect which of two offenses he would rely on as constituting the offense charged.

8. Criminal Law (§ 1167*)—Appeal and Error—Harmless Error—Variance.

In a prosecution under an information charging assault with a deadly weapon, evidence that the assault was committed with two weapons is not prejudicial variance.

9. Witnesses (§ 268*)—Cross-Examination.

In the prosecution of a person who, while undergoing a life sentence, committed an assault, one defense was insanity at the time of the alleged assault, and the warden of the prison in which defendant was confined testified as to the conditions surrounding defendant while the witness was warden; the object being to show such conditions as might produce insanity. He testified that during all of the time during which he was warden defendant was kept in solitary confinement in the incorrigible ward, and prohibited from communicating with others, and not permitted to receive visitors, that during a portion of the time he was deprived of his mattress, and at one time the permission to have reading matter was revoked. Held, that questions on cross-examination as to his reasons for depriving him of reading matter and his mattress, as well as for putting him on bread and water, were improper, as the state had no right to show by specific acts that defendant was incorrigible.

10. Criminal Law (§ 1170½*)—Appeal—Harmless Error—Admission of Evidence.

In a prosecution for assault with a deadly weapon by one who was undergoing a sentence of life imprisonment, it was admitted that defendant had been kept in solitary confinement in the incorrigible ward for more than eight years before committing the assault. Held, that improper cross-examination by the state of the warden of the penitentiary as to his reasons for depriving defendant of some of his privileges was harmless.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 3133; Dec. Dig. § 1170½.*]

11. Witnesses (§ 269*)—Cross-Examination.

In a prosecution for assault with a deadly weapon by one who was undergoing a life sentence, in which the defense was insanity, an employé at the prison, examined as a witness for defendant, testified that defendant was confined in the dungeon for a time, having been put there on the day of the assault, and subsequently was carried back to the incorrigible cells and put in a strait-jacket. Held, that testimony elicited on cross-examination that defendant had been placed in the dungeon shortly after his arrival at the prison, and remained there about a month or six weeks, and that subsequently he was again confined in the dungeon, was improper cross-examination.

12. Criminal Law (§ 1169*)—Appeal—Harmless Error—Admissibility of Evidence.

In a prosecution for an assault with a deadly weapon by one who was undergoing a life sentence, in which the defense was insanity, an employé of the prison testified on direct examination by defendant that defendant was confined in the dungeon on the day of the assault, and subsequently carried back to the incorrigible cells and put in a strait-jacket. Held, that the error in allowing the witness to testify on cross-examination that defendant had been placed in the dungeon after his arrival at the prison, and that on a subsequent occasion he had been placed in the dungeon for a month or six weeks, and on a third occasion was also placed in the dungeon, was harmless; it being admitted that defendant had been kept in solitary confinement in the incorrigible ward for more than eight years prior to the assault.

13. Criminal Law (§ 1170*)—Harmless Error—Rejection of Evidence.

Where, in a criminal prosecution of a convict for assault with a deadly weapon, the defense was insanity, and defendant's counsel was allowed full latitude in showing conversations between defendant and others, sustaining an objection to a question to a witness who testified to many conversations as to one conversation, which was not shown or claimed to be important, is not prejudicial error.

14. Criminal Law (§ 354*)—Insanity—Evidence.

In a prosecution in which the defense was insanity, an employé of the state prison in which defendant was incarcerated at the time he committed the offense testified that after the commission of the offense defendant was put in a strait-jacket. Held, that an objection was properly sustained to a subsequent question as to how long he remained in the strait-jacket, as evidence as to confinement subsequent to the commission of the assault is not evidence of the condition of defendant's mind at the time of the assault.

15. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 354*)—INSANITY—EVIDENCE.

In a prosecution for assault with a deadly weapon by defendant while undergoing a life sentence, in which the defense was insanity, there being evidence to show that defendant had been confined for a long time in the incorrigible cells, evidence by nonexperts as to whether some persons confined in the incorrigible cells had not become insane while so confined was inadmissible, as it was not intended to show by such witnesses anything more than the fact that one or two individuals became, in their opinion, insane while confined in those cells.

16. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 570*)—EVIDENCE—INSANITY—SUFFICIENCY.

Defendant, in order to show insanity, must show such insanity by a preponderance of evidence.

17. CONVICTS (§ 5*)—CRIMES—INSTRUCTIONS AS TO VERDICT—DEGREE OF OFFENSE.

In a prosecution under Pen. Code, § 246, making it an offense punishable with death for a person undergoing a life sentence in a state prison to commit an assault with a deadly weapon, it is not error for the court to refuse to charge that, if the evidence warranted it, other verdicts might be found than those of guilty of the offense charged and not guilty, and particularly of the verdict of guilty of the lessor offense, defined by section 245, of assault with a deadly weapon.

18. ASSAULT AND BATTERY (§ 96*)—ASSAULT WITH DEADLY WEAPON—INSTRUCTIONS.

Where the evidence showed that the assault was committed with a window weight and a knife, a requested instruction that the jury must acquit if there was a reasonable hypothesis deducible from the evidence that the person assaulted was struck by accident or mischance or inadvertence, without the intention of defendant, accompanying the act, was properly refused, as under such instruction, if the jury believed that the assault with the window weight was intentional, but were in doubt whether the cutting with the knife was intentional, they must acquit.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Assault and Battery, Dec. Dig. § 96.*]

19. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 829*)—TRIAL—INSTRUCTIONS ALREADY GIVEN.

Where the court has given clear and explicit instructions what the jury must find in the way of intention and malice before it could convict, a requested instruction that if the jury believed from the testimony that the person assaulted was injured by accident, and without evil design or intention or malice aforethought, they must acquit was properly refused.

20. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 829*)—TRIAL—REPETITION OF INSTRUCTIONS.

Where the subject-matter of requested instructions relating to the impeachment of witnesses and the powers and functions of the jury in the consideration of testimony are fully covered by the charge of the court, it is not error to refuse to give the requested instructions.

21. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 945*)—NEW TRIAL—NEWLY DISCOVERED EVIDENCE.

Where the showing as to newly discovered evidence is not sufficiently strong to render a different result of a new trial probable, the trial court did not err in refusing to grant a new trial.

22. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1158*)—SUSPENDING JUDGMENT—INSANITY OF ACCUSED.

Where the evidence of the insanity of accused at the time judgment is pronounced is not sufficiently strong to enable the appellate court to say that the conclusion of the trial court that he was sane was not fully warranted by the evidence, the refusal to suspend judgment until the question of his sanity could be submitted to a jury will not be disturbed.

23. CONSTITUTIONAL LAW (§ 70*)—DISTRIBUTION OF POWERS—ENCROACHMENT OF JUDICIARY ON LEGISLATURE.

The question whether the infliction of a punishment prescribed by a statute is too severe is a matter with which the trial courts have no concern.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Constitutional Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 129, 131; Dec. Dig. § 70.*]

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Marin County; Thos. J. Lennon, Judge.

Jacob Oppenheimer was convicted of assault with a deadly weapon while undergoing a life sentence in the state prison, and appeals. Affirmed.

G. C. Ringolsky, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., J. Charles Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

ANGELLOTTI, J. The defendant was informed against for committing an assault with a deadly weapon, with malice aforethought, while undergoing a life sentence in the California state prison at San Quentin, upon the person of one J. Wilson, a human being, being the crime defined by section 246 of the Penal Code, enacted in the year 1901. He was found guilty of the offense charged and adjudged to suffer death, as the section requires in such cases. He appeals from the judgment and from the order denying his motion for a new trial, and also from an order denying his motion to suspend judgment on the ground that he is insane. The last-named order was made prior to judgment, and is not an appealable order, but the action of the trial court in such matter is reviewable on the appeal from the judgment.

The defendant was undergoing a life sentence in the California state prison at San Quentin. He succeeded in escaping from the cell in which he had been incarcerated in solitary confinement for over eight years, and armed with a portion of an iron window weight, described as being one-half of such a weight, made his way to the general dining room of the prison. There he found Wilson, a fellow convict, one of whose duties was the cutting of bread for the prisoners. The knife used by Wilson was lying on the "bread counter" at the end of which he was standing. Defendant struck Wilson on the forehead with the window weight and immediately reached past him and picked up the knife. Wilson immediately grappled with him, and in the scuffle which ensued Wilson was cut in several places by the knife in defendant's hand. The defendant was finally overpowered and the weapon taken from him.

1. It is earnestly contended that section 246 of the Penal Code is unconstitutional. The validity of this statute has already been affirmed in three decisions of this court. People v. Finley, 153 Cal. 58, 94 Pac. 248; People v. Quijada, 154 Cal. 243, 97 Pac. 689, and People v. Carson, 155 Cal. 164, 99 Pac. 970. Counsel for defendant presents no additional ground for holding it to be violative of any provision of our state Constitution to those presented in the earlier cases that appears to us to be well based. The reasons for the previous rulings that persons undergoing life sentences constitute a class as to which the Legislature is authorized to make this particular provision are fully stated in People v. Finley, supra. It is urged here for the first time that the section is violative of section 6, art. 1, of our Constitution, prohibiting "cruel or unusual punishments." Whatever may be our views as to the policy of this section of the Penal Code, we are not warranted in saying as matter of law that the punishment of death for an assault with a deadly weapon with malice aforethought, by one undergoing a life sentence in a state prison is either "cruel" or "unusual" within the meaning of those terms as used in our Constitution. The infliction of the death penalty by any of the methods ordinarily adopted by civilized people, such as hanging, shooting, or electricity, is neither a cruel nor unusual punishment (see Re Kemmler, 136 U. S. 447, 10 Sup. Ct. 930, 34 L. Ed. 519), unless, perhaps, it be so disproportionate to the offense for which it is inflicted as to meet the disapproval and condemnation of the conscience and reason of men generally, "as to shock the moral sense of the people" (People v. Morris, 80 Mich. 634, 45 N. W. 591, 8 L. R. A. 685). In view of what is said in People v. Finley, supra, as to the reasons for such provision as to the class of persons affected thereby, we are of the opinion that no such conclusion can be reached in regard to the statute under consideration. The objection that the statute is violative of the fourteenth amendment of the Constitution of the United States, which has been held to be without foundation so far as this court is concerned, is involved in the Finley Case, which is now pending in the United States Supreme Court on writ of error. Pending the determination of that case by that court, the execution of other judgments pronounced under this section should and doubtless will be deferred, so that if this court is in error in its views as to the merits of this objection, the defendant will not be prejudiced thereby.

2. For the purpose of showing that the defendant was guilty of the offense defined by section 246 of the Penal Code, it was alleged in the information that at the time of the alleged assault he was undergoing a life sentence in the California state prison at San Quentin under and by virtue of a certain described judgment of the superior court of Sacramento county. It was essential, of course, to allege facts showing that defendant was then undergoing a life sentence, in order to state the public offense intended to be charged. On his arraignment he was allowed, at his own request, in addition to pleading not guilty of the offense charged, to admit that he had suffered the conviction alleged in the information. He now claims that, having admitted such "previous conviction" on his arraignment, the clerk of the court, in reading the information to the jury on the trial, should have omitted therefrom all that related thereto (subdivision 1, § 1093, Pen. Code), and that no evidence relating to the same should have been received on the trial. (section 1025, Pen. Code). The provisions of the Penal Code thus relied on by him have reference exclusively to those cases where a previous conviction of some other and distinct offense is alleged for the purpose of enabling the court to impose a greater punishment than is authorized for the offense charged when there is no prior conviction (see sections 666, 667, and 668, Pen. Code), and can have no application where the fact of the prior conviction is an essential element of the offense charged. By his general plea of not guilty in this case defendant necessarily put in issue all the allegations of facts essential to the offense, including the conviction upon which the judgment of life imprisonment was given, and his admission of that fact on his arraignment did not relieve the district attorney from the necessity of proving it on the trial. The record shows that he expressly refused to make any such admission on the trial.

3. The trial court allowed the district attorney to put in evidence for the purpose of showing this fact, not only the commitment of the defendant to the state prison, which is a certified copy of the judgment (Pen. Code, § 1213), but also the judgment roll in the action resulting in such judgment, except the instructions and charge of the court, thus including, in addition to a copy of the judgment, the information, a copy of the minutes of the plea or demurrer, and a copy of the minutes of the trial (Pen. Code, § 1207). This evidence was declared to be received solely for the purpose of showing a valid judgment under which defendant was undergoing a life sentence. Counsel for defendant claimed that the commitment alone was sufficient proof, and that the other papers were unnecessary. Assuming this to be true, we are at a loss to see how any of the other records admitted could have prejudiced defendant's cause. The commitment showed that he was informed against for the crime of murder, pleaded not guilty, was tried and convicted of murder of the second degree, and thereupon sentenced to imprisonment for his natural life. The other records admitted showed precisely the same thing and no more. There was absolutely nothing therein that could by any possibility have unfavorably affected his cause in the minds of the jurors, who were acquainted with the contents of the commitment. That the record of the commitment is admissible cannot be doubted. See People v. Finley, 153 Cal. 63, 94 Pac. 248.

4. The information failed to specify the nature of the deadly weapon with which the assault was alleged to have been committed, alleging simply that it was done with a "deadly weapon," which is the language of the statute. This was a sufficient allegation. People v. Perales, 141 Cal. 583, 75 Pac. 170. As we have seen, the evidence showed the use of two weapons by defendant, a window weight and a knife. Defendant objected to the evidence tending to show the use of two weapons, upon the ground that the district attorney was endeavoring to show two offenses, that he could prove only one, and that he must elect which he relied on for a conviction. We think it is manifest that there was but a single assault shown by this evidence, even though two weapons were used. The mere fact that two weapons are used does not necessarily show two assaults. If one unlawfully assails another with his two hands, first striking at him with one hand and immediately thereafter with the other, no one would say that there were two offenses. The offense would be the one unlawful attempt, coupled with a present ability, to commit a violent injury upon the other's person, and each effort, made in what constituted only the same attempt to accomplish this result, would constitute only a single element of that attempt. The same thing may be true where the assailant uses two or more weapons instead of only his two hands. In State v. McDonald, 67 Mo. 13, the assault was alleged to have been made with a pair of tongs, a hammer, and an axe, all of which were alleged to be deadly weapons, and the court very properly said that this was not charging two or more assaults in one count, but one continuous assault with several weapons, which was neither impossible nor improbable. See, also, 1 Wharton, Cr. Law, § 644. The evidence offered and received in this case tended to show one continuous transaction, one assault in which two weapons were used. It was not, therefore, a case where the evidence offered showed two or more distinct offenses for each of which the defendant might be prosecuted and suffer a conviction, as was the situation in People v. Williams, 133 Cal. 165, 65 Pac. 323, and People v. Castro, 133 Cal. 11, 65 Pac. 13, and, consequently, it was not a case for election by the district attorney as to which of two offenses against the law he would rely on as constituting the offense charged in the information. He was showing simply a single assault. Defendant's real ground of complaint, if he had one, was that there was a variance between the charge and the proof, in that by the charge the assault was one made with "a" deadly weapon, while by the proof it was one made with two deadly weapons. If the district attorney had alleged the assault to have been committed with the two weapons, there could have been no ground of complaint whatever. State v. McDonald, supra. But the variance was clearly not of such a nature as to mislead or prejudice the defendant in the slightest degree in making his defense, and is one of those mere technicalities not affecting any substantial right that we must disregard. Possibly the defendant, if requesting it, would have been entitled to an instruction that the jury before they could convict must all agree upon at least one specific weapon of the two as constituting a "deadly weapon" with which defendant assaulted Wilson, but no such instruction was requested, and we need not definitely decide the point. It does not appear to have been questioned that the iron window weight was a deadly weapon, and there could hardly be a question, in view of the evidence, that defendant was guilty of an assault with that weapon, if he was not incapable of committing an assault by reason of insanity.

The case of People v. Garcia, 58 Cal. 102, is not at all in point. The information in that case had been made to charge two separate assaults as clearly as could be, and it was very properly held that the demurrer on that ground should have been sustained.

5. One of the defenses was that the defendant was insane at the time of the alleged assault. Mr. John W. Tompkins, warden of the prison from September 1, 1903, to February 1, 1906, was called as a witness for defendant, and testified solely to the condition of life surrounding defendant during his incumbency of the office of warden, the object clearly being to show such conditions as might produce insanity. He testified that during all of said time defendant was kept in solitary confinement in one of the small cells in the incorrigible ward, the purpose of which was to incarcerate men supposed to be beyond control, that he was prohibited from communicating with others, and not permitted to receive visitors. He further said that during a portion of the time defendant had a mattress to sleep on, but by his order he was deprived of it for a few months, and also that at one time he allowed him to have reading matter, and then revoked that permission. On cross-examination he was required to testify as to statements made by him to defendant as to his reasons for depriving him of reading matter and mattress, as well as for punishing him by putting him on bread and water for a time, those statements being in substance that he had used the leaves of magazines for the purpose of injuring jail property, that he had used the mattress for the purpose of secreting implements that he had no business to have, and that he had cut a hole through the partition in his cell into the adjoining cell. All this was clearly improper cross-examination. There was nothing in the direct examination warranting any such inquiry. The theory of the learned Attorney General that the tendency of the evidence given on direct examination was to show that defendant had been deprived of mattress and reading matter because it was thought he was insane, and it was feared that he might harm himself by means thereof, and it was therefore proper to show on cross-examination that he was deprived of these privileges by way of punishment, and thus rebut the inference that the officers believed him to be insane, is very farfetched and obviously unsound. What the theory of the district attorney was in asking these questions we do not know. Of course, under elementary principles, he had no right to show that the defendant had been guilty of specific acts of misconduct which showed him to be incorrigible. But under the peculiar circumstances of this case we cannot assume that defendant may have been prejudiced by this evidence. It was one of the admitted facts of this case, in truth the very basis of the defense of insanity, that defendant had been kept in solitary confinement in the incorrigible ward for more than eight years, and there could not have been any more convincing evidence than this as to the opinion of the prison officials that he was incorrigible and absolutely beyond control. The objectionable testimony given by Warden Tompkins could not in the nature of things have added one iota to the knowledge of the jury in this respect. Its admission must be regarded, therefore, as error without prejudice.

6. Captain of the Guard Randolph was examined as a witness for defendant, and on his direct examination testified that defendant was confined in the dungeon for a time, having been put there the day of the assault on Wilson, and subsequently was carried back to the incorrigible cells and put in a strait-jacket. On cross-examination he was allowed, without objection, to testify that defendant had been placed in the dungeon shortly after his arrival at the prison, February 1, 1899. A question asked the witness why defendant was placed in the dungeon on that occasion was not answered, the witness having no actual knowledge of the reason. Further, without objection, Captain Randolph testified that defendant remained in the dungeon on that occasion about a month or six weeks. Over objection, he was allowed to testify that in June of the same year he was again confined in the dungeon for a brief period, but the court very properly struck out the statement of the witness that defendant at that time "got in trouble again." We are of the opinion that the whole of this cross-examination was improper, but for the reasons given in discussing the cross-examination of Mr. Tompkins, we are satisfied that so much of it as was objected to was in no way prejudicial.

7. The trial court allowed defendant's counsel full latitude in the matter of showing conversations between defendant and others for the purpose of showing insanity, and there can be no question, in the light of the record, that counsel fully understood that the ruling of the court was that he was at liberty to introduce in evidence any conversation upon which he relied in that behalf. Testimony of conversations given by witnesses for defendant take up many pages of the record. But the court did sustain an objection to a question asked the witness Hammel, who had already testified to numerous conversations and subsequently testified to many more, as to a conversation with defendant relative to the probable disposition of his case by the board of prison directors, and this is urged as prejudicial error. There was no specific claim made in the trial court that this particular proposed evidence was important as tending to show any insanity, and counsel was allowed at once to proceed with his examination as to all conversations claimed by him to tend to show delusions or insanity of any kind. He fully understood the views of the trial court in that behalf, and that he would be allowed to show any conversation he relied on in that regard. The record warrants us in assuming that this particular conversation was of no importance.

8. Captain Randolph, having testified on his direct examination by defendant that, after the assault on Wilson, defendant was put in a strait-jacket, was asked by defendant, "How long did he remain in the strait-jacket?" The trial court sustained an objection to this question. The ruling was correct. It is true, as urged by counsel for defendant, that acts and declarations of a person subsequent to a certain time are admissible on the question of his sanity at such time, but that was not what the question called for. The fact that he was confined by others in a strait-jacket prior to the assault might be legitimate evidence tending to show insanity at the time of the subsequent assault, but such confinement subsequent to the assault could shed no light upon the question of his condition of mind at the time of such prior assault.

9. Warden Tompkins and Mr. McGuire, called as witnesses for defendant, were both asked questions as to whether some persons confined in the incorrigible cells had not become insane while so confined. Objections to these questions were properly sustained. Defendant was allowed to show very fully the condition and mode of life of those so confined, and to introduce the evidence of experts as to the probable effect on the mind as to such conditions and mode of life. There was no pretense that it was intended to show by these nonexpert witnesses anything more than the mere fact that one or two individuals became, in their opinion, insane while so confined. This was clearly irrelevant and immaterial on the issue of defendant's sanity.

10. Read in connection with the context, the instruction to the jury that, "if upon the whole testimony there results to you nothing more than a mere doubt as to whether or not he was insane, you must, in that event, resolve such doubt upon the question of his insanity against him" could not have been misleading, though it might well have been omitted, for taken by itself it is, perhaps not strictly and literally correct. But what it clearly meant, and what the jury would necessarily understand it as meaning, in the light of the context, was that, under the rule in force in this state the defendant, in order to show insanity, must do something more than create a mere doubt as to his sanity, viz., must show such insanity by a preponderance of evidence. People v. Willard, 150 Cal. 543, 89 Pac. 124. The jury was very clearly and explicitly instructed as to what was meant by the term "preponderance of evidence," and also that if, on the whole case, a preponderance of evidence was that he was insane at the time of the alleged assault, they must find him not guilty by reason of insanity.

11. Complaint is made of the refusal of the court to instruct the jury that they might if the evidence warranted it, find other verdicts than those of guilty of the offense charged and not guilty, and particularly of a verdict of guilty of the lesser offense defined by section 245 of the Penal Code, the ordinary offense of an assault with a deadly weapon. A similar complaint was made in People v. Carson, supra, and held untenable. The matter was learnedly and elaborately discussed in that case. We see no reason to recede from the views there expressed.

12. Complaint is made of the refusal of the trial court to give two requested instructions, numbered 9 and 23. Requested instruction 9 was clearly erroneous, in that it would have advised the jury that they must acquit if there was a reasonable hypothesis deducible from the evidence to the effect that Wilson was hit or struck by accident or mischance or inadvertence, without the intention of the defendant accompanying the act. In other words, if the jury was satisfied beyond all reasonable doubt that the blow with the window weight was intentionally and deliberately inflicted, but were in doubt on the question whether the cutting with the knife was accidental and not intended, they must acquit. This, of course, would not have been a correct statement of the law applicable to the facts. Requested instruction 23 was substantially that if the jury believed from the testimony that Wilson was injured by accident, and without evil design or intention or malice aforethought, they must acquit. In view of the clear and explicit instructions given by the court as to what the jury must find in the way of intention and malice aforethought before it could convict, it is clear that the refusal to give this instruction could not have affected defendant's substantial rights, and cannot be considered an error warranting a reversal, if, indeed, it can be considered an error at all.

13. The subject-matter of requested instructions 24 and 25, relating to the impeachment of witnesses and the powers and functions of the jury in the consideration of testimony, was fully and correctly covered by the charge of the court.

14. It cannot be held that the trial court erred in refusing to grant a new trial on the ground of newly discovered evidence on the question of insanity. The showing in that behalf was not such as to warrant us in holding that the trial judge erred in concluding that the newly discovered evidence was not sufficiently strong to render a different result probable. People v. Buckley, 143 Cal. 392, 77 Pac. 169.

15. The trial judge was clearly enough without any doubt as to the sanity of the defendant at the time judgment was pronounced. We cannot say that this state of mind on his part was not fully warranted by the evidence before him and the appearance and conduct of the defendant, and therefore cannot hold that he erred in refusing to suspend judgment until the question of his sanity could be submitted to a jury.

As requested by counsel for defendant, we have carefully examined the whole record, and find nothing therein warranting a reversal. Under the circumstances of this case the penalty of death may seem exceedingly severe, but that is a matter with which neither the trial court nor this court has anything to do. It is the penalty fixed by the Legislature for the offense of which defendant has been convicted.

The judgment and order denying a new trial are affirmed.

BECHTEL v. CHASE. (L. A. 2,429.)

1. Action (§ 28*)—Waiver of Tort—Nature of Transaction—Fraud.

Where the holder of an undivided interest in the notes of a corporation in financial difficulties was induced by decedent's false representations, as president, to surrender the same and to accept, in lieu thereof, stock at par in a new corporation formed to take over the old corporation's assets and business, such transaction did not constitute a sale of plaintiff's interest in the notes to decedent on the theory that plaintiff could waive the fraud and recover against decedent's estate in assumpsit.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Action, Cent. Dig. §§ 196–198; Dec. Dig. § 28.*]

2. Fraud (§ 31*)—Remedies.

Where plaintiff was induced by decedent, the president of a corporation, to surrender his interest in certain notes of the corporation in exchange for worthless stock of another corporation organized to take over the debtor's business and assets, plaintiff could rescind the transaction and recover the notes, or he might sue for damages sustained by the deceit and recover the value which the stock would have had if the representations had been true.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Fraud, Cent. Dig. § 27; Dec. Dig. § 31.*]

3. Exchange of Property (§ 10*)—Fraud—Effect—Remedies.

That an exchange of personal property was induced by fraud did not constitute proof that the property surrendered was sold to the wrongdoer for an agreed sum.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Exchange of Property, Cent. Dig. §§ 19, 24; Dec. Dig. § 10.*]

4. Action (§ 28*)—Tort—Waiver—Assumpsit.

The rule that one whose goods are wrongfully taken and used by another may waive the tort and sue in assumpsit for their value as for goods sold and delivered does not apply, where plaintiff has voluntarily parted with his property in exchange for something received by him in return.

5. Pleading (§ 237*)—Variance—Amendment to Conform to Proof.

Where the cause of action alleged was based on a claim, filed with the administrator of decedent's estate, for the purchase price of an interest in certain notes, and alleged that decedent promised to pay therefor the sum of $7,550, while the proof showed that decedent fraudulently induced plaintiff to exchange his interest in the notes for preferred stock in a corporation, plaintiff could not amend the complaint to conform to the proof and recover damages for the fraud.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Pleading, Cent. Dig. §§ 608, 609; Dec. Dig. § 237.*]

6. Executors and Administrators (§ 229*)—Claims—Actions—Conformity to Claim Presented.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1500, providing that no holder of any claim against an estate shall maintain any action thereon unless the claim is first presented to the executor or administrator, except in certain specified cases, an action against a decedent's estate on a rejected claim could not be maintained on any other cause of action than the one set up in the claim which had been presented and rejected.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Executors and Administrators, Cent. Dig. § 827; Dec. Dig. § 229.*]

7. Appeal and Error (§ 1028*)—Review—Prejudice.

Where a judgment for defendant was the only one that could properly be rendered on the facts alleged, errors committed at the trial were not prejudicial to plaintiff.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 4034; Dec. Dig. § 1028.*]

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Riverside County; B. F. Bledsoe, Judge.

Action by Luke D. Bechtel against Lucius K. Chase, administrator with the will annexed of the estate of Charles D. Foster, deceased. From an order denying plaintiff's motion for a new trial after verdict for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

William F. Palmer, Luke D. Bechtel, and Palmer & Mahan, for appellant. Lafayette Gill and Louis W. Myers, for respondent.

SLOSS, J. This action was brought against the administrator with the will annexed of the estate of Charles D. Foster, deceased, to recover from said estate the sum of $7,550, principal, and interest thereon from January 1, 1904, at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum.

The complaint states plaintiff's case in three counts or causes of action. While these vary somewhat in phraseology, all are based upon the same transaction. The first is in the form of a common count, alleging that the estate of Charles D. Foster, deceased, is indebted to plaintiff in the sum of $7,550, with interest from the 1st day of January, 1904, for goods, wares, merchandise, bills of exchange, promissory notes, stocks, and choses in action sold, furnished, and delivered by plaintiff to decedent, at decedent's special instance and request, in decedent's lifetime. The second alleges that on the 24th day of August, 1896, Charles D. Foster, the decedent, purchased of and from the plaintiff the undivided $^{151}/_{316}$ of two promissory notes of the Northern Investment Company of Kentucky at and for the price of $7,550, and agreed to pay interest on said purchase price at the rate of 6 per centum per annum from said date until paid; that pursuant to said agreement plaintiff delivered to said decedent the said undivided interest in said notes; and that no part of the purchase price except interest to January 1, 1904, has been paid. The third count alleges that on the 24th day of August, 1896, the plaintiff was the owner of $^{151}/_{316}$ of two certain promissory notes of the Northern Investment Company of Kentucky; that on said day plaintiff sold his said undivided interest in said notes to said Charles D. Foster at and for the price of $7,550 to be paid on demand with 6 per centum per annum interest payable semiannually. The delivery of the notes and plaintiff's interest therein and the nonpayment by Foster of any part of the amount due except interest to January 1, 1904, are alleged as in the second count.

All three counts contain the necessary allegations regarding the death of Foster, the admission of his will to probate in the county of Suffolk, in the commonwealth of Massachusetts, in which Foster had resided, the subsequent admission of said will to probate in the county of Riverside in this state, and the appointment of the defendant Chase as administrator with the will annexed. Each count also alleges the presentation to the said administrator and the rejection by him of plaintiff's claim as creditor. This claim stated plaintiff's demand as follows:

"Estate of Charles D. Foster to Luke D. Bechtel, of Los Angeles, Dr.

Aug. 24, 1896. To purchase price of $^{151}/_{316}$ interest in two promissory notes of the Northern Investment Co. of Kentucky, obligor..........	$7,550 00
April 17, 1906. To interest accumulated on the above purchase price at six per cent. per annum from date of sales payable semiannually * * * from January 1st, 1904, to April 17th, 1906 (previous accumulations of interest having heretofore been paid by the decedent in his lifetime)	1,096 30
Total	$8,646 30

"The said Charles D. Foster promised to pay the said sum of seven thousand five hundred and fifty ($7,550.00) dollars, amounting on April 17th, 1906, principal and interest, to eight thousand six hundred forty-six & $^{30}/_{100}$ ($8,646.30) dollars."

The answer makes no denial of the admission of the will to probate, of the appointment of the administrator, or of the presentation and rejection of the claim as alleged. The other material allegations of the complaint are denied. The case was tried before a jury which returned a verdict in favor of the defendant. Judgment was entered upon this verdict, and plaintiff subsequently moved for a new trial. His motion was denied, and he now appeals from the order denying said motion.

As will be seen from the above statement of the pleadings, the action is, as to each count of the complaint, one to recover the purchase price of personal property alleged to have been sold for a stated price and delivered. The actual transaction between the parties was, however, something very different from such sale. Taking the evidence in the light most favorable to the appellant's claim, it may be said to have disclosed substantially the following state of facts: The Northern Investment Company was a corporation organized under the laws of Kentucky. It had executed certain promissory notes, some of which were owned and held by the plaintiff and one Grubb; plaintiff's interest in said notes being $^{151}/_{316}$. The Northern Investment Company became involved in financial difficulties, and Foster, who was its president, undertook a scheme of reorganization. A new corporation, the Mercantile Realty Company, was to be formed to take over the property of the Northern Investment Company. Holders of notes of the Northern Investment Company were requested to surrender their notes and take in exchange therefor preferred stock of the Mercantile Realty Company at par. Letters urging the plaintiff to surrender his notes and accept stock of the Mercantile Realty Company upon this basis were written by Foster, and plaintiff finally consented to make the exchange. He surrendered his Northern Investment Company notes to Foster and received in exchange preferred stock of the Mercantile Realty Company of the par value of $7,550, together with $6.68 in cash; the total, $7,556.68, representing the amount then due on plaintiff's interest in the notes. We may assume for the purposes of this discussion that the evidence supports the plaintiff's contentions that the agreement in question was made by Foster personally and not on behalf of the Mercantile Realty Company; that Foster falsely and fraudulently represented to plaintiff that the preferred stock of the Mercantile Realty Company was worth its par value; and that the plaintiff believed these fraudulent representations and entered into the agreement in reliance upon them; and, further, that the said stock was in fact worthless.

So assuming, it may be conceded that plaintiff had a right of action against Foster for any damage sustained by reason of the fraud practiced upon him. But we are entirely unable to see how the circumstances above detailed could be held to constitute a sale by Bechtel to Foster of the notes of the Northern Investment Company for $7,550. The transaction was not a sale of the notes for an agreed price, but was one whereby the notes were transferred in consideration of the issue to plaintiff of preferred stock in the corporation. The plaintiff might proceed in any one of various ways to seek relief for the fraud practiced upon him in inducing him to exchange his notes for worthless stock. He might rescind the transaction and recover the notes which he had been induced to turn over; he might perhaps, treating the transfer of the notes as void, recover them or their value without rescission. Wendling Lumber Co. v. Glenwood Lumber Co., 153 Cal. 411, 95 Pac. 1030. He might bring an action for the deceit practiced upon him and recover such damage as he could show to have been suffered by him. In such last-mentioned action the measure of recovery might be the same as that here sought, i. e., the value which the preferred stock would have had if the false representations made with regard to it had been true. Cruess v. Fessler, 39 Cal. 336; Spreckels v. Gorrill, 152 Cal. 383, 92 Pac.

1011. But on no possible theory can it be said that the fact that an exchange of property was induced by a fraud would amount to proof that the property surrendered was sold to the wrongdoer for an agreed sum of money.

The plaintiff seeks to bring the case within the rule that, where personal property is wrongfully converted, the injured party may "waive the tort and sue in assumpsit." In many jurisdictions this doctrine is limited to cases where the wrongdoer has sold the property or otherwise converted it into money, in which event the plaintiff may maintain an action for the proceeds. 4 Cyc. 332. In this state, however, as in a number of others, a broader rule enables one whose goods are wrongfully taken and used by another to sue in assumpsit for their value as for goods sold and delivered. Roberts v. Evans, 43 Cal. 380; Lehmann v. Schmidt, 87 Cal. 15, 25 Pac. 161; Chittenden v. Pratt, 89 Cal. 178, 26 Pac. 626. But the application of this rule, even in its more liberal form, cannot be extended to a case where plaintiff has voluntarily parted with his property in exchange for something received by him in return. The very basis of the "waiver of tort" is that plaintiff consents to the taking of his property and affirms the act of the wrongdoer. He treats it as a sale, and recovers the value, due him under an implied contract of sale. But where he has actually agreed to an exchange, which is executed, his affirmance of the transaction is an affirmance of it as a whole. Having parted with his property for an agreed consideration, he cannot, while relying upon his transfer as one made pursuant to contract, hold the defendant to the payment of any other consideration than the one agreed upon. No contract will be implied by the law as against an express contract not disavowed by either party. So long as plaintiff treats the transfer of the notes to Foster as valid, his only remedy for the fraud alleged by him is by means of an action in tort to recover damages therefor.

We have up to this point discussed the case as if it were merely one of variance between the pleadings and the proof. If this were all, it might be said that the plaintiff should be allowed to amend his complaint to conform to the case made by him. An amendment of the complaint, however, would be of no avail. The action is one upon a claim presented to an administrator. The claim itself is one for the purchase price of an interest in the two notes, and alleges that decedent promised to pay the sum of $7,550. It is thoroughly settled in this state that in an action against the estate of a decedent upon a rejected claim the plaintiff cannot recover upon any other cause of action than the one set up in the claim which has been presented and rejected. Code Civ. Proc. § 1500; Lichtenberg v. McGlynn, 105 Cal. 45, 38 Pac. 541; McGrath v. Carroll, 110 Cal. 79, 42 Pac. 466; Barthe v. Rogers, 127 Cal. 52, 59 Pac. 310; Etchas v. Orena, 127 Cal. 588, 60 Pac. 45; Brooks v. Lawson, 136 Cal. 10, 68 Pac. 97; Morehouse v. Morehouse, 140 Cal. 88, 73 Pac. 738; Morse v. Steele, 149 Cal. 303, 86 Pac. 693.

In this action, therefore, it would be impossible for the plaintiff, under any form of pleading, to recover except by showing facts which would justify a finding that he had sold to Foster an interest in the promissory notes for the price of $7,550. The case made by the plaintiff in the court below proves conclusively that he has no such cause of action and cannot establish one. If a new trial were granted, the result would necessarily be the same as that already reached. Under these circumstances, it is useless to consider the alleged errors of the trial court in admitting or rejecting evidence or in instructing the jury. From the facts appearing it is perfectly clear that, regardless of the rulings complained of, a judgment for the defendant was the only one that could properly be rendered. The alleged errors could not, therefore, have been prejudicial. Robinson v. W. P. R. R. Co., 48 Cal. 424; Hughes v. Wheeler, 76 Cal. 230, 18 Pac. 386; Foster v. Carr, 135 Cal. 83, 67 Pac. 43; Hamlin v. Pacific Electric Ry. Co., 150 Cal. 776, 89 Pac. 1109.

The order denying a new trial is affirmed.

HALE et al. v. SAN BERNARDINO VALLEY TRACTION CO. (L. A. 2,382.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 11, 1909. Rehearing Denied Jan. 10, 1910.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1004*)—REVIEW—DAMAGES.

A verdict for damages will not be disturbed as excessive on appeal, unless it is so plainly and outrageously excessive as to suggest, at the first blush, passion, prejudice, or corruption of the jury.

2. DEATH (§ 99*)—EXCESSIVE DAMAGES.

Decedent was 26 years old at his death. He was employed in a hardware store at a salary of $75 a month, had the full confidence of his employers, and was considered well acquainted with the hardware business for one of his experience. Held, that in an action by his widow and child for his death, a judgment for $12,000 will not be reversed as excessive.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Death, Cent. Dig. §§ 125-130; Dec. Dig. § 99.*]

3. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 972*)—ARGUMENT OF COUNSEL—SCOPE—DISCRETION OF COURT.

As to the scope of counsel's argument, much must be left to the discretion of the trial court; the judge hearing the argument, seeing the manner of its delivery, observing any outward manifestation upon the jury, being able to determine whether it is unfair and prejudicial much better than can the appellate court.

4. Trial (§ 125*)—Argument of Counsel—Appeal to Sympathy.

In determining the loss to the widow and infant child from the death of the husband and father, the jury may determine the loss of the society, comfort, care, and protection of decedent, as well as of his support, and hence plaintiff's counsel could address the jury upon that question, and picture to the imagination the probable pecuniary privations of the widow and child, and statements that a railroad company viewed the death of a person as a business proposition, and estimated a life as not very valuable; that the widow and children of the person killed realized what the man was worth; that they suffered the loss of his society and support, and felt what they had lost; that they might, because of that loss, have to struggle against adversity in a cold world. and that the widow might even have to work at the washtub to earn a living for herself and child; and that the railroad company "goes on just the same" —and asking the jurors to imagine their own wives and families deprived of their only hope and support, was not objectionable.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 303–307; Dec. Dig. § 125.*]

5. Appeal and Error (§ 207*)—Review—Argument of Counsel—Failure to Preserve Objection.

In a death action, the complaint alleged that defendant's car in which decedent was riding when killed was carelessly, negligently, and recklessly operated, and caused to strike another car, thereby causing decedent's death, and the answer admitted that the collision mentioned was caused by the negligence of the motorman in charge of the car, and then stated, "Except as herein admitted, said defendant denies that the said accident was caused or occasioned by any fault or negligence on its part," and during the opening statement defendant's counsel objected to plaintiff's counsel stating how the accident occurred, on the ground that there was no issue presented by the answer on the question of defendant's liability. Held, that the form of the answer, in connection with the remark of defendant's attorney, left the extent of admission in doubt, if it did not go so far as to concede the recklessness of defendant's employés, and, if counsel desired to claim that the denial was broad enough to include the averment of recklessness, he should have called the attention of the court and the opposing counsel to the point; and, there being nothing to show that plaintiff's counsel was not acting in good faith, or that he purposely misstated the admission, and defendant's attorney merely excepting to the remark, but not asking the court to caution the jury, nor referring to the pleadings in any way, nor asking any instruction as to the alleged misstatement, and it not appearing that the jury was not properly instructed in regard to it, the point cannot be considered on appeal.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, San Bernardino County; Frank F. Oster, Judge.

Action by Daisy A. Hale and others against the San Bernardino Valley Traction Company. From a judgment for plaintiffs and an order denying a new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Gibson, Trask, Dunn & Crutcher and Leonard & Surr, for appellant. Chas. L. Allison and Frank B. Daley, for respondents.

SHAW, J. This is an action by the widow and child of Edward A. Hale, deceased, to recover damages for his death, which was caused by the negligence of the defendant. The answer admitted that the death of Hale was caused by the defendant's negligence, and denied only the damages. The amount of damages was the sole issue of fact to be determined. The jury returned a verdict for $12,000 as damages, and judgment was rendered accordingly. The defendant moved for a new trial, on the grounds, first, that the damages allowed were excessive; and, second, that plaintiffs' attorneys were guilty of misconduct in their addresses to the jury. The motion was denied. The defendant appeals from the order and from the judgment.

1. The deceased was 26 years of age at the time of his death. He was in good health, and of sound constitution, and his expectancy of life at that age was 38 years. He was sober, industrious, and economical, had always been a man of good habits, of unquestioned honesty and integrity, devoted to his wife and child, affable and of kindly disposition, one who easily made friends and kept them. At the age of 19 he began work in the city of San Bernardino as salesman in the cigar and magazine business, where he continued 2 years. He then became a general clerk in a hardware store, intending to learn the business, and remained in that business until his death. His wages at first were $50 a month. They were raised to $65, and then to $75 a month, which amount he was receiving at his death. He was married 4 years before his death. As a clerk he paid strict attention to his business, and had the full confidence of his employers and was considered very well acquainted with the hardware business for one of his experience. The trial court considered the question of excessive damages, and concluded that the sum allowed was not unreasonable. The amount of damages in such cases is committed, first, to the sound discretion of the jury, and next to the discretion of the judge of the trial court, who, in ruling upon the motion for new trial, may consider the evidence anew, determine anew the facts, and set aside the verdict if it is not just. Upon appeal, the decision of the trial court and jury on the subject cannot be set aside unless the verdict is "so plainly and outrageously excessive as to suggest, at the first blush, passion or prejudice or corruption on the part of the jury." Aldrich v. Palmer, 24 Cal. 516; Wheaton v. N. B. & M. R. R. Co., 36 Cal. 591; Lee v. S. P. Co., 101 Cal. 118, 35 Pac. 572; Howland v. Oakland, etc., Co., 110 Cal. 523, 42 Pac. 983; Swain v. Fourteenth St. Co., 93 Cal. 185, 28

Pac. 829. The financial loss which the death of a man of the age, character, capacity, and disposition of the deceased might reasonably be expected to entail upon his wife and infant child is not so manifestly insignificant as to bring one inevitably to the conclusion that $12,000 could not have been given, except under the influence of passion or prejudice. We cannot interfere in the case at bar on the ground of excessive damages.

2. We do not think the arguments of appellant's counsel were so grossly unfair or improper as to require this court to reverse the ruling of the trial court to the contrary. Upon such questions much must be left to the discretion of that court. The judge who tries the cause below hears the argument, sees the manner of its delivery, observes any outward manifestation of its effect upon the jury, and can determine whether it is unfair and prejudicial in the particular case much better than can this court upon the bare printed record. The arguments complained of, for the most part, consisted of statements to the effect that a railroad company viewed the death of a person for which it was liable in damages as a business proposition, and estimated the life as not very valuable; that the widow and children of the person killed realized what the man was worth; that they suffered the loss of his society and support, and felt what they had lost; that they might because of that loss, have to struggle against adversity in a cold world; and that the widow might even have to work at the washtub to earn a living for herself and child. And this was contrasted with the statement that the railroad company "goes on just the same." The jurors were asked to imagine their own wives and families thus deprived of their only hope and support. There were descriptive adjectives added to this account of the widow's possible condition that may have added to its effect. It has been frequently held that, in determining the financial loss to the widow and infant child, resulting from the death of the husband and father, the jury may consider the financial loss accruing from the deprivation of the society, comfort, care, and protection of the deceased, as well as of his support. Beeson v. Green, etc., Co., 57 Cal. 37; Munro v. Pacific, etc., Co., 84 Cal. 525, 24 Pac. 303, 18 Am. St. Rep. 248; Pepper v. S. P., 105 Cal. 402, 38 Pac. 974; Harrison v. Sutter Co., 116 Cal. 169, 47 Pac. 1019; Dyas v. S. P. Co., 140 Cal. 308, 73 Pac. 972; Quill v. S. P. Co., 140 Cal. 273, 73 Pac. 991. The plaintiffs' counsel had the right to address the jury upon this question, and in doing so to picture to the imagination the probable pecuniary privations and condition of the bereaved widow and child resulting from the absence of the supporting care and protection of the deceased. Unless the right of argument is to be restricted to a much greater degree than has been heretofore considered necessary or advisable, there can be no just complaint of the argument we have stated. It seems to have been directed to the question at issue, and to have been confined to the elements of damage allowed by law.

In another part of his argument plaintiffs' counsel, speaking of the admissions of the answer, said "They have confessed to you that they and their agents and employés did in a reckless, in a careless, and in a negligent, manner deprive Edward A. Hale of his life." The complaint alleged that the defendant's car in which deceased was riding "was carelessly, negligently, and recklessly operated, and was carelessly, negligently and recklessly" caused to strike another car, thereby causing Hale's death. The answer admitted that the collision mentioned was caused "by the negligence of the motorman in charge of defendant's car," and then stated: "Except as herein admitted, said defendant denies that the said accident was caused or occasioned by any fault or negligence upon its part." During the plaintiffs' opening statement defendant's counsel objected to the plaintiffs' counsel stating how the accident occurred, on the ground "that there was no issue presented by the answer on the question of the liability of the defendant." If there was an admission that the collision in which the deceased was killed was caused by the reckless conduct of the employés of the defendant, of course there could be no misconduct of the plaintiffs' counsel in stating that admission to the jury. The form of the answer, in connection with the above remark of the attorney for the defendant at the opening of the trial, certainly left the extent of the admission in doubt, if it did not go so far as to concede the recklessness of the defendant's employés. Under these conditions, if counsel desired to claim that the denial was broad enough to include the averment of recklessness, he should have called the attention of the court and opposing counsel to the point. There is nothing to show that plaintiffs' counsel was not acting in good faith, or that he was purposely misstating the admission. The attorney for the defendant merely "excepted" to the remark, neither asking the intervention of the court to caution the jury, nor referring to the pleadings in any way. It does not appear that he asked any instruction on the subject of the alleged misstatement, nor that the jury was not properly instructed in regard to it. In view of all the facts, we do not think the point should be considered on appeal.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

Under Municipal Corporation Act (St. 1883, p. 269, c. 49) § 862, authorizing trustees of cities of the sixth class to permit the laying of street railroad tracks, etc., under such restrictions as they deem proper, a city cannot exact from the grantee of a franchise to lay tracks, etc., an undertaking conditioned on the completion of the road between outlying towns and through the city within a certain time, since the grant, being legislative in character, could have no extraterritorial effect.

5. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 244*)—IRREGULAR CONTRACT—BENEFITS—ESTOPPEL.

A party contracting with a city regarding a subject-matter within the scope of the city's power may, where he has received the benefit of the contract, be precluded from asserting that the contract was not on the part of the city executed in the manner required by law.

6. STREET RAILROADS (§ 24*) — GRANT OF FRANCHISE—VOID CONDITIONS — ESTOPPEL.

Where, under Municipal Corporation Act (St. 1883, p. 269, c. 49) § 862, a city grants a franchise for a street railroad, and exacts from the grantee an undertaking which is void because the condition has an extraterritorial effect, the grantee is not estopped to assert the invalidity of the undertaking, since the undertaking was one without the scope of the city's power to exact.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Humboldt County; G. W. Hunter, Judge.

Action by the City of Arcata against J. E. Green and others. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

A. J. Monroe, for appellant. Coonan & Kehoe, for respondents.

SLOSS, J. The city of Arcata, a municipal corporation of the sixth class, seeks by this action to recover the sum of $5,000 on a bond or undertaking executed by the defendants Green and O'Brien as principals and the defendants Bull and Bair as sureties. A demurrer to the amended complaint having been sustained, the plaintiff declined to further amend, and appeals from the ensuing judgment in favor of defendants.

The amended complaint discloses these facts. In February, 1905, the board of trustees of the city of Arcata granted to Green and O'Brien the right to construct, maintain, and operate a single track electric railroad within and through the city of Arcata over certain streets by a route described. Section 2 of the ordinance declares that the grant is made upon certain conditions, relating to the manner of construction, the location of tracks, the maintenance of a portion of the street pavements by the grantees, the placing of poles and wires, equipment and operation of cars, and like matters. One of the conditions is that "all cars shall stop at street crossings whenever signalled by persons desiring to board or alight therefrom subject to regulations of the board of trustees." Section 5 provides that "the above rights and privileges are granted upon the express conditions that the work of constructing and fully equipping an electric railroad between the city of Eureka and the city of Arcata in said county of Humboldt, shall be commenced within nine months after the passage of this ordinance and the same completed and in operation between said Eureka and Arcata and through Arcata, within two years after the passage of this ordinance. * * *" By the terms of section 6, "the franchise and rights herein set forth are granted upon the express condition and consideration that said grantees shall, within the time hereinafter expressed (i. e., thirty days), make, execute and deliver to said city of Arcata, an undertaking in the penal sum of five thousand dollars, * * * conditioned that if said grantees shall commence the work of constructing and equipping said railroad, and shall complete the same within the time and according to the provisions expressed in section 5 of this ordinance, then said undertaking to be of no effect; but that if they fail to commence said work and complete the same as expressed in said section 5, that they will forfeit and pay to said city of Arcata as liquidated damages the said sum of $5,000." Section 7 requires the grantees, within 30 days, to file with the city clerk their written acceptance of the franchise and the conditions, and also within said time to file their undertaking. It is provided in section 12 that "nothing in this franchise shall be construed in any way to give said Messrs. Green and O'Brien, their heirs, executors and assigns, a franchise to maintain and conduct a street railroad within the limits of the said city of Arcata." Within 30 days after the adoption of the ordinance, the grantees filed with the clerk of the board their written acceptance of the franchise, and also the undertaking upon which this action is based. This instrument incorporates, by reference, the entire ordinance, recites particularly the provisions of section 6, and is conditioned as required by that section. The amended complaint alleges that said bond was given voluntarily by the defendants, and that it was approved and accepted by the board of trustees. The grantees of the franchise "have wholly failed to commence the constructing and equipping of said railroad and to complete the same in and through the city of Arcata" within the time allowed by the ordinance, or at all. Alleging that it would be impracticable and extremely difficult to fix the actual damage resulting to the city of Arcata, the plaintiff asks judgment for the penal sum of the bond, $5,000, as liquidated damages.

Without setting forth in further detail the allegations of the complaint, which is very full in its statements of all the steps leading up to the granting of the alleged franchise, it may be said that it affirmatively appears that there was no compliance with the conditions imposed by the act of March 11, 1901, entitled "An act providing for the sale of street railroad and other franchises in municipalities, and providing conditions for the granting of such franchises by legislative or other governing bodies and repealing conflicting acts." St. 1901, p. 265, c. 103, amended St. 1903, p. 90, c. 82. That statute provides, among other conditions, that certain franchises and privileges shall be granted only to the highest bidder after advertising for bids. It also requires the successful bidder to file with the governing body of the municipality a bond conditioned that the bidder will perform all the terms and conditions of the franchise. There was no advertisement, nor was there any bid for the privilege here granted to Green and O'Brien, and it seems to be conceded by the appellant that, if such privilege was within the class of franchises and privileges described in the act, the ordinance granting it was void, and conferred no rights whatever upon the grantees. In that event, the bond would clearly be without consideration and no recovery could be had thereon (unless on the ground of estoppel, to which we shall refer hereafter).

Much of the discussion in the briefs is devoted to a consideration of the nature of the right purported to be granted by the ordinance, and of the proper construction and effect of section 1 of the act of 1901, defining the franchises and privileges that must be advertised and sold to the highest bidder. The appellant urges that the right granted to Green and O'Brien was not covered by the act, but that the trustees had power, under subdivision 13 of section 862 of the municipal corporation act (St. 1883, p. 270, c. 49) to pass the ordinance in question. The statute relied on (St. 1903, p. 93, c. 86) gives to the trustees of cities of the sixth class power "to permit under such restrictions as they may deem proper, the laying of railroad tracks and the running of cars drawn by horses, steam or other power thereon."

For the purposes of this decision, we may assume that the appellant is right in this contention, and that the trustees had power, under the municipal corporation act, to grant the right to lay tracks and operate a railroad over the streets of the city, without first advertising the right for sale, or selling it to the highest bidder. So assuming, however, we are still confronted with the question whether the conditions attached to the grant, and incorporated in the bond, were such as the city had the power to impose. In this connection we do not overlook the allegation that the bond was voluntarily given by the appellants. But, reading the allegation in connection with the averments showing that the giving of such bond was a condition upon which the trustees, by their ordinance, made the grant of the franchise depend, it means no more than that the grantees accepted the franchise upon the only terms available to them. They consented to furnish the undertaking, but their consent was required in order to enable them to take any benefits under the grant. As between private individuals or corporations, having a general power to make contracts, this would undoubtedly have constituted an agreement binding upon the parties to it. Here, however, one of the parties to the alleged contract was a municipal corporation. As such, it had only such powers as were expressly or by necessary implication conferred upon it by the Constitution or by statutes passed under the Constitution. Herzo v. San Francisco, 33 Cal. 134; Ex parte Frank, 52 Cal. 608, 28 Am. Rep. 642; McCoy v. Briant, 53 Cal. 250; South Pasadena v. Terminal Railway Co., 109 Cal. 315, 41 Pac. 1093. Section 862 of the municipal corporation act, the only law relied on by appellant as the source of the power to grant the franchise, authorizes the city trustees to permit the laying of tracks, etc., "under such restrictions as they deem proper." Conditions may be attached to the grant. But the power to make such grant, and to impose conditions upon it is "legislative in its nature; * * * and is not referable for its support to the power of making contracts." South Pasadena v. Terminal Ry. Co., supra. Unless the condition or "restriction" was one within the scope of the legislative power of the municipality, it cannot be supported as a contract. City of Aberdeen v. Honey, 8 Wash. 251, 35 Pac. 1097.

That it was not within such scope is, we think, a necessary conclusion from the doctrines declared in the South Pasadena Case, already cited. There the plaintiff, a municipal corporation of the sixth class, had granted to a railroad company the right to construct and operate a steam railroad in certain streets of the city. Among the conditions attached to the grant was one limiting the rates of fare to be charged for travel between South Pasadena and Los Angeles. The ordinance declared that, upon failure of the grantee or its assigns to comply with any of the conditions, "all rights under this ordinance shall thereupon and immediately be forfeited, and this grant shall thereupon be null and void." The road was constructed under the license so granted, and was afterwards conveyed to the defendant. The rate of fare to and from Los Angeles having been raised beyond the limit fixed by the ordinance, the city sought to enjoin the operation of the road over the streets of South Pasadena. It was held that the restriction upon rates of fare, applying as it did, to passage beyond the limits of the city, was void for the reason that it attempted to regulate matters outside of the city boundaries. "One of the limitations upon such ordinances," says the court, "is that they can have no extraterritorial force unless by express permission of the sovereign power."

The condition here imposed was that the grantees should within certain periods commence and complete the construction of their road between Eureka and Arcata and through Arcata. So far as this related to the construction between the two cities, it was as clearly extraterritorial as the provision in the South Pasadena Case. It is equally clear that the condition is not severable, and that it cannot be held good as to that part of it which requires construction through the city of Arcata. What the municipality was seeking to bargain for was a road connecting the two cities. The right to run over the streets of Arcata was a mere incident to this scheme, as is strongly indicated by section 12 of the ordinance, which declares that it was not intended to grant a franchise for a street railroad in Arcata. We think there can be no doubt, on the whole ordinance, that the construction undertaken—i. e., from Eureka to Arcata and through Arcata—was a single and complete thing, and that the effort of the trustees was to grant a right upon condition that the entire contemplated road be constructed.

The appellant urges that the defendants, having received the grant which they sought, are estopped to deny the validity of their undertaking which they gave in consideration of such grant. But we think the doctrine of estoppel has no just application here. A party contracting with a city regarding a subject-matter within the scope of the city's powers may, where he has received the benefit of the contract, be precluded from asserting that the contract was not, on the part of the city, executed in the manner required by law. The doctrine, however, cannot be made to cover contracts entirely beyond the range of the municipal authority. "If this doctrine be established, then corporations, no matter how limited their powers, may make themselves omnipotent. They have only to induce persons to contract with them beyond the scope of their powers, and their very usurpations have the effect of conferring powers on them which the Legislature has withheld. A proposition so erroneous can scarcely need argument to overturn it. * * * We cannot apply the doctrine of estoppel to such a case as this." City Council v. Montgomery, etc., Co., 31 Ala. 76.

The judgment is affirmed.

SEYMOUR v. OELRICHS et al.

(S. F. 4,767.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 16, 1909. Rehearing Denied Jan. 13, 1910.)

1. FRAUDS, STATUTE OF (§ 44*)—CONTRACTS OF EMPLOYMENT.

An oral contract of employment for 10 years is within the statute of frauds. Code Civ. Proc. § 1973, subd. 1.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Frauds, Statute of, Cent. Dig. § 66; Dec. Dig. § 44.*]

2. FRAUDS, STATUTE OF (§ 113*)—MEMORANDUM OF CONTRACT—SUFFICIENCY.

To satisfy the statute of frauds the memorandum must contain the essential terms and material elements of the contract, expressed with such certainty that it may be understood without recourse to parol evidence.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Frauds, Statute of, Cent. Dig. §§ 239-241; Dec. Dig. § 113.*]

3. FRAUDS, STATUTE OF (§ 118*)—MEMORANDUM OF CONTRACT—SUFFICIENCY—SEPARATE WRITINGS.

A general notice reciting that a person named was employed as superintendent of buildings was signed by an agent of the owners. One of the owners subsequently wrote to the person named a letter, reciting that he hoped that everything was pleasant at the office, and that he had full knowledge of the property. Another of the owners thereafter sent a telegram to the agent, reciting that she and a third owner agreed to keep the person named in office at former salary. Held, that the writings did not amount to a memorandum of a contract employing the named person for 10 years at a monthly salary.

4. Frauds, Statute of (§ 116*)—Contracts—Authority to Enter into Contracts.

Under Civ. Code, § 2309, providing that an authority to enter into a contract required by law to be in writing can only be given by an instrument in writing, an agent, in the absence of written authority, has no authority to bind his principal to employ one for 10 years.

5. New Trial (§ 128*) — Specifications — Sufficiency.

Where the ultimate fact alleged and found was that plaintiff entered into a contract with defendants, a specification that the evidence was insufficient to justify the finding, in that it did not show that the contract was ever entered into, or that the attorney in fact of defendants entered into the contract, and that the evidence did not show that defendants ever entered into any agreement with plaintiff, was sufficient to raise the point that there was no evidence to show the authority of the attorney in fact to make the contract which he assumed to make on behalf of defendants.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see New Trial, Cent. Dig. § 261; Dec. Dig. § 128.*]

6. New Trial (§ 128*)—Specification of Error—Insufficiency of Evidence.

Specifications of error to findings are sufficient when they are as specific as the findings themselves.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see New Trial, Cent. Dig. § 261; Dec. Dig. § 128.*]

7. Husband and Wife (§ 138*)—Principal and Agent (§ 137*)—Agency of Husband for Wife — Contracts by Agent — Estoppel.

Where a husband had no authority to bind his wife and her sister by a contract employing an overseer of the wife's and sister's real estate, the fact that the overseer, on the faith of the husband's representations that he would be given a 10-year contract, resigned and irrevocably lost his former position did not estop the wife and sister from denying the contract unless they took some action with notice that such representation had been made.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Husband and Wife, Cent. Dig. § 534; Dec. Dig. § 138;* Principal and Agent, Cent. Dig. §§ 492–494; Dec. Dig. § 137.*]

8. Frauds, Statute of (§ 158*)—Signature by Agent—Power of Agent—Evidence.

Proof that an agent had authority to bind his principal by some sort of a contract does not, in the absence of proof of written authority, justify the inference that the agent had authority to bind the principal by a contract required to be in writing under the statute of frauds.

9. Principal and Agent (§ 92*)—Contract by Agent—Effect.

Where an agent was authorized in writing to enter into a contract in behalf of his principal, the principal was bound by the agent's acts, conduct, and statements to the same extent that he would have been had he been personally present.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Principal and Agent, Cent. Dig. § 245; Dec. Dig. § 92.*]

10. Frauds, Statute of (§ 129*)—Part Performance—Effect.

Mere part performance of a parol contract for personal services not to be performed within a year does not render the contract valid and enforceable under the statute of frauds.

11. Frauds, Statute of (§ 119*)—Defense—Estoppel.

The doctrine that equity will hold one estopped from relying on the statute of frauds, where to do so will amount to the practice of fraud, is not limited in its operation to any particular class of contracts, but applies in every transaction where the statute is invoked.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Frauds, Statute of, Cent. Dig. § 270; Dec. Dig. § 119.*]

12. Estoppel (§ 83*)—Equitable Estoppel—Fraud—Sufficiency.

To constitute fraud sufficient to serve as a foundation for estoppel by conduct, an actual intent to mislead is not essential, and it is sufficient that the case is one in which the circumstances and conduct would render it a fraud for the party to deny what he had previously induced and suffered another to believe and take action on, and a person against whom the estoppel is asserted must, by his silence or representations, create a belief of the existence of a state of facts which it would be unconscionable to deny.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Estoppel, Cent. Dig. § 218; Dec. Dig. § 83.*]

13. Frauds, Statute of (§ 119*)—Equitable Estoppel—Fraud—Sufficiency.

The acts, conduct, or statements relied on as constituting equitable estoppel must generally be acts, conduct, or statements amounting to a representation of fact, and mere refusal to make a writing as agreed is not as a general rule such fraud as will take a case out of the operation of the statute of frauds under the doctrine of equitable estoppel, and this is ordinarily true, even where a party relying simply on the promise of another has changed his position to his injury because thereof.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Frauds, Statute of, Cent. Dig. § 270; Dec. Dig. § 119.*]

14. Estoppel (§ 85*)—Equitable Estoppel—Fraud—Sufficiency.

A representation of a future intention absolute in form, deliberately made to influence the conduct of another, and acted on by the other, is generally the source of a right and may amount to a contract enforceable as such by equity.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Estoppel, Cent. Dig. §§ 220, 221; Dec. Dig. § 85.*]

15. Frauds, Statute of (§ 119*)—Equitable Estoppel—Fraud—Sufficiency.

A husband, duly authorized to bind his wife and her sister by a contract employing an overseer of the wife's and sister's real estate, orally agreed to employ one as overseer for 10 years at a monthly salary and to reduce the contract to writing, and thereby induced the latter to surrender a life position in the police department in a city and to enter on his services as overseer. The latter would not have left the life position unless he was assured of a permanent position, and the husband knew that fact. Held, that the wife and sister were equitably estopped from repudiating the oral contract on the ground that it was void under the statute of frauds.

16. Master and Servant (§ 42*)—Breach of Contract of Employment—Measure of Damages.

In an action by a servant for breach of contract of employment for a specified period, tried before the expiration of the period, the measure of damages is prima facie the contract earnings subject to deductions of earnings from other employments in which the servant was engaged after his discharge, and of what he might earn by the exercise of reasonable diligence during the balance of the unexpired term.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; J. C. B. Hebbard, Judge.

Action by John Seymour against Theresa A. Oelrichs and another. From a judgment for plaintiff, and from an order denying a new trial, defendants appeal. Reversed.

Tobin & Tobin, for appellants. Peter F. Dunne and C. W. Durbrow, for respondent.

ANGELLOTTI, J. An opinion was filed on this appeal on July 6, 1909, and judgment given thereon as follows: "The judgment and order appealed from are reversed." The following is a copy of said opinion, the same having been written by Justice Sloss:

"In this action the plaintiff seeks to recover the sum of $28,500 as damages for the breach of a contract of employment. He alleges that on or about the 1st day of May, 1902, the defendants Theresa A. Oelrichs and Virginia Vanderbilt, with their brother Charles L. Fair, since deceased, were the heirs at law of James G. Fair, deceased, and the owners of his estate, consisting in large part of real property in the city and county of San Francisco. It is alleged that on or about said date the said heirs of James G. Fair entered into a contract with the plaintiff whereby it was agreed that said heirs should employ the plaintiff for the period of ten years from June 1, 1902, at a salary of $300 a month, to act as overseer of their lands and the buildings thereon. On August 14, 1902, Charles L. Fair died, and all of his interest in the property above mentioned devolved upon his sisters Theresa A. Oelrichs and Virginia Vanderbilt. Plaintiff, as is averred, entered upon the performance of his duties under the aforesaid contract and continued in such employment until about the 29th day of June, 1904, when, without his consent the defendants Theresa A. Oelrichs and Virginia Vanderbilt refused to perform said contract any longer. Plaintiff has ever since been ready and willing to perform said contract upon his part.

"The answer denies the making of the contract as alleged, and avers that plaintiff was employed by the Fair heirs from month to month only. The court found that all of the allegations of the complaint were true except the allegation of damage, with respect to which it found that plaintiff had been damaged in the sum of $11,100. It was further found that the contract of employment alleged by plaintiff was, in the first instance, entered into by word of mouth, but was afterwards reduced to writing subscribed by the parties to be charged thereby. The writings regarded by the court as constituting a written memorandum or contract will be more particularly referred to hereafter. It is further found that on the 1st of May, when the original oral agreement was made, the plaintiff was holding the position of captain of detectives in the police department of the city and county of San Francisco at a salary of $250 a month; that the heirs of James G. Fair did at that time request him to give up his position as captain of detectives, and assured him that if he would do so they would give him a position for ten years upon a salary of $36,000 payable in equal monthly payments of $300, and would within a short time put such employment and the terms thereof in writing and sign the same. It was upon such representations and assurance, the court finds, that plaintiff resigned his said position as captain of detectives and took service with said heirs as alleged. There is a further finding to the effect that it is not in the power of said heirs to restore to said plaintiff his status and position as captain of detectives. The defendants, Theresa A. Oelrichs and Virginia Vanderbilt, have continuously failed and refused to give to plaintiff any written contract as promised. Upon these findings the court entered judgment in favor of plaintiff and against Theresa A. Oelrichs and Virginia Vanderbilt for the sum of $11,100 with interest and costs, and said defendants appeal from the judgment and from an order denying their motion for a new trial.

"It is perfectly clear that the contract alleged was one that by its terms was not to be performed within one year, and was therefore, under the provisions of the statute of frauds, required to be in writing. Code Civ. Proc. § 1973, subd. 1. It is equally clear that the writings mentioned in the findings were not sufficient to comply with the requirements of the statute. The first of these is a general notice reading as follows: 'Office of Fair Heirs. 230 Montgomery St., San Francisco. June 18, 1902—To Whom It May Concern: Mr. John F. Seymour is in our employ as superintendent of buildings, and is entitled as our representative to admission to all our properties. We ask the kind consideration of any of our tenants and others whom he may come in contact with. Very respectfully, Fair Heirs, by Charles S. Neal.'

"The second is a letter written to Seymour by Charles L. Fair under date of July 22,

1902, and containing the following expression: 'I suppose by this time you have full knowledge of the property of the estate and hope that everything is pleasant at the office.' The third is a telegram sent by the defendant Virginia Vanderbilt to Charles S. Neal, under date of March 4, 1904. In it are the words: 'My sister and S (self) agree to keep Seymour in office at former salary.'

"Even if it were assumed that the evidence is sufficient to show that either Charles S. Neal or Charles L. Fair was authorized to bind the appellants, and that the defendant Mrs. Vanderbilt was authorized to bind her sister, Mrs. Oelrichs, we find nothing in any of the writings which shows any such contract as the one set up by plaintiff. Giving them their utmost effect, the papers disclose no more than that Seymour was employed by the Fair heirs as superintendent of buildings at a salary. There is no reference to an employment for any given period. As plaintiff had received payment for the time during which he had rendered service, the very essence of his case was a contract of employment for 10 years. To satisfy the statute of frauds a memorandum 'must contain the essential terms of the contract expressed with such a degree of certainty that it may be understood without recourse to parol evidence to show the intentions of the parties.' Browne, Statute of Frauds (5th Ed.) § 371. In Breckinridge v. Crocker, 78 Cal. 529 [21 Pac. 179], this court said: 'The memorandum must contain all the material elements of the contract.' Again, in Craig v. Zelian, 137 Cal. 105 [69 Pac. 853], it is said: 'The statute of frauds was originally enacted "for the prevention of frauds and perjuries" and an agreement * * * is required to be in writing in order that this purpose may be accomplished. The whole object of the statute would be frustrated if any substantive portion of the agreement could be established by parol evidence.'

"In the absence of evidence to support the finding of a written contract, we are compelled to inquire whether the judgment may be sustained upon the finding that an oral agreement was entered into as alleged. In this particular, too, the sufficiency of the evidence to sustain the finding is questioned by the appellants. The plaintiff offered testimony tending to show that while he was occupying the position of captain of detectives of the police department of the city and county of San Francisco he had been urged and requested by Charles L. Fair and by Hermann Oelrichs, the husband of one of the defendants, to resign his position and enter the service of the Fair heirs. The suggestion came, originally, from Charles L. Fair. After several discussions of the subject, Fair and Oelrichs, the latter asserting that he represented Mrs. Oelrichs and Mrs. Vanderbilt, agreed to give him a 10-year contract at $300 a month. To this Seymour assented, and about two weeks later he went into the office of the Fair heirs, taking the place of superintendent of buildings. His salary of $300 a month was paid until his discharge in June, 1904, with the exception of a short period during which a smaller sum was paid him.

"It is claimed by the appellants that the record contains no evidence showing any authority on the part of either Charles L. Fair or Hermann Oelrichs to bind Mrs. Oelrichs and Mrs. Vanderbilt by any such contract as found by the court. We think this contention is sound and must be sustained. The contract was one which, as we have seen, was required to be in writing, and, under section 2309 of the Civil Code 'an authority to enter into a contract required by law to be in writing can only be given by an instrument in writing.' Nason v. Lingle, 143 Cal. 363 [77 Pac. 71]. The record does not show that any such written authority was given by either of the appellants to Charles L. Fair or to Hermann Oelrichs. Indeed, as concerns Fair, it is not claimed that he assumed to act on behalf of his sisters. The position taken by respondent in connection with the effect of Oelrichs' acts is that the specifications of insufficiency of evidence contained in the bill of exceptions were not such as to raise the question of Oelrichs' authority to bind the appellants. As has been stated, the allegation of the complaint is simply that the plaintiff entered into the contract alleged with the Fair heirs, and the finding follows the allegation of the complaint. One of the specifications (designated 'Second') reads as follows: 'The evidence is insufficient to justify the finding that the alleged contract set forth in paragraph 3 of plaintiff's complaint was on the 1st of May, 1902, or thereabouts, entered into orally or by word of mouth by and between the plaintiff on one side and C. L. Fair and these defendants, or any or either of them, on the other, in this, that the evidence is insufficient to show that the plaintiff, Seymour, ever orally entered into any contract of service for a term of years as alleged in his complaint with C. L. Fair and his sisters, Theresa A. Oelrichs and Virginia Vanderbilt, or any or either of them; that the evidence is insufficient to show that Hermann Oelrichs, as the attorney in fact of said Theresa A. Oelrichs and Virginia Vanderbilt, ever orally or in writing entered into any such contract with plaintiff as is alleged in paragraph 3 of his complaint; that none of the oral communications had between plaintiff and C. L. Fair or Hermann Oelrichs or Theresa A. Oelrichs contain any evidence of any such contract as set forth in paragraph 3 of plaintiff's complaint.' A further specification ('Twelfth') states that 'the evidence is insufficient to show that either of these defendants ever entered into any agreement by word of mouth, on or about the 18th day of June, 1902, with plaintiff.' We see no reason for holding that these specifications were not sufficiently definite to enable the appellants to raise the point that there was no evidence to show the authority of Hermann Oelrichs to make the contract which he assumed to make on behalf of Mrs. Oelrichs and Mrs. Vanderbilt. The ultimate fact, and the fact as alleged and found, is that the plaintiff entered into the contract in question with Mrs. Oelrichs and Mrs. Vanderbilt. Such contract could have been made in one of two ways only; by the defendants themselves, or by their agent duly authorized. The specification that there was no evidence that the contract alleged was entered into between the defendants and the plaintiff is all that is required. To meet such specification the plaintiff must be able to point in the record to evidence showing either that the appellants made the contract themselves or that they authorized its making by an agent who made it. The contention of respondent is based upon a narrow construction of that part of the specification first quoted, which states that the evidence is insufficient to show that Mr. Oelrichs as the attorney in fact of Mrs. Oelrichs and Virginia Vanderbilt ever entered into any such contract with plaintiff as is alleged in paragraph 3 of plaintiff's complaint. This, it is claimed, points merely to the question of whether or not Oelrichs actually made the agreement and assumes his authority to do so. As this court has shown by its later decisions, it is no longer disposed to scrutinize specifications of insufficiency with the minuteness which was applied in earlier cases, such as De Molera v. Martin, 120 Cal. 544 [52 Pac. 825]. The more liberal view now entertained is illustrated by the rulings in American Type Founders Co. v. Packer, 130 Cal. 459 [62 Pac. 744]; Stuart v. Lord, 138 Cal. 672 [72 Pac. 142]; Drathman v. Cohen, 139 Cal. 310 [73 Pac. 181]; Holmes v. Hoppe, 140 Cal. 212 [73 Pac. 1002]; Bell v. Staacke, 141 Cal. 194 [74 Pac. 774]; Harris v. Duarte, 141 Cal. 498 [70 Pac. 298, 75 Pac. 58]. In the case last cited the chief justice declares the rule to be that the specifications are sufficient when they are as specific as the findings themselves. In this case there is no finding that the contract was made through Oelrichs as agent or that Oelrichs had authority to act as agent, and there was therefore no necessity for a specification directed to the fact of such agency.

"It is contended by the respondent that, regardless of the foregoing consideration, he is entitled to recover upon the theory of an estoppel. The alleged estoppel is based upon the findings of the court to the effect that Seymour, upon the faith of representations that he would have a 10-year contract, resigned and lost irrevocably his position in the police department. This cannot, in the present state of the record, be invoked as a ground for affirming the order. If Oerlichs had no authority to bind his wife and her sister by a 10-year contract, they could not be estopped by his declaration that they would give Seymour such contract, unless they took some action with notice of the fact that this declaration had been made. Lambert v. Gerner, 142 Cal. 399 [76 Pac. 53]. Without going into a recital of the evidence offered for the purpose of connecting these appellants with the transaction, we may say that there is nothing to show that either of them had knowledge, when Seymour commenced his service, that his employment was other than from month to month. Each of them, when informed of his claim that he had been employed under a contract for 10 years, promptly repudiated the alleged contract. If it could be said that the evidence justifies an inference that Oelrichs had authority to bind one or both of the appellants by some sort of contract, it does not, in the absence of proof of written authority (Civ. Code, § 2309), justify the inference that he had authority to bind them by a contract required to be in writing. Even though they had knowledge that he had made a contract of employment with Seymour on their behalf, their duty to inquire into the terms of such contract did not impute to them notice that he had exceeded his authority and undertaken to bind them by an agreement required to be in writing. The finding of the court that the appellants had requested the plaintiff to resign his position in the police department, etc., is therefore not supported by the evidence. This finding is attacked by specifications which are sufficient under the views above declared.

"It is necessary, therefore, that the order denying a new trial be reversed. Upon a new trial the plaintiff may succeed in proving by competent evidence the authority of Oelrichs to bind the appellant by a contract of employment for 10 years. We do not here pass upon the question whether, if such proof had been made, the appellants would upon the facts here disclosed be estopped to assert the invalidity of the oral contract made by Oelrichs with plaintiff. The question of estoppel is one which often depends upon the peculiar facts shown, and, as the evidence on another trial may vary from that here introduced, we deem it better to omit discussion of this question. Nor do we, for similar reasons, pass upon the question of the measure of damages."

It will be observed that the court did not in this opinion pass upon the question whether, assuming that Mr. Oelrichs had the power to bind the appellants by a written contract for 10 years, the appellants would, upon the facts disclosed by the record, be estopped to assert the invalidity of the oral contract made by said Oelrichs and Charles L. Fair with plaintiff, and also failed to pass upon the question of the measure of damages. Upon petition for rehearing it was concluded by the court that the question of estoppel should be determined for the purposes of a new trial, and solely for that reason an order vacating the decision was made.

We adhere to the views expressed in the former opinion as to the questions determined therein, and as to such questions adopt the same as the opinion of the court. For the reasons stated therein, the judgment and order denying a new trial must be reversed, but for the purposes of a new trial that must follow, we will determine the question of estoppel.

In our discussion we shall assume, of course, that Mr. Oelrichs was duly authorized in writing to enter into such a contract on behalf of the defendants as is alleged to have been made by him with plaintiff. If he was so authorized, it is apparent that defendants are bound by his acts, conduct and statements to the same extent that they would have been had they been personally present and personally had done just what he did. So assuming, the facts that plaintiff's evidence tended to show are substantially as follows: Plaintiff was captain of detectives in the police department of the city and county of San Francisco, at a salary of $250 per month. Under the law, he held practically a life position as captain of police, being removable therefrom only for good cause, after trial. All this was known to the defendants and to Charles L. Fair, to whose property they have succeeded. Under these circumstances they offered him a position, wherein he was to render personal services in connection with their property in San Francisco for a compensation in money. The terms of the contract were finally agreed upon before Mr. Fair left for Europe, Mr. Fair acting for himself and Mr. Oelrichs representing the defendants. Plaintiff told them that he then had a life position, with a right to a pension if he remained long enough in the police department, and that he could not afford to leave the place and go into anything else unless he was certain of steady employment, and they then told him that they would give him a 10-year contract at $300 per month. This was assented to by plaintiff. The day before Mr. Fair left for Europe, to be absent a few weeks, being very busy in closing up certain business affairs that had to be attended to before he left, he told plaintiff: "Now, in regard to this contract, you leave that stand until I get back, and I will give you the contract." Plaintiff asked him why it could not be done "now," and Fair told him not to be afraid, it would be all right, everything would be all right. It was understood that he was to go to work at once. On leaving Mr. Fair, plaintiff met Mr. Oelrichs and told him about his conversation with Fair, and Oelrichs said: "As far as I am concerned I will give you my part of it now if you want it. I represent Mrs. Oelrichs and Mrs. Vanderbilt and there will be no trouble about it at all, but you might just as well leave it go until Fair returns," and plaintiff said, "All right." This was about June 1, 1902. Plaintiff relied absolutely upon the understanding that he was to have a written contract for 10 years at $300 a month, and would not otherwise have resigned his position in the police department or entered the employ of the defendants and Fair. The morning Fair went away, he asked plaintiff when he was going to resign, and plaintiff said, "To-day," and Fair said, "All right, you go ahead, it will be all right, everything will be all right on my return." He did resign at once and his new employment commenced June 1, 1902. Fair was killed near Paris, France, August 14, 1902, without having returned to America. Plaintiff continued to perform all services agreed to be rendered and received $300 a month therefor to July 1, 1904, when defendants, having determined to sell all their San Francisco property, discharged all of their employés, including plaintiff, and have ever since refused to recognize him as an employé or pay him any portion of the salary agreed upon. Plaintiff had no intimation that either Mrs. Oelrichs or Mrs. Vanderbilt did not know all about the terms upon which he entered their employ until November, 1903, when an attempt, which was not persisted in, was made to reduce his salary; Mrs. Oelrichs on November 30, 1903, told him that Mr. Oelrichs had no right to make such an arrangement. There was nothing to indicate that Mrs. Vanderbilt personally had any knowledge that plaintiff was an employé at all until after Fair's death, or that she personally knew anything about the alleged contract. It is not claimed by plaintiff that either Mr. Oelrichs or Mr. Fair did not act in perfect good faith in this matter, it being conceded that each of them fully intended to execute the written contract.

The claim of plaintiff is not that mere part performance of a contract for personal services which by its terms is not to be performed within a year, "invalid" under our statute because not evidenced by writing, renders the same valid and enforceable. Such a claim would, of course, find no support in the authorities. Browne on Statute of Frauds, § 448. He necessarily is compelled to rely solely on the claim that the defendants by their conduct and promises, on which he was entitled to and did rely, having induced him to give up his life position in the police department in order to enter their employ for a term of years at $300 a month, on the assurance from them that they would give him a written contract for such time and amount, and it being impossible for him to be placed in statu quo, are estopped from now setting up the statute of frauds as a defense to his action on the contract. Under this claim, the fact of part performance by plaintiff plays no part whatever. It was the change of position caused by his resignation from the police department upon which his claim wholly rests, and this resignation was, of course, no part of the performance of the contract of service, but was something that must be done by plaintiff before he could begin to perform, as was known to the defendants. Plaintiff's case, in this regard, would be just as strong if after his resignation he had been prevented by defendants from beginning to perform.

The right of courts of equity to hold a person estopped to assert the statute of frauds, where such assertion would amount to practicing a fraud, cannot be disputed. It is based upon the principle "thoroughly established in equity, and applying in every transaction where the statute is invoked, that the statute of frauds, having been enacted for the purpose of preventing fraud, shall not be made the instrument of shielding, protecting or aiding the party who relies upon it in the perpetration of a fraud or in the consummation of a fraudulent scheme." 2 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 921. It was said in Glass v. Hulbert, 102 Mass. 24, 35, 3 Am. Rep. 418: "The fraud most commonly treated as taking an agreement out of the statute of frauds is that which consists in setting up the statute against its enforcement, after the other party has been induced to make expenditures, or a change of situation in regard to the subject-matter of the agreement, or upon the supposition that it was to be carried into execution, and the assumption of rights thereby to be acquired; so that the refusal to complete the execution of the agreement is not merely a denial of rights which it was intended to confer, but the infliction of an unjust and unconscientious injury and loss. In such case, the party is held, by force of his acts or silent acquiescence, which have misled the other to his harm, to be estopped from setting up the statute of frauds." This statement has been accepted as setting forth a plain and satisfactory ground for equitable jurisdiction, together with a clear indication of the proper limitation of its exercise. See Browne on Statute of Frauds, § 457a. In the section last cited, Mr. Browne says: "A plaintiff * * * must be able to show clearly * * * not only the terms of the contract, but also such acts and conduct of the defendant as the court would hold to amount to a representation that he proposed to stand by his agreement and not avail himself of the statute to escape its performance; and also that the plaintiff, in reliance on this representation, has proceeded, either in performance or pursuance of his contract, to so far alter his position as to incur an unjust and unconscientious injury and loss, in case the defendant is permitted after all to rely upon the statutory defense. After proof of this, the court may well be justified in using its undoubted power, in cases of equitable estoppel, to refuse to listen to a defendant seeking to deny the truth of his own representations previously made."

We can see no good reason for limiting the operation of this equitable doctrine to any particular class of contracts included within the statute of frauds, provided always the essential elements of an estoppel are present, or for saying otherwise than as is intimated by Mr. Pomeroy in the words already quoted, viz., that it applies "in every transaction where the statute is invoked." It is a general equitable principle, a part of the broader equitable doctrine stated in Dickerson v. Colgrove, 100 U. S. 580, 25 L. Ed. 618, and quoted therefrom in Carpy v. Dowdell, 115 Cal. 687, 47 Pac. 697, as follows: "The vital principle is that he who by his language or conduct leads another to do what he would not otherwise have done shall not subject such person to loss or injury by disappointing the expectations upon which he acted. Such a change of position is sternly forbidden. It involves fraud and falsehood, and the law abhors both."

The question, then, is whether the facts of this case bring it within the principle we have discussed. It is clear that there was such a change of position on the part of plaintiff in his irrevocable surrender of his office in the police department, induced in fact by his reliance on the promise of defendants and Fair that a written contract for 10 years at $300 a month would be given, that he will incur great injury and loss in case the defendants are permitted to rely upon the statute of frauds as a defense. That there would necessarily be such a change of position on his part in the event that he relied upon their promise and accepted their offer was known to them, and the promise was given with this knowledge and with the intent that it should be relied on by him and the change in his position thereby induced. The injury done plaintiff by a repudiation of the promise by defendants under these circumstances would certainly appear to be "unjust and unconscientious." Is it permissible to them, in view of the well-settled principle stated to so repudiate it by interposing the fact that the contract has not been reduced to writing, as promised, as a defense to this action?

Learned counsel for defendants say that no fraud on the part of defendants is shown, and that there can be no estoppel in the absence of fraud on the part of the person estopped. The presence of fraud is, of course, essential. It is established by a multitude of cases that to constitute fraud sufficient to serve as a foundation for estoppel by acts or conduct an actual intent to mislead is not essential. Mr. Pomeroy in his work on Specific Performance says that the fraud essential in such cases is not necessarily an antecedent fraud, consciously intended by a party in making the contract, but a fraud inhering in the consequence of thus setting up the statute. Section 104. In Anderson v. Hubble, 93 Ind. 570, 576, 47 Am. Rep. 394, it was aptly said: "It is not necessary, in order to the existence of an equitable estoppel, that there should exist a design to deceive or defraud. The person against whom the estoppel is asserted must, by his silence or his representations, have created a belief of the existence of a state of facts which it would be unconscionable to deny; but it is not essential that he should have been guilty of positive fraud in his previous conduct. * * * All that is meant in the expression that an estoppel must possess an element of fraud is that the case must be one in which the circumstances and conduct would render it a fraud for the party to deny what he had previously induced or suffered another to believe and take action upon. * * * There need be no precedent corrupt motive or evil design." See, also, 2 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 805. It is unnecessary to cite other authorities upon this well-settled doctrine in regard to equitable estoppel. We do not understand it to be disputed by counsel for defendant. Their claim, as we understand it, is that there is nothing more in this case than a mere promise on the part of defendants to give the written contract, made honestly and in good faith, and that a refusal to comply with such a promise so made cannot serve as a basis for the application of the doctrine of equitable estoppel; the contention being that the mere failure to keep an oral promise to reduce an oral contract to writing cannot suffice to constitute the fraud essential to the application of such doctrine, and that there must be some other fraud shown, such as actual fraud to prevent the contract being reduced to writing. This claim presents the most doubtful question in this case. The authorities all recognize the proposition that the acts, conduct, or statements relied on as constituting ground for the estoppel must generally be acts, conduct, or statements amounting to a representation of fact, as distinguished from mere expression of opinion or intention, or mere promise of something to be done in the future. It has therefore been said many times that the mere refusal to make a writing, as agreed, is not such fraud as will take a case out of the operation of the statute of frauds under the doctrine of equitable estoppel. This, undoubtedly, is ordinarily true, even where a party, relying simply on the honor, word or promise of the other, has changed his position to his injury because thereof. But is it applicable to such a state of facts as we have before us? Practically, defendants said to plaintiff: "We want you to enter our employ at once. We know that to do so you must give up your life position in the police department and that you are not willing to do this unless you are assured of employment for ten years at $300 a month. A written contract is, under our statute, essential to guarantee you such employment. We will execute this contract just as soon as Mr. Fair returns from Europe. Go ahead and resign your position now and commence work with us at once, and it will be all right. The written contract will be given as promised." Here, certainly, in the language of a note to section 877 of Pomeroy's Equity Jurisprudence (volume 2), was a representation of a future intention absolute in form, deliberately made for the purpose of influencing the conduct of the other party, and it is stated in such note that, notwithstanding the rule set forth in the text that a statement of intention merely cannot be a misrepresentation amounting to fraud, such a representation of intention as last set forth, if acted upon by the other party, is generally the source of a right, and may amount to a contract enforceable as such by a court of equity. Mr. Bigelow, in discussing the essentials of estoppel by conduct, and particularly the necessity of a representation or concealment of a fact, says that where the statement or conduct is not resolvable into a statement of fact, and does not amount to a contract, the party making it is not bound unless guilty of clear moral fraud, or unless he stood in a relation of confidence toward him to whom it was made. Bigelow on Estoppel (5th Ed.) p. 572. The same learned author further says that situations may arise in which a contract should be held an estoppel, as in certain cases where only an inadequate right of action would, if the estoppel were not allowed, exist in favor of the injured party, citing the case of Faxton v. Faxton, 28 Mich. 159, in which a mortgagee was held estopped from enforcing his mortgage, where he had induced the son of a mortgagor, contemplating removal, to remain on the mortgaged land and care for it and support the family of the mortgagor, to whom the mortgagee was related, on a promise, honestly made, that the mortgage would never be enforced if he did so. Page 577. In Harris v. Brooks, 21 Pick. (Mass.) 195, 32 Am. Dec. 254, it was held that a parol declaration by the holder of a note to a surety that he would look to the principal only was a good defense for the surety, on the ground that it lulled the party into security and prevented him from obtaining his indemnity, and that it would be a fraud on the part of the holder to subsequently call upon the surety contrary to such assurance. In White v. Walker, 31 Ill. 422, a somewhat similar case, it was said that while a promise to forgive a debt or forbear its collection, unsupported by any consideration, was ineffectual as a defense viewed merely as an agreement, yet if the surety has been induced by such assurance to neglect any of the means which might have been used for his indemnity, the "promise may have that effect as an estoppel, which it wants as a contract, and amount to a defense in any subsequent action brought by the creditor." These authorities are cited simply to show that the mere fact that there was no misrepresentation of fact, but only a promise of future action, is not always a bar to equitable relief. The cases to be found in support of the doctrine that the mere omission or refusal to make a writing, as promised, is not such fraud as will take a case out of the operation of the statute of frauds, are generally cases where the promise was not made under such circumstances as would warrant the conclusion that it constituted, in the eye of equity, a contract, the repudiation of which would be a manifest fraud on the other party. For instance, in stating the rule, the Supreme Court of Indiana said, in Caylor v. Roe, 99 Ind. 1, that never has it been held that the simple failure or refusal to reduce a verbal contract to writing, unaccompanied by elements of estoppel or other circumstances invoking the equitable powers of the court, is such a fraud as will authorize the courts in excepting the contract from the operation of the statute of frauds. The case of Equitable Gas, etc., Co. v. Baltimore, etc., Co., 63 Md. 285, cited by defendants, was a case of an oral contract for the sale of personal property which, according to its terms, was not to be performed within one year. It was intended by the parties that it should be put into writing. The action was by the vendee to obtain an injunction preventing the disposition of the property to others and for specific performance. There were allegations showing the irreparable injury that would be suffered by the plaintiff in view of its action had in reliance on the contract. The court recognized it to be a settled rule "that the equity of part performance to entitle a plaintiff to specific execution of a contract within the statute does not relate to contracts for personal service not to be performed within a year." But they further said that here the parties intended a written contract, and that if such contract was fraudulently withheld, if executed, or, if not, signed, if the execution be fraudulently and without justifiable cause delayed, a court of equity may require its production or enforce proper execution. It is obvious that "the application of the rules as to equitable enforcement must to a considerable extent be governed by the circumstances of each case." Browne on Statute of Frauds (5th Ed.) p. 586.

While the question is by no means free from doubt, we believe that it should be held that there were sufficient facts in this case to support a conclusion that the promise here to give such a written agreement as was required by the statute was made under such circumstances that the irrevocable surrender by plaintiff of his position in the police department in full reliance thereon made it, in the eye of equity, a binding contract, the subsequent repudiation of which by defendants would constitute such a manifest fraud as would justify the application of the doctrine of equitable estoppel.

For the purposes of a new trial it may further be properly said that we are entirely satisfied with the opinion filed in this case by the District Court of Appeal of the Third District, written by Justice Hart, of that court, so far as the question of measure of damages is concerned. We adopt that portion of their opinion as the opinion of this court. It is as follows:

"3. Upon the question of damages, it is contended by the defendants that the basis or measure thereof for a breach of contract such as the one under consideration, where the action is tried before the expiration of the term of service stipulated in the contract, is such actual damage as the evidence shows the plaintiff has sustained up to the time of the trial. Such actual damage in such a case would, of course, be the equivalent in amount to the salary for that portion of the stipulated term of employment ending with the beginning of the trial of the action, less what the plaintiff has been paid by the defendants and what he has earned and received, if anything, from other employments after his discharge from the service of the defendants and up to the trial of the action. Schroeder v. Cal. Yukon Trading Co. [D. C.] 95 Fed. 296.

"It appears that the plaintiff, some 8 months after his employment under the contract with defendants was discontinued, secured a position with Wells, Fargo & Co. at a monthly salary of $200. The court based its award of damages on the aggregate salary to which plaintiff would have been entitled for the unexpired portion of the contract period of 10 years with defendants, deducting therefrom, however, the amount earned by plaintiff in his employment with Wells, Fargo & Co. up to the time of the trial, together with the amount which he would earn during the remainder of the 10 years at the salary of $200 per month, the amount paid him by Wells, Fargo & Co., assuming that he would retain his employment and salary with Wells, Fargo & Co. during all of the unexpired portion of the stipulated 10 years.

"Counsel have been unable to find any California decision in which the question of the measure of damages is directly presented, discussed, and adjudicated in a case, like the one here, where the action for the violation of the terms of a contract of hiring has been instituted before the expiration of the period of time or the term for which the service of a party is stipulated to run. The point has been squarely presented and decided, however, in other jurisdictions, but the conclusions reached are not uniform. In some states the rule contended for by the appellants is laid down and sustained upon reasons which appear to have some support, while in others it is held that the proper basis upon which damages should be awarded for the breach of the terms of a contract such as the one here is the entire term for which the party has been employed, making deductions of earnings from other employments in which the plaintiff might have been engaged after his discharge from service by the master, and also allowing for what he may earn, by the exercise of reasonable exertion and diligence, during the balance of the unexpired term. We are thoroughly persuaded that the weight of authority and by far the best reasoned cases support the position of the respondent. * * *

"The gist of the complaint is in the breach of the contract and the injury resulting to plaintiff by reason of such breach. The action is not, in other words, one in which the plaintiff seeks to recover wages, but is for damages for the violation of the terms of the agreement by which he was employed for certain compensation to perform services for the defendants for a stipulated term of years. The measure of damages is, therefore, prima facie, the contract price. In Hamilton v. Love, 152 Ind. 645 [53 N. E. 182, 71 Am. St. Rep. 384], an action involving the breach of a contract of hiring, it is said: 'There can be but a single action, and not successive actions. The action must be for damages for a breach of the contract, and not in assumpsit for constructive services, or for wages. All damages sustained by the servant, in consequence of the wrongful act of the master, whether present or prospective, must be included in the recovery. A single judgment for the injury bars all other claims. The suit may be brought at any time after the breach, either before the expiration of the term of the contract, or afterwards, within the statutory limits. But whether brought before or after the expiration of the term of the contract, the measure of the damages is the same.'

" 'The measure of damages,' say the Missouri Court of Appeals, in Lally v. Cantwell, 40 Mo. App. 50, speaking of a contract like the one here, 'is the contract price, although the master may recoup the damages by showing that the servant either earned, or by reasonable exertion might have earned, money in other employment during the contract period. * * * Nor is the servant in such cases confined to damages which have accrued up to the institution of the suit, or even up to the day of the trial, as the defendant's counsel erroneously supposes, where the damages are of a continuing character.'

"The rule as thus declared is laid down and sustained in the following cases: Pierce v. R. Co., 173 U. S. 1 [19 Sup. Ct. 335, 43 L. Ed. 591]; De Camp v. Hewitt, 11 Rob. (La.) 290 [43 Am. Dec. 204]; Sutherland v. Wyer, 67 Me. 64; Cutter v. Gillette, 163 Mass. 95 [39 N. E. 1010]; Miller v. Boot & Shoe Co., 26 Mo. App. 61; Boland v. Glendale Co., 127 Mo. 520 [30 S. W. 151]; Kelly v. Wheel Co., 62 Ohio St. 598 [57 N. E. 984]; Wilke v. Harrison, 166 Pa. 202 [30 Atl. 1125]; R. Co. v. Staub, 7 Lea (Tenn.) 397; School District v. McDonald [68 Neb. 610] 94 N. W. 829 [97 N. W. 584]; Daniell v. Boston & M. R. Co. [184 Mass. 337] 68 N. E. 337, 339; Forked Deer Co. v. Shipley, 80 S. W. 476 [25 Ky. Law Rep. 2299]; Olmstead v. Bach et al., 78 Md. 132 [27 Atl. 501, 22 L. R. A. 74, 44 Am. St. Rep. 273].

"In the last-mentioned case it is said: 'A contract of employment for a year for a certain sum per week, payable weekly, is entire and indivisible, and only one action for the breach thereof can be maintained by the discharged employé.'

"But there is no necessity for reviewing the many cases which hold with respondent that the measure of damages in such a case as the present one is prima facie the contract price. The rule is invariably applied in cases of personal injury, where the jury is permitted, in the assessment of damages, to consider evidence bearing not alone upon the immediate, but upon the future, effect of the injury upon the complaining party. Nor is the rule disturbed by the argument, advanced by the appellants, that it is impossible to determine with accuracy what damage plaintiff would actually suffer during the remainder of the unexpired term. It is to be conceded that the question of the extent of the future damage which a complaining party in a case like the one at bar would suffer is fraught with some difficulty. Yet it hardly rests with the defendants to complain of such difficulty, since it arises only through the wrongful act of the defendants themselves. There is no claim here that the plaintiff was incompetent for any reason to properly discharge the duties assigned to him by the defendants. The specific reason for his dismissal from their service does not appear, but it may be safely assumed that if the cause was inefficiency in the performance of the duties of the position, that fact would have been set up. Therefore, if the defendants conceive that to be a hard rule which compels them to respond in damages based largely upon what they characterize as pure speculative injury, they have themselves and no one else to blame. It is well said in Cutter v. Gillette, supra: 'But it is not the law that damages which may be larger or smaller because of such uncertainties are not recoverable. The same kind of difficulty is encountered in the assessment of damages for personal injuries. All the elements which bear upon the matters involved in the prognostication are to be considered by the jury, and from the evidence in each case they are to form an opinion upon which all can agree, and to which, unless it is set aside by the court, the parties must submit. The liability to have the damages which he inflicts by breaking his contract so assessed is one which the defendant must be taken to have understood when he wrongfully discharged the plaintiff, and if he did not wish to be subjected to it he should have kept his agreement.' And upon this same point our Supreme Court in Holt Co. v. Thornton, 136 Cal. 235 [68 Pac. 709], uses the following language: 'It has often been held that damages may be recovered for the destruction of merely immature growing crops, although there was no absolute certainty that they would ever mature, for he who breaks the contract cannot wholly escape on account of the difficulty which his own wrong has produced of devising a perfect measure of damages.' See Schoemaker v. Acker, 116 Cal. 245 [48 Pac. 62]."

The judgment and order denying a new trial are reversed.

As to stock remaining to be issued to a stockholder for property transferred by him to the corporation when it was organized, it is a mere trustee, entitled, however, before being compelled to issue it to any other person to be protected against any subsequent claim therefor by such stockholder.

2. Process (§ 86*) — Suit to Determine Rights as to Unissued Stock—Necessary Party—Constructive Service.

While a nonresident entitled to unissued stock is a necessary party to a suit against the corporation to determine rights of another thereto, constructive service is effectual to give the court jurisdiction to determine plaintiff's rights against him so far as concerns disposition of any of such stock, the situs of which is in this state.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Process, Cent. Dig. § 100; Dec. Dig. § 86.*]

3. Execution (§ 29*)—Attachment (§ 73*)—Levy on Nonresident's Property—Situs of Corporate Stock.

For purposes of execution or attachment, the situs of shares of stock is within the state where the corporation resides, and they may lawfully be levied on in such state though owned by a nonresident.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Execution, Cent. Dig. § 61; Dec. Dig. § 29;* Attachment, Cent. Dig. §§ 200, 201; Dec. Dig. § 73.*]

4. Courts (§ 19*) — Jurisdiction — Situs of Stock Subject of Action.

Whenever stock is the subject of an action, its situs should be held to be within the state where the corporation resides.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Courts, Cent. Dig. § 48; Dec. Dig. § 19.*]

5. Courts (§ 19*)—Jurisdiction of Subject-Matter—Residence as Affecting Situs of Stock.

Where a corporation is organized in another state to do business in this state, and all its property is here, and it is doing business nowhere else, it is sufficiently a resident of this state to bring it within the rule applicable to domestic corporations as to the situs of its stock.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Courts, Cent. Dig. § 48; Dec. Dig. § 19.*]

6. Specific Performance (§ 103*)—Decree—In Personam or in Rem.

A decree for specific performance operates primarily in personam, yet in a limited and qualified sense it may also operate in rem when property to be transferred under the contract is within the court's jurisdiction, but defendant is absent therefrom.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Specific Performance, Cent. Dig. §§ 320–323; Dec. Dig. § 103.*]

7. Courts (§ 19*) — Jurisdiction — Proceeding in Rem.

Where the whole relief sought consists in mere delivery of property within the jurisdiction of the courts of a state to a party entitled thereto under a contract, the proceeding is sufficiently in rem to give the courts jurisdiction to effectuate a delivery as against a nonresident defendant.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Courts, Cent. Dig. § 48; Dec. Dig. § 19.*]

8. Attachment (§ 207*)—Nature of Remedy—Property of Nonresident.

A claim by an attaching creditor may be established against a nonresident, only constructively served with summons, to an extent sufficient to enable plaintiff to devote defendant's property, attached in this state, to the payment of his claim.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Attachment, Cent. Dig. §§ 671–673; Dec. Dig. § 207.*]

9. Attachment (§ 1*)—Nature of Proceeding Against Nonresident's Property.

An attachment of property of a nonresident is a proceeding in rem.

10. Lis Pendens (§ 3*)—Bringing of Action as Equivalent to Seizure of Property.

Where a complaint seeks specific property in this state in which plaintiff has acquired an equitable interest by his full performance of a contract with a nonresident, the mere bringing of his action is equivalent to a seizure of the property for purposes of the suit.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Lis Pendens, Cent. Dig. § 3; Dec. Dig. § 3.*]

11. Specific Performance (§ 5*)—Right to Decree—Determination.

The right of a court of equity to decree specific performance does not turn on the question whether the contract relates to real or personal property, but solely on whether the breach can be adequately compensated in damages.

12. Specific Performance (§ 114*)—Transfer of Personal Property — Complaint — Allegation of Inadequacy of Legal Remedy.

The presumption being that an agreement to transfer personal property can be compensated in damages, it is incumbent on one seeking specific performance to allege facts showing the inadequacy of the legal remedy by damages, but he need not allege in terms that the legal remedy is inadequate or that the breach cannot be adequately compensated in damages, and, if the facts alleged and proved sufficiently show such inadequacy, it is enough.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Specific Performance, Cent. Dig. § 356; Dec. Dig. § 114.*]

13. Specific Performance (§ 5*) — Transfer of Personal Property—Inadequacy of Legal Remedy—Sufficiency of Pleading and Proof.

If personal property, a transfer of which is sought to be specifically performed, is such that the value of performance cannot be estimated in money with any degree of certainty and taken in lieu of it, the inadequacy of the legal remedy by way of damages is apparent, and so, where the complaint to compel a transfer of stock shows that it was that of a mining corporation whose property consisted of claims of unknown value, it is apparent that it cannot have an established market value, though it is not alleged in terms that it had not such value at the time of commencing action, and the facts as alleged being found on sufficient evidence, it overcomes the presumption declared by Civ. Code, § 3387, that breach of an agreement to transfer personal property can be relieved by pecuniary compensation.

14. PLEADING (§ 9*)—CONCLUSIONS OF LAW FROM FACTS PLEADED—CONSIDERATION FOR CONTRACT.

Though by Civ. Code, § 3391, to enforce a contract against a party, there must be an adequate consideration, and the contract as to him must be just and reasonable, the complaint need not allege in hæc verba that the contract is supported by an adequate consideration and is as to defendant fair and just, but it is sufficient to set forth facts from which the court is warranted in concluding it.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Pleading, Cent. Dig. § 29; Dec. Dig. § 9.*]

15. SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE (§ 50*) — CONTRACTS ENFORCEABLE — ADEQUACY OF CONSIDERATION—FAIRNESS.

Allegations of a complaint for specific performance of a contract to transfer corporate stock, found to be true by the court, fairly showed the parties were dealing as to stock of no market value and that the sale of treasury stock was absolutely essential to develop the claims and give value to stock; that it was practically agreed to give plaintiff one-half of the stock retained by the individual defendant, the principal stockholder, if plaintiff would go to another state and sell a substantial amount of the treasury stock to obtain money for development work. It further appeared that such defendant allowed plaintiff, relying on the contract, to go to a distant city, and there give his time and services in performing his part of the contract for more than six months, and never intimated to him that he thought his services an inadequate consideration for the transfer, or the contract unfair or unjust. Held, that there is no standard by which the contract as to such defendant could be held to be unfair or unjust or based on an inadequate consideration, and sufficient facts were alleged and shown to establish, as required by Civ. Code, § 3391, that he received adequate consideration, and that the contract was not as to him unjust or unreasonable.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; N. P. Conrey, Judge.

Action by L. E. Wait against the Kern River Mining, Milling & Developing Company and another. From a judgment for defendants, and from an order denying a new trial, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Murphey & Schmidt, for appellant. Anderson & Anderson, for respondents.

ANGELLOTTI, J. This action was brought to obtain a decree that plaintiff is the owner of 245,000 shares of stock of the defendant corporation, and that the defendants have and hold the same in trust for the use and benefit of plaintiff, and requiring said corporation to issue to plaintiff said 245,000 shares. Defendant Latham having, prior to the institution of the action, absconded and left the state of California and his whereabouts being absolutely unknown, the only service of summons had upon him was by publication. He did not appear in the action. Defendant corporation answered, and the trial of the action was had as between it and plaintiff. The findings were substantially in favor of plaintiff upon all material issues except that of ownership of the stock, the court finding that it is not true that plaintiff is now, or ever was, the owner of said 245,000 shares of stock. The court concluding, as matter of law, that plaintiff was not such owner, and, further, that the court had never acquired jurisdiction of the person of defendant Latham, adjudged that plaintiff take nothing by his action, and that defendant corporation recover its costs of action. A motion for a new trial on the part of the plaintiff was denied. Plaintiff appeals from the judgment and from an order denying his motion for a new trial. The motion to dismiss the appeals was denied by the court when the case was called for oral argument.

Defendant corporation is a corporation organized and existing under the laws of the territory of Arizona, but all of its property is situate and all of its business carried on in this state, and it has its office in the city of Los Angeles. It was organized by Latham, the purpose thereof being the development and handling of certain mining claims in Kern county owned by him, and upon the facts set forth we are warranted in assuming that the sole purpose of its formation as stated in its articles of incorporation was the carrying on of business in the state of California. These mining claims were transferred by him to the corporation upon the understanding that 1,000,000 of the 2,000,000 of the shares of stock thereof should be owned and held by him and his associates, while the other 1,000,000 should be set aside as treasury stock, to be sold for the purpose of raising a fund with which to develop the property. Of his 1,000,000 shares, 500,000 were to be issued as demanded by him to himself or any other person, and the other 500,000 were issued to certain persons at his request. In May or June, 1903, Latham employed plaintiff to go to Chicago and endeavor to sell 50,000 shares of the treasury stock at ten cents per share, and promised that if he sold the same or any considerable portion thereof at that price "he would pay to plaintiff for his services" in making said sales 250,000 shares of his own stock, and also would see that the corporation paid him a certain commission on all stock sold. Latham thereupon caused 5,000 shares of his 250,000 to be issued to plaintiff, and the corporation agreed to pay him certain commissions and his expenses, a portion of which he had received. Plaintiff thereupon went to Chicago, and remained there until February, 1904, when he was recalled to California, and thereafter remained in California in the performance of service for the corporation. He had then obtained purchasers for about 17,000 shares at the designated price, and the sales thereof had been made and the proceeds sent to Latham, who was the president of the corporation. What plaintiff had done in Chicago was entirely satisfactory to Latham, and was "accepted by him as full performance of said agreement." Latham subsequently absconded and left the state, without having caused any of the 245,000 shares due plaintiff to be issued to him, and without having delivered to him any of the stock agreed to be delivered except 5,000 shares. Of Latham's original 500,000 unissued shares, more than 245,000 shares have never been issued by the corporation to Latham or anyone else. These facts were found by the trial court, and there is no sufficient specification of insufficiency of evidence as to any of them.

Defendant corporation was, of course, a mere trustee as to such of Latham's shares of stock as remained unissued, being entitled simply before being compelled to issue the same to any other person to be protected against any subsequent claim therefor by Latham. Its only other claim in regard thereto intimated by the record was a claim that it had a lien thereon for money which it claimed Latham had embezzled from it, but this may here be disregarded in view of the fact that the merits of such claim do not appear to have been determined by the trial court. The theory of plaintiff is that, by virtue of his performance of the terms of the agreement between himself and Latham, he became the owner in equity of 245,000 shares of Latham's unissued stock, with the consequent right to have the certificate for the same issued to him by the corporation, or at least, if he was not such owner, that he had such an interest in or lien on the stock as would warrant the relief sought against the corporation, even though by reason of his nonresidence personal service had not been made and cannot be made on Latham.

While Latham was undoubtedly a necessary party to this action, we are of the opinion that the constructive service of summons upon him was effectual to give the lower court jurisdiction to determine the rights of plaintiff against him so far as the disposition of any of the shares of the stock in question is concerned.

It does not appear to be questioned that the legal situs of the shares of stock constituting the subject-matter of this action is, for all purposes material here, in this state. It is well settled that, for purposes of execution or attachment, the situs of shares of stock is within the state where the corporation resides, and that they may lawfully be levied on in such state though owned by a nonresident. We can perceive no reason why the rule as to situs should not be the same as to any authorized proceeding to subject the stock to the lawful claim of another, whether that claim be one of ownership of the property or of a right to specific enforcement of a contract relative to it. In other words, wherever such stock constitutes the subject-matter of an action, we see no reason why it should not be held to be within the state where the corporation resides. That state is ordinarily, of course, the state by or under the laws of which the corporation was created. Defendant corporation was, as we have seen, organized under the laws of Arizona. But for all practical purposes, according to the record, it is a California corporation. Its contemplated business was all to be transacted in this state, all of its property is here, and it does business nowhere else. As was said by Judge Lurton of another corporation in Young v. South Tredeger Co., 85 Tenn. 189, 2 S. W. 202, 4 Am. St. Rep. 752, "its whole tangible and ponderable substance is in this state." It is a foreign corporation only in the sense that it is created in another state, and continues to enjoy corporate life by permission of that state. In every other sense, it is solely a California corporation. So far as it in fact does or can do business at all, it does it solely by permission of this state, and within its borders. Under such circumstances its residence in Arizona, or anywhere else outside of California, is the merest fiction. As to such a corporation, so organized and situated in regard to all its business and property, we can see no good reason why, as was said in the case last cited, "the fiction as to the situs of the corporation entity ought not to yield in the interest of justice to the actual facts," to an extent sufficient to warrant the holding that the corporation is sufficiently a resident of this state to bring it within the rule applicable to domestic corporations as to the situs of its stock.

The relief sought by plaintiff against Latham is in the nature of specific performance of a contract for the delivery of certain mining stock, in a case where all the conditions to be performed by him have been performed, and nothing remains to be done other than the mere delivery by Latham of the stock. If we are correct in what we have said as to the situs of this stock, we have an action for specific performance as against a party who is a nonresident and cannot be personally served with summons, in a case where the whole subject-matter of the contract is within this state, and nothing remains to be done but to compel a transfer thereof. While it is well settled that a decree for specific performance of a contract operates primarily in personam, yet in a limited and qualified sense it may also be said to operate in rem when property to be transferred under the contract is within the jurisdiction of the court, but the defendant is absent therefrom. See 26 Am. and Eng. Ency. of Law, p. 132. Where the whole relief sought consists in the mere delivery of property within the jurisdiction of the courts of a state to the party entitled thereto under a contract, the proceeding is in a sense one in rem, sufficiently so, in our judgment, to give such courts jurisdiction to effectuate a delivery as against a nonresident defendant. In the leading case of Pennoyer v. Neff, 95 U. S. 727, 24 L. Ed. 565, speaking of substituted service by publication, the United States Supreme Court, after saying that such service may be sufficient where property is once brought under the control of the court by seizure or some equivalent act, said: "Such service may also be sufficient in cases where the object of the action is to reach and dispose of property in the state, or of some interest therein, by enforcing a contract or a lien respecting the same." See, also, Boswell's Lessee v. Otis, 9 How. 348, 13 L. Ed. 164. In the case of Rourke v. McLaughlin, 38 Cal. 196, it was held, as one of the grounds of the decision, that specific performance would be decreed "whenever the parties, or the subject-matter, or so much thereof as is sufficient to enable the court to enforce its decree, is within the jurisdiction of the court." The contract there involved was one for the sale of land situate in this state, and the claim was that as the vendor was a resident of Ireland and beyond the jurisdiction of the court he could not be compelled to execute a conveyance. The court said that his absence will neither prevent his making a deed voluntarily, "nor prevent the courts of this state from compelling the deed to be given by the plaintiff himself, or by a commissioner appointed to act in his place," and that "specific performance" could be compelled, the whole subject-matter of the contract being within the jurisdiction of the courts of this state. Where nothing remains to be done under the contract but the transfer of property within this state by the nonresident, there is no difference in substance between the position of the plaintiff and the position of a creditor seeking to subject property of a nonresident by attachment proceedings to the payment of his asserted claim against such nonresident. In each, the plaintiff asserts his claim against the nonresident, the validity of which must be established in the proceeding. It is elementary that the claim may be so established in the latter case against a nonresident only constructively served with summons to an extent sufficient to enable plaintiff to devote the property of the defendant that is in this state and has been seized on attachment, to the payment of his claim. As to that property, his proceeding is one in rem. In the former case, the claimant is doing substantially the same thing. Specific property in this state is sought by the complaint, property in which by his full performance of his contract plaintiff has acquired an equitable interest, and the mere bringing of his action is equivalent to a seizure of the property for the purposes of the suit. See Heidritter v. Elizabeth Oil Cloth Co., 112 U. S. 301, 5 Sup. Ct. 135, 28 L. Ed. 729. No claim has been made in this case that the court was without jurisdiction as to Latham if a proper case for specific performance has been made to appear.

It is urged that there is a total lack of allegation and proof of facts necessary to bring the action within the exception to the rule that specific performance will not lie to compel a transfer of personal property, and nothing to overcome the presumption that an agreement to transfer personal property can be relieved by pecuniary compensation. Civ. Code, § 3387. The right of a court of equity to decree specific performance "does not turn at all upon the question whether the contract relates to real or personal property, but altogether upon the question whether the breach complained of can be adequately compensated in damages." Senter v. Davis, 38 Cal. 450, 452; Fleishman v. Woods, 135 Cal. 261, 67 Pac. 276. The presumption being that an agreement to transfer personal property can be so compensated, it is incumbent on one seeking specific performance in equity to allege facts showing the inadequacy of the legal remedy by way of damages. It is, however, not necessary to allege in terms that the legal remedy is inadequate, or that the breach cannot be adequately compensated in damages. Indeed, this might be held to be insufficient as being the allegation of a mere conclusion in a case where allegations of the specific facts justifying the conclusion were required. If the facts alleged and proved sufficiently show the inadequacy of the legal remedy, it is enough. If the property is of such a nature that the value of the performance cannot be estimated in money with any degree of certainty and taken in lieu of it, the inadequacy of the legal remedy is apparent. Senter v. Davis, supra. The complaint here shows that the stock was that of a mining corporation, whose property consisted of certain mining claims of unknown value. It is not in terms alleged that this stock had not at the time of the commencement of this action an established market value, but it is apparent enough that it cannot have such a value. In Treasurer v. Commercial, etc., Co., 23 Cal. 390, this court had occasion to consider the question of the sufficiency of a complaint in this respect, in an action for specific performance of a contract for the delivery of certain mining stock. A complaint which showed no more than that the stock was of a corporation formed for the purpose of mining for coal was held sufficient. It was pointed out that the only basis for the rule that specific performance will not be enforced for the transfer of stock is that the stock is capable of an exact compensation, and that the rule applied more particularly to public stocks, such as are commonly bought and sold in the market. The court said: "In the peculiar condition of business and mining operations in this state, where numerous mining and other corporations are in existence, whose stock is often of fluctuating and uncertain value, and where certain kinds of stocks have a peculiar value to those acquainted with their affairs, where the market value of stocks, if any they have, is often difficult to substantiate by competent evidence, and where the risk of the personal responsibility of individuals and corporations is so great, courts should be liberal in extending the full, adequate, and complete relief afforded by a decree of specific performance. In the view we have thus taken of the principles which should govern cases of this kind, the action of the court below was erroneous." This case has been approved and cited many times. It constitutes sufficient authority for the proposition that the complaint and findings in the case at bar show a case in which the legal remedy afforded by an action for damages may be held to be inadequate.

It is further urged that neither the complaint nor the decision of the trial court shows that Latham received an adequate consideration for the contract, or that the contract as to him was just and reasonable, in either of which cases the law specifies that specific performance cannot be enforced. Civ. Code, § 3391. Again it should be noted that it is not required to be alleged in the complaint in hæc verba that the contract was supported by an adequate consideration and is as to the defendant fair and just, but that it is sufficient to set forth facts from which the court is warranted in concluding that the consideration was adequate and the contract fair and just as to the defendant. See Stiles v. Cain, 134 Cal. 172, 66 Pac. 231; White v. Sage, 149 Cal. 616, 87 Pac. 193. Allegations of the complaint that were found to be true by the trial court fairly showed that the parties were dealing in reference to stock that had no value in the market and could be sold at as low a price even as ten cents per share only by having a promoter who could induce parties to see enough merit in the undeveloped mining claims to invest their money therein, and that the sale of some of the treasury stock was absolutely essential to any development of the claims and the giving of any value to Latham's stock. The agreement of Latham was practically to give one-quarter of his original allotment of stock, or one-half of the stock that he had retained for himself, to plaintiff if he would go into another state and sell a substantial amount of treasury stock for the purpose of obtaining money wherewith to do necessary development work and thus make the stock owned by him worth something. For services that resulted in producing the money absolutely essential to the development of mining claims that might, in fact, prove to be worth much or nothing, he was willing to give plaintiff one-half of his remaining interest in the claims. Under such circumstances, no one would be warranted in saying that the services contracted for did not constitute an adequate consideration or that the contract was not fair and just. The facts alleged and found are of such a nature that it is apparent that there is no standard by which this contract as to defendant can be held to be unfair or unjust or based on an inadequate consideration. It further appears that Latham allowed plaintiff, relying on the contract, to go to Chicago and there to give his time and services in performance of his part of the contract for a period of more than six months, and never intimated to plaintiff that he thought the consideration inadequate, or the contract in any way unfair or unjust. The case of Fleishman v. Woods, 135 Cal. 256, 67 Pac. 276, is sufficient authority for the ruling that sufficient facts are alleged and shown to establish that Latham received an adequate consideration for his contract, and that it was not as to him either unjust or unreasonable.

We are of the opinion that the complaint and the findings showed a sufficient case for specific performance as against Latham. If this be so, in view of what we have said, the judgment in favor of defendant corporation cannot be sustained.

The judgment and order denying a new trial are reversed.

We concur: SLOSS, J.; SHAW, J.

1. Cancellation of Instruments (§ 37*)—Offer to Return Consideration—Sufficiency.

The complaint, in an action to vacate for fraud a judgment in an action for divorce, which adjudges that plaintiff was not defendant's wife, and to declare void an agreement releasing all claims in the community property in consideration of a specified sum which was paid, which alleges that, in event plaintiff is successful and should ultimately be found entitled to receive as widow a share of the estate of her alleged deceased husband, she will credit the sum paid as a part of such share, taking only the balance, if any, does not contain a sufficient offer to return the sum paid to uphold the action to rescind the agreement, for, on the agreement being set aside and the judgment vacated, the question of plaintiff's marital status is reopened, and she may not succeed in obtaining any part of the estate, though she succeeds in the action.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; J. M. Seawell, Judge.

Action by Lucy Hite against the Mercantile Trust Company and others. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Stanton L. Carter, for appellant. E. W. McGraw, Titus & Creed, E. B. Young, and F. A. Denicke, for respondents.

SHAW, J. In the court below, upon sustaining the demurrer of certain of the defendants to the amended complaint, judgment was given in favor of said defendants against the plaintiff. The plaintiff appeals.

We think the judgment is not to be construed as a judgment in favor of all the defendants, but only in favor of those whose demurrer to the complaint had been sustained as therein recited. Hence the objection that the judgment was in favor of the other defendants and was consequently irregular is without foundation.

The complaint states facts upon which the plaintiff seeks a decree vacating a judgment against her in favor of one John R. Hite and declaring void certain agreements between her and said John R. Hite. The only points which it is necessary to notice may be presented by a brief outline of the facts stated in the voluminous complaint. Plaintiff alleges: That she intermarried with John R. Hite in the year 1872; that said marriage remained in full force until the death of John R. Hite, which event occurred on April 18, 1906; that in 1898 plaintiff began an action in the superior court of Mariposa county against Hite for a divorce and a division of the community property; that Hite answered denying the marriage relation; that on April 28, 1900, she was fraudulently induced to, and did, execute an agreement with Hite to release all her interest in his property and all claims against him, upon payment to her by him of the sum of $21,000, which agreement, however, does not appear to have been performed by either party; that on April 29, 1901, she was by Hite fraudulently induced to, and did, execute another agreement with him, whereby, in consideration of $16,000 then paid to her, she released all claims against him and all her present and future interest in his community property, and all interest as heir at law, or otherwise, in or against his estate after his death; that thereafter, at a date not stated, the divorce action was tried and judgment was given therein that she was not, and never had been, the wife of said Hite; that she take nothing by said action; and that this judgment also was obtained by fraud. The prayer is that these agreements be adjudged null and void and that the judgment be vacated. The facts constituting the alleged frauds by which it is claimed the plaintiff was led to execute said agreements and by which said judgment was obtained are fully set forth. It is unnecessary to state them at length.

There is no allegation that the plaintiff has ever returned or offered to return the $16,000 received by her in consideration of the agreement of April 29, 1901. She makes no offer to return it in her complaint. The only offer she makes is that, in the event she is successful in this suit and should ultimately be found entitled to receive, as widow of John R. Hite, a share of his estate, she will credit the $16,000 as a part of such share, taking only the balance, if any there be. This is not a sufficient offer. The action, so far as the agreements are concerned, is an action to rescind them. If the agreements were set aside and the judgment vacated, she would not, ipso facto, be entitled to a share as widow. The question would be merely reopened for further investigation of her marital status toward John R. Hite, of the nature and amount of his estate, and of the effect of his will, which gives nothing to the plaintiff. She may not succeed in obtaining any part of the estate, even if she should succeed in the present suit. No reason why the money was not returned before the beginning of this suit, or why an offer to return it was not made, is stated. Her offer, aforesaid, is futile and insufficient to uphold her action to rescind that agreement. Civ. Code, § 1691; Kelley v. Owens, 120 Cal. 507, 47 Pac. 369, 52 Pac. 797; Westerfield v. New York, etc., Co., 129 Cal. 84, 58 Pac. 92, 61 Pac. 667; Matteson v. Wagoner, 147 Cal. 744, 82 Pac. 436; Hill v. North P. Ry. Co., 113 Fed. 919, 51 C. C. A. 544. The agreement of April 28, 1900, was not carried out, and the averments regarding it are material only upon the question of fraud in procuring the second agreement and the judgment.

This obstacle to the maintenance of any action to rescind or annul the agreement of April 29, 1901, is also fatal to the case so far as it is an action to set aside the judgment in Hite v. Hite. That was an action for divorce. When John R. Hite died, the marriage was dissolved, and the divorce action, if then pending, or if now reopened, would necessarily abate and would fail because its subject-matter, the marriage relation, had ceased to exist. Kirschner v. Dietrich, 110 Cal. 502, 42 Pac. 1064; Smith v. Smith, 124 Cal. 653, 57 Pac. 573; Begbie v. Begbie, 128 Cal. 155, 60 Pac. 667, 49 L. R. A. 141.

The only thing left for dispute between Lucy Hite, conceding her to be the widow of John R. Hite, and the defendants, who claim under his will, would be the respective interests of the parties in his estate. If plaintiff could establish her status as his lawful wife at the time of his death, she would be entitled to a widow's share in the community property. But the effect of the agreement aforesaid was to release and extinguish all the rights she then had in his property as his wife, and all she might thereafter have as his widow. It completely estops her from claiming any part of his property, or right therein of any kind, after his death as well as before. As she has shown no right to have this agreement set aside or disregarded, it follows that she fails to show that the setting aside of the judgment would give her any right or interest in the property, the only remaining subject of the litigation. Equity will never interfere to vacate a judgment where the party seeking the relief could not possibly derive any benefit from the relief sought. The defendants have no interest in her mere personal status, unless it could affect the property which they hold. As it cannot do that, no cause of action against them is shown. Bell v. Thompson, 147 Cal. 693, 82 Pac. 327; Whitney v. Kelley, 94 Cal. 153, 29 Pac. 624, 15 L. R. A. 813, 28 Am. St. Rep. 106.

There are several other objections which the respondent contends would justify the ruling of the court below sustaining the demurrer. It is urged: That the superior court of San Francisco could not entertain a suit to vacate the judgment of the superior court of Mariposa county; that the action, being an action for divorce, the death of Hite would discontinue it as to the property regardless of the effect of the agreement of release; that no ability to prove the marriage relation is shown, even if a new trial were granted; that the action is barred by the statute of limitations and by laches; and that the complaint is uncertain in many material particulars. In view of our conclusions above stated, it is not necessary to pass upon these objections, and we express no opinion concerning them.

The judgment is affirmed.

WOLFF v. CLOYNE. (L. A. 2,316.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 15, 1909.)

1. Appeal and Error (§ 1011*)—Findings—Conclusiveness.

A finding on conflicting evidence will not be disturbed on appeal.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 3983; Dec. Dig. § 1011.*]

2. Specific Performance (§ 32*)—Contracts Enforceable—Mutual Contracts.

A purchaser, in a contract for the sale of real estate which provided for a mortgage for a deferred payment of the price, contracted to sell to a third person, for cash, on the delivery of the deed. Negotiations between the purchaser and the vendor for the payment of the entire price and the immediate execution of the deed were then pending, and subsequently the vendor agreed to convey at once on receiving payment of the price. Held, that the contract with the third person was mutual and enforceable, notwithstanding Civ. Code, § 3390, subd. 4, providing that an agreement to perform an act which the party has not the power lawfully to perform and require to do cannot be specifically enforced.

3. Vendor and Purchaser (§ 22*) — Contracts—Description—Sufficiency.

A contract for the sale of real estate, which describes the land as lying north of the R. and D. place, and being the same the vendor had lately bought, sufficiently described the land, it appearing the the vendor had lately bought land situated as described, under an agreement which described a right of way, as the extrinsic circumstances expressly referred to sufficed to make the description complete and certain as against the objection that the contract was uncertain because not mentioning the right of way.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Vendor and Purchaser, Cent. Dig. § 27; Dec. Dig. § 22.*]

4. Vendor and Purchaser (§ 22*) — Contracts—Description—Sufficiency.

A contract for the sale of real estate is not uncertain because not mentioning a right of way, when the right of way will go with the land as an appurtenant, though not specifically described.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Vendor and Purchaser, Cent. Dig. § 27; Dec. Dig. § 22.*]

5. Frauds, Statute of (§ 131*)—Sale of Land — Contracts — Description—Sufficiency.

A contract, in writing, for the sale of real estate, which binds the vendor to sell a piece of land, 245 acres, more or less, at a specified sum per acre, payable on the delivery of the deed, makes the price depend on the number of acres, and by implication provides for the ascertainment of the area by a survey, or otherwise, and a subsequent oral agreement that the deed shall not be made until the area has been ascertained by a survey which the vendor is to make adds nothing to the contract and does not bring it within the statute of frauds.

6. PLEADING (§ 433*)—DEFECTS—CURED BY FINDING.

Where, in an action for the specific performance of a contract for the sale of real estate, the answer alleged facts showing that the contract was not fair or reasonable, and a large part of the evidence was devoted to the issue whether the contract was fair and reasonable, defects in the form of the averments of the complaint in that respect were cured by the answer and a finding that the contract was fair and reasonable.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Pleading, Cent. Dig. § 1456; Dec. Dig. § 433.*]

7. SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE (§ 131*)—DECREE—REQUISITES.

Where the complaint, in an action for the specific performance of a contract for the sale of real estate, alleged that the deed tendered to the purchaser before the action was begun was filed with the clerk of the court for delivery to the purchaser under conditions ordered by the court, the better practice required the insertion, in the judgment awarding relief, of the proper direction to the clerk for the delivery of the deed on satisfaction of the judgment.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Specific Performance, Cent. Dig. § 426; Dec. Dig. § 131.*]

8. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1152*)—DEFECTS—CORRECTION ON APPEAL.

Where the judgment for specific performance of a contract for the sale of real estate according to the complaint, which alleged that the deed tendered to the purchaser before the beginning of the action was filed with the clerk of the court for delivery to the purchaser under conditions to be imposed by the court, does not mention the land or the deed, nor give any directions concerning its delivery, but simply adjudges that the vendor shall recover of the purchaser the balance of the price, the court, on appeal, will modify the judgment by inserting therein the proper direction to the clerk for the delivery of the deed on satisfaction of the judgment.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Ventura County; Felix W. Ewing, Judge.

Action by M. L. Wolff against Thomas Cloyne. From a judgment for plaintiff and from an order denying a new trial, defendant appeals. Modified and affirmed.

I. W. Stewart and Orestes Orr, for appellant. Chas. F. Blackstock, for respondent.

SHAW, J. The defendant appeals from the judgment and from an order denying his motion for a new trial. The complaint states a cause of action to enforce specific performance of the following contract: "Oxnard, December 29, '06. I have this day sold to Tom Cloyne and Tom Cloyne has bought of M. L. Wolff a certain Pce of land some 245 acres more or less lying north of the Revolon & Dreyfus place and being the same Pce M. L. Wolff bought lately at 70.00 per acre one thousand dollars receipt of which is hereby acknowledged balance payable when deed is given subject to lease given to Otte. M. L. Wolff. Thomas Cloyne." It is alleged that this contract was intended to and in fact did refer to a certain tract of land, the description of which is fully set forth. The land is a part of a larger rectangular-shaped tract containing 320 acres, known as "parcel E," running a mile east and west and half a mile north and south, bounded on the west by a road known as the "Wood road." A slough extended across the western part of this tract, from north to south, leaving about 75 acres between it and said road. The tract described as sold, and which Wolff had then recently bought, was the portion of the 320 acres lying east of the slough and including a right of way over a strip along the bank of the slough, northwesterly over the land lying north, from the northwest corner of the land sold to the Wood road, a distance of about 900 feet. The punctuation of the contract, as shown in the record, is such as to leave the price uncertain. It is not controverted, however, that the words "70.00 per acre" states the price of the sale to Cloyne and not the price for which Wolff had "bought lately." The answer admits the execution of the contract, but avers that defendant entered into it in the erroneous belief, induced by Wolff's representations at and before the time of its execution, that the tract referred to extended to and abutted upon said Wood road and included the whole of said "parcel E"; whereas, in fact, there is no road or other means of access to the tract described in the complaint, and it extends west only to the slough.

The court found that all the allegations of the complaint were true, that the land was worth the price stated, that the right of way mentioned in the description set forth in the complaint afforded means of access to it, and that the defendant did not make the contract under any mistake as to its size or location, but was fully informed thereof. It is contended that the facts particularly stated are not sustained by the evidence. Upon these points the case as presented is the familiar one of a conflict in the evidence. There was abundant evidence to sustain the court's findings and some to the contrary. In such a case the findings are conclusive upon this court. A review of the evidence would be of no value. At the time the contract was made, Wolff did not have title to the land, but held an agreement or option to purchase it from the real owner. The price named being $70 per acre, a survey was necessary to fix the exact quantity and price of the land, and at the time of its execution there was an oral agreement that Wolff would have a survey made, and that as soon as this could be done the deed would be made and the balance of the price paid. The option which Wolff held had, by its terms, expired before the sale from Wolff to Cloyne; but it had been extended for an indefinite period by the owner.

It is contended that the contract was not mutual, and therefore not enforceable, because Wolff did not then hold the title. He had at that time a valid agreement from one Etting, the real owner, under which he could obtain title. This agreement provided for a mortgage for certain deferred payments of the price, but at the time of the contract with Cloyne negotiations were pending between Wolff and Etting for the payment of the entire price and the execution of a deed from Etting to Wolff immediately. This was afterwards agreed to between them, and as soon as Wolff could get the necessary survey made he paid Etting, obtained the title, and tendered to Cloyne a good and sufficient deed purporting to convey the land to Cloyne, which Cloyne refused to accept. These conditions are sufficient to make the contract mutual. Easton v. Montgomery, 90 Cal. 315, 27 Pac. 280, 25 Am. St. Rep. 123; Civ. Code, § 3390, subd. 4. At the time Wolff was required to convey the title, he had obtained it, and Cloyne could then have enforced performance, had Wolff refused it.

There is no merit in the point that the contract of Wolff and Cloyne is uncertain because it did not mention the right of way to the Wood road. It described the land as that which Wolff had lately bought, lying north of the Revolon and Dreyfus place. He had lately bought a tract thus situated from Burson, to whom the agreement from Etting, the owner, had been executed. This agreement described the right of way in question. The extrinsic circumstances thus expressly referred to sufficed to make the description complete and certain. Furthermore, the right of way established by the Etting agreement and deed would constitute an appurtenance, and would go with the land, although not specifically described in subsequent deeds. Rianda v. Watsonville, etc., Co., 152 Cal. 527, 528, 93 Pac. 79; Stanislaus W. Co. v. Bachman, 152 Cal. 724, 93 Pac. 858, 15 L. R. A. (N. S.) 359.

The oral agreement that the deed was not to be made until the area of the land was ascertained by a survey which Wolff was to have made does not render the contract void. By the contract, Wolff agreed to sell "a certain Pce of land some 245 acres more or less * * * at 70.00 per acre." It sufficiently identified the land, but the price depended on the number of acres it contained. The price could be made certain by a survey or by agreement as to the area, and they chose to have it fixed by a survey. The price could not be fully paid until it was ascertained. By the express terms of the contract, the deed was not to be made until the price was paid. By implication, therefore, the deal was not to be closed until a survey was made, or the area ascertained in some way. The oral agreement added nothing to the force of the agreement to convey, except to put the burden of the survey upon Wolff, instead of upon both of them. This we regard as immaterial and not sufficient to bring the contract within the statute of frauds.

It is further claimed that the complaint does not show that the contract is just and reasonable. It is alleged that the contract is fair, reasonable, and just, that defendant lived in that vicinity, that he was a successful farmer, and had known the land for many years, that land adjacent to it has been sold since at the same price, and that the land in question produces crops annually that pay a reasonable interest on the price agreed upon. The evidence that the land, at the time of the sale and ever since, was worth at least the price fixed by the contract, was full and satisfactory. It is not disputed that the defendant had been for many years a successful farmer of that vicinity, nor that he examined the land the day before the contract was made. The proof that the contract was fair, just, and reasonable was ample. The complaint does not directly allege the value, and its averments on the general subject are somewhat argumentative and indefinite. The answer contains elaborate averments that the land was worth far less than the price, and other facts to show that the contract was not fair, just, or reasonable. It is apparent that the parties understood that this issue was presented. A large part of the evidence on both sides was devoted to the question whether or not the contract was fair, just, and reasonable, and that seems to have been the principal controversy. We think the defects in the form of the averments of the complaint in that respect should be considered as cured by the answer and by the findings and judgment.

The complaint alleges that the deed which was tendered to the defendant before the action was begun was filed with the clerk of the court "to be delivered to the defendant under such conditions as said superior court may order and direct." The finding is that this is true. The judgment does not mention the land or the deed, nor give any directions concerning its delivery. It is a simple judgment that the plaintiff recover of the defendant the balance of money found to be due upon the contract of sale. It can scarcely be supposed that the defendant would have any difficulty in obtaining such delivery of the deed upon payment of the judgment. The better practice, however, in all such cases, is to insert in the decree the proper direction to the clerk for the delivery of the deed upon satisfaction of the judgment. It is not necessary to reverse the judgment for this defect. It can be cured by a modification thereof. There are no other points requiring discussion.

The order denying a new trial is affirmed. The judgment is hereby modified by adding thereto the following clause: Payment of the sums herein adjudged to the plaintiff may be made to the clerk of this court for the plaintiff, and said clerk shall thereupon deliver to the defendant, his heirs, assigns, or legal representatives, the deed for the land in controversy deposited by plaintiff with the clerk at the beginning of this action. If such payment is made to the sheriff, said deed shall be delivered to the sheriff by the clerk and by the sheriff delivered to defendant upon payment. If paid to the plaintiff, he shall concurrently deliver the deed.

As thus modified, the judgment is affirmed. Defendant shall recover of the plaintiff one-third of the costs of the transcript on appeal.

CONTINENTAL BUILDING & LOAN ASS'N v. WOOLF et al. (Civ. 670.)

(Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Nov. 6, 1909.)

1. Courts (§ 85*) — Rules of Court — Construction.

The rules of the Supreme Court governing the practice in the appellate courts should be substantially followed and enforced.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Courts, Cent. Dig. §§ 296, 297; Dec. Dig. § 85.*]

2. Appeal and Error (§ 628*) — Transcript on Appeal—Failure to File in Time—Excuse.

Appellant prepared, in due time, a draft of the proposed bill of exceptions. Respondent obtained extensions of time to prepare amendments until April 10th. Appellant's counsel was compelled to go to a distant city on March 30th on official business, and he did not return until April 18th. On the following day he found in his office proposed amendments to the bill of exceptions, and he immediately requested the trial judge to fix an early date so that the transcript on appeal might be filed within 40 days after March 29th. The judge fixed April 23d; but respondent caused a delay in the settlement thereof, and the bill of exceptions was not settled and signed until April 30th. Appellant at once prepared the necessary papers for the transcript; but, because of official duties of appellant's attorney, the transcript was not filed until May 21st. Held to show a reasonable excuse for the delay in the preparation of the transcript within Court Rules 2, 5 (78 Pac. vii, viii), requiring the filing of the transcript within 40 days, etc., though the fact that an attorney is busy attending to other engagements is not of itself sufficient to excuse a failure to file the transcript within the time limited.

3. Appeal and Error (§ 625*)—Filing Abstract on Appeal—Sufficiency.

Counsel for appellant served the transcript on appeal at 10 o'clock and was at the office of the clerk of the Court of Appeal at about a quarter to 1, and there left the original transcript with the requisite number of copies with the deputy clerk of the Supreme Court, with the request that he file the transcript in the office of the Court of Appeal on the return of the clerk thereto, and the deputy agreed to, and did, so file the transcript. Notice of motion to dismiss the appeal for failure to file the transcript on time was served on appellant's counsel at 23 minutes to 1 o'clock on the same day. Held to justify a finding that the transcript on appeal was on file at the time of the notice and filing of the motion to dismiss within the spirit of Court Rule 5 (78 Pac. viii), providing that where the transcript, though not filed within the time prescribed, is on file at the time the notice to dismiss is given, that fact shall be a sufficient answer to the motion to dismiss the appeal for failure to file the transcript on time.

4. Appeal and Error (§ 956*)—Discretion of Court—Review.

Whether circumstances of a particular case are such that a mistake or inadvertence should be excused is left largely to the court to which application is made, and its decision will not be disturbed except in a clear case of abuse of discretion.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 3810; Dec. Dig. § 956.*]

5. Appeal and Error (§ 2*)—Right of Appeal—Procedure.

The right of appeal is conferred by the Constitution and statute, and the rules of procedure for its exercise must be liberally construed.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 3-5; Dec. Dig. § 2.*]

6. Appeal and Error (§ 942*) — Review — Rules of Court—Discretion in Application.

Though the rules of court cannot be arbitrarily set aside, a reasonable discretion should be committed to the District Courts of Appeal in the decision of questions involving the application of those rules in cases coming to those courts by direct appeal.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 3808; Dec. Dig. § 942.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; J. M. Seawell, Judge.

Action by the Continental Building & Loan Association against Louis Woolf and another. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. On motion to dismiss appeal. Denied.

Wm. Hoff Cook, for appellants. Gavin McNab, for respondent.

HART, J. This is a motion to dismiss the appeal in this action on the ground that no transcript herein has been filed within the time prescribed by rule 2 of this court (78 Pac. vii).

The record on this motion and upon which it is pressed consists of a certificate of the county clerk of the city and county of San Francisco, a certificate of the clerk of the District Court of Appeal of the First District, an affidavit of Bronte M. Aikins, one of the attorneys for the respondent, and an affidavit of the attorney for the appellants.

From the certificate of the county clerk these facts appear:

That a judgment was rendered by the superior court in and for the city and county of San Francisco and entered in favor of plaintiff and against defendants, for the possession of certain real property, situated in said city and county, on the 2d day of December, 1908; that thereafter, on the 29th day of March, 1909, a notice of appeal was filed by defendants, appealing from said judgment; that said notice of appeal was served upon the attorneys for plaintiff on said 29th day of March, 1909; that an undertaking on appeal was filed by the appellants on the 9th day of April, 1909; that "the sureties thereon made affidavit in the sum of $150 each and no more"; that "the only bill of exceptions or statement on appeal settled herein is a bill of exceptions upon a motion to set aside said judgment"; that the appellants received a duly certified transcript of the record herein on the 17th day of May, 1909; and "that no notice of a motion for a new trial, or order denying a new trial herein, is of record in this office."

Aikins deposes that on the 29th day of March, 1909, the defendants served on attorneys for the plaintiff a notice of appeal from the judgment entered in favor of plaintiff and against the defendants on the 2d day of December, 1909; "that no notice of motion for a new trial, or order denying a new trial herein, has been served upon attorneys for plaintiff herein." Aikins further deposes, in his affidavit of service of the notice of motion to dismiss the appeal, that he served said notice on the attorney for the appellants at 23 minutes to 1 o'clock p. m., on said 21st day of May, 1909.

The clerk of the District Court of Appeal for the First District, to which court this cause was originally appealed, it having been subsequently transferred to this court for decision, certifies that the transcript was filed in his office on the day on which the notice of motion to dismiss the appeal was filed, to wit, on the 21st day of May, 1909; the notice of motion to dismiss having been filed first in point of time, according to the order in which the filings appear in the register of actions of said court.

Resistance to the motion to dismiss is interposed and based upon the affidavit of Wm. Hoff Cook, attorney for the appellants. The facts set forth in said affidavit are, in substance, as follows, after reciting the fact of the judgment having been entered against the appellants: That affiant, in behalf of his clients, moved to set aside and vacate said judgment and that on February 11, 1909, the court made the following order on said motion: "Ordered that if, within 15 days, defendants pay to plaintiff the sum of $1,062, said motion be granted, and, if not so paid, motion be denied." That defendants did not receive notice of said order until March 3, 1909, and then refused to abide thereby. That "in due time thereafter affiant duly prepared a draft of a proposed bill of exceptions in relation to said judgment and motion and order, but plaintiff's attorneys obtained extensions of time to prepare any amendments thereto until April 10, 1909." That affiant, who is assistant district attorney of the city and county of San Francisco, was, as such official, on the 30th day of March, 1909, compelled to go to the city of Washington, D. C., on official business, and there argue cases before the United States Supreme Court, and that he returned from Washington on the 18th day of April, 1909. On the following day, April 19th, affiant found in his office certain proposed amendments of plaintiff to said bill of exceptions; said amendments having been left there during his absence. That affiant "immediately requested the judge of said court to fix an early date for the settlement of said bill," urging the fact that he desired to have the transcript on appeal filed within 40 days from March 29, 1909. That thereupon said judge fixed April 23, 1909, as the time for the settlement of said bill, "but plaintiff through an attorney caused a delay of the settlement thereof, and affiant stated several times to said attorney of plaintiff that he wished to have an immediate settlement thereof for the aforesaid reasons, but said attorney then and there representing plaintiff asked for continuances and told said judge and affiant that the time for filing said transcript would not begin to run until the settlement of said bill of exceptions, and affiant considered said statements in the nature of a stipulation or an estoppel extending the time for filing such transcript on appeal. That said bill of exceptions, by reason of plaintiff's acts, was not settled and signed until April 30, 1909." Affiant alleges: That he at once proceeded to prepare the necessary papers for said transcript so that it could be printed. That he put the transcript in the hands of the printer on the 4th day of May, and urged the printing of the same so that he could have it for filing on the 9th day of May, but that the printer did not have the printed transcript completed until May 13, 1909. That on May 14th he "furnished a copy thereof to plaintiff's attorney with the original thereof, and requested him to sign the stipulation therein as to its correctness," which plaintiff's attorney refused to do, "stating that he did not have the time to spare, and thereupon affiant took such original to the county clerk and requested his certificate thereto. That said county clerk could not, and did not, give affiant said original again until the afternoon of May 17, 1909." On the last-mentioned date, affiant was required by his official duties to prepare a brief in an important criminal case, then pending on appeal before the Supreme Court, which brief was required to be prepared, printed, and filed by May 22, 1909. That on May 18, 1909, affiant was, in his official capacity, engaged during the entire day in the argument of a case before one of the departments of the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco, and that on the 19th and 20th of May affiant was engaged in writing the brief referred to, finishing the preparation of the same on the 20th of May. On the 21st of May, 1909, about the hour of 10 o'clock a. m., affiant served the transcript on appeal on plaintiff's attorney, and later that morning "made corrections in the copies to correspond with the said original, as certified by the county clerk, and it was impossible for affiant to file said original transcript before 1 o'clock p. m. of said 21st day of May, 1909, by reason of being obliged to make said corrections, and by reason of being occupied with other official matters, and furthermore affiant had no reason to believe from the past conduct of plaintiff's attorney that he claimed said transcript to have been served too late." Affiant explains that he caused the transcript to be filed under the following circumstances: "About quarter of 1 o'clock of May 21, 1909, affiant was at the office of the clerk of this court to file said original transcript on appeal, and also the requisite number of copies thereof, but said office was closed, and thereupon affiant went into the office of the clerk of the state Supreme Court, in the same building, and on the same floor thereof, to leave there the requisite number of copies of said transcript for said court, and the official then in charge of said office was Mr. I. Erb. That affiant left with said Erb said copies, and also said Erb took said original transcript on appeal and the requisite number of copies thereof for this court, and told affiant that he would deliver the same to the clerk of this court as soon as he returned, and affiant is informed, and therefore alleges, that said Erb did as he promised."

The fact is not disputed that the transcript was not filed within 40 days after the perfection of the appeal, as required by rule 2, and the further fact that at the precise time of the filing of the motion to dismiss the appeal the transcript had not been actually filed, is not disputed.

Rule 5 of the Supreme Court provides, among other things, that "if the transcript, or points and authorities, though not filed within the time prescribed, be on file at the time such notice is given, that fact shall be a sufficient answer to the motion."

Briefly recapitulating the facts, we find that counsel for appellants served the transcript at about 10 o'clock of the 21st day of May, and the notice of motion to dismiss the appeal was served on appellants' counsel at 23 minutes to 1 o'clock p. m., of the same day. Counsel for appellants was at the office of the clerk of the court of appeal at about quarter to 1 p. m., and, the clerk of said court not being present, he left the original, with the requisite number of copies, with a deputy clerk of the Supreme Court, whose office is located in the same building and on the same floor, with the request that he file said transcript for him in the first-mentioned office as soon as the clerk thereof returned thereto, and that said deputy agreed to and did so file it. But it seems that, in what appears to have been a contest of speed between opposing counsel to reach the office of the clerk of the District Court of Appeal for "first place," the attorneys for the respondent were victorious, only by a "neck," however. It is probable that, had the clerk been in his office when counsel for appellants first appeared there, the transcript would have at least been filed before the motion to dismiss was filed. Under these circumstances, however, it is asked that the appellants be deprived of their right to have the merits of their appeal passed upon by this court.

We recognize the proposition that the rules adopted by the Supreme Court for the government of the practice in the appellate courts of this state are as essential a part of the procedure in said courts as are the rules of practice and procedure laid down by the Legislature, and that they should in all cases be substantially followed and enforced. But we think that, by an equitable construction of rule 5, with reference to the circumstances of this case, appellants may be relieved of the severe penalty which counsel for the respondent ask us to impose upon them. We think that counsel for appellants offers a reasonable excuse for the delay in the preparation of his transcript so that it was not in condition to be served and filed within the 40 days prescribed by rule 2, supra, and we further think that, inasmuch as it appears, with reasonable certainty, from the fact of the service of the transcript before notice of the motion was given, that appellants intended, when making the service thereof, to file said transcript the very same day of such service, and from the fact that they did actually file it on that day, it would do no violence to rule 5 to hold that the transcript was on file at the time of the noticing and filing of the motion to dismiss within the spirit if not within the strict letter of said rule.

In Vinson v. Los Angeles Pac. R. R. Co., 147 Cal. 483, 82 Pac. 54, it is said: "Whether or not circumstances of a particular case are such that the mistake or inadvertence should be excused is a question the determination of which must, of necessity, be left largely to the court to which application is made, and it is well settled that this court will not interfere with the exercise of the discretion of that tribunal, except in a case where a clear abuse of discretion is apparent. Particularly is this so where the discretion is exercised in favor of the granting of the relief sought, as such action tends to bring about a conclusion on the merits, which is always to be desired"—citing O'Brien v. Leach, 139 Cal. 220, 72 Pac. 1004, 96 Am. St. Rep. 105. It is further said in that case that "the application for relief was made so promptly after the expiration of the 10 days that no appreciable injury could have been caused to plaintiffs by the delay."

The transcript here was filed and the notice to dismiss given in such close proximity in time that it cannot be said that the granting to appellants relief from their apparent default has resulted, or will result, in injury to the respondent.

The right of appeal is conferred by the Constitution, and statutes and rules of procedure for its exercise are to be liberally construed. Estate of Nelson, 128 Cal. 242, 60 Pac. 772. There is no denial here of any of the matters set forth in the affidavit of counsel for appellants with respect to the causes leading to the delay in the preparation of his transcript. While we do not wish to be understood as holding that the fact that an attorney is busy attending to other professional engagements is sufficient of itself to excuse a default such as is sought to be taken advantage of here, it is nevertheless a circumstance to be considered, and, as considered with other facts set out in the affidavit of appellants' attorney, it must figure to some extent in the determination of the question whether the appellants shall, in this case, be denied their remedy by appeal which the Constitution expressly grants to them.

The motion here, it must be remembered, is an original proceeding in this court in a case appealable directly to a District Court of Appeal, and we think that, while the rules of the court cannot under any circumstances be arbitrarily overlooked or set aside, a reasonable discretion should be committed to the District Courts of Appeal in the decision of questions involving the application of those rules in cases coming to said courts by direct appeal.

Even if, in reaching the conclusion upon this motion to which the circumstances lead us, rule 5 has been given a little elasticity, the respondent must in fairness concede that the result is just and "tends to bring about a conclusion on the merits which is always to be desired." Vinson v. L. A. P. R. Co., supra.

For the foregoing reasons, the motion to dismiss the appeal is denied.

PEOPLE v. BRENT. (Cr. 135.)

(Court of Appeal, Second District, California. Nov. 6, 1909. Rehearing Denied Dec. 6, 1909.)

1. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 354*)—EVIDENCE—MENTAL CONDITION.

When the mental condition of one at a particular time is in issue, conduct, acts, and declarations, after as well as before the time in question, are admissible, if sufficiently near in point of time, and if they appear to have any tendency to show what that mental condition was.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 760; Dec. Dig. § 354.*]

2. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 670*) — TRIAL — RECEPTION OF EVIDENCE.

That the court may intelligently rule on an objection to a question not of itself showing its relevancy or materiality, counsel must state what is expected to be proven.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 1593; Dec. Dig. § 670.*]

3. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1036*) — APPEAL — REVIEW.

Where counsel does not state to the court what is expected to be proven by a question not of itself showing its relevancy or materiality, the appellate court cannot determine whether defendant's substantial rights have been prejudiced by the ruling.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Dec. Dig. § 1036.*]

4. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 667*)—EVIDENCE—MENTAL CONDITION—DISCRETION OF COURT.

The admissibility of statements made by accused before and after the commission of the crime, and offered to show insanity, is very much in the discretion of the trial court.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Frank R. Willis, Judge.

Sanford Brent was convicted of assault with intent to murder, and from the judgment, and from an order denying a new trial, he appeals. Affirmed.

Wesley H. Beach, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and George Beebe, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

ALLEN, P. J. The defendant and appellant was accused by the district attorney of Los Angeles county, by information, of the crime of assault with a deadly weapon with intent to commit murder, and his conviction followed. This appeal is from the judgment imposed by reason thereof, and from an order denying a new trial.

The defense chiefly relied upon was insanity. The principal assignments of error relate to the action of the court in sustaining objections to testimony offered by defendant. One witness in behalf of the defense testified that she was a nurse at the hospital of which defendant was a patient; that "he seemed to be laboring under a nervous strain, and it looked as though he had been drinking." The witness was then asked by defendant's counsel if he made any statement regarding the cause of his condition; "what statement he made in relation to his domestic affairs"; "what statement, if any, was made by the defendant at that time regarding any lawsuit pending"; and, again, "what statement, if any, regarding his property." Another witness was asked questions of similar import, while still another, who, having seen and conversed with defendant at the hospital, testified: "He was very nervous and absent-minded. Instead of answering my questions, he would dismiss them from his mind as if he could not comprehend what I had said." Thereupon counsel for defendant asked, "What was the question you asked him"? and, in addition, propounded questions similar to those asked other witnesses, as before stated. All of these witnesses united in an opinion that defendant acted in an irrational manner. The court sustained an objection to the questions relating to what was said by the defendant to these various witnesses.

The proposition advanced by appellant, to the effect that, when the mental condition of one at a particular time is in issue, conduct, acts, and declarations after, as well as before, the time in question are admissible in evidence, if sufficiently near in point of time, and if they appear to have any tendency to show what that mental condition was, may be accepted. It follows that the questions propounded by defendant, to which objections were sustained, under certain circumstances might have been proper, if they were intended to develop facts the establishment of which would tend to prove insanity. But that a court may intelligently rule upon an objection urged to a question which does not of itself show its relevancy or materiality, it is imperative that counsel should state to the court what is expected to be proven. Without such statement, the court cannot determine whether the facts sought to be established by the question are pertinent or tend to prove any matter involved in the issues, and this court cannot, in the absence of such statements, determine whether or not the substantial rights of the defendant have been prejudiced by the ruling. People v. Casselman, 101 Pac. 693; People v. Ellsworth, 127 Cal. 596, 60 Pac. 161. Even had these questions so propounded been followed by statements of what was expected to be proven, the admissibility thereof, having in view the lapse of time between the conversations and the date of the tragedy, together with the character of the evidence offered, was very much within the discretion of the court. Estate of McKenna, 143 Cal. 586, 77 Pac. 461. The criticism above made applies equally to other questions asked concerning conversations of defendant with other witnesses as to his wife's conduct and relations with another man and the discords connected with his married life. None of these things were made to appear as reflecting any light upon the mental condition of the accused; nor can it be said that the questions asked the wife on cross-examination of themselves indicated the object sought to be attained, or that any answer thereto would in any wise be competent, relevant, or material.

While it may be conceded that the record discloses that the court misapprehended the real object of the questions, and excluded the evidence upon such ground as to develop a misunderstanding of the point involved, yet the occasion of such misunderstanding and misapprehension arose from the omission of defendant to indicate to the court the purpose of the questions and the objects sought to be attained thereby, if, as before stated, such object was to establish the insanity of defendant.

We find no error in the record, and the judgment and order are affirmed.

SAN FRANCISCO SULPHUR CO. v. ÆTNA INDEMNITY CO. (Civ. 645.)

(Court of Appeal, First District, California. Nov. 10, 1909. Rehearing Denied Dec. 9, 1909; Denied by Supreme Court Jan. 6, 1910.)

1. PLEADING (§ 205*) — VARIANCE—VARIANCE BETWEEN ALLEGATIONS AND EXHIBIT—MANNER OF RAISING OBJECTION.

Variance between allegations of the complaint and an exhibit attached thereto cannot be raised by general demurrer, but only by special demurrer.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Pleading, Cent. Dig. § 507; Dec. Dig. § 205.*]

2. PLEADING (§ 312*)—COMPLAINT—EXHIBITS —EFFECT OF ALLEGATIONS.

In an action on an undertaking given to discharge an attachment the title of the undertaking which was attached to the complaint as an exhibit, and recitals in the body thereof, showing that the original action was brought against certain persons as individuals, could not be taken as an allegation of such fact; the complaint alleging that the action was against a firm.

3. PLEADING (§ 433*) — VARIANCE—VARIANCE BETWEEN EXHIBIT AND COMPLAINT—AIDER BY JUDGMENT.

In an action on an undertaking given to discharge an attachment, allegations of the complaint that the original action was against a firm will control recitals in the undertaking attached thereto as an exhibit that it was against certain persons as individuals, where the variance was first raised after judgment at the oral argument on appeal.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Pleading, Cent. Dig. § 1458; Dec. Dig. § 433.*]

4. EVIDENCE (§ 83*)—RELEASING BONDS—ACTIONS—PRESUMPTIONS—LEGALITY OF OFFICIAL ACTIONS.

Since under Code Civ. Proc. § 540, a sheriff may release property from attachment any time before his return, but can only release it after making return upon an order of court as provided in sections 554, 555, where the complaint, in an action on a releasing bond, alleged that the sheriff accepted the undertaking and discharged the attachment, it will be assumed that he acted legally and received the undertaking before the writ was returned.

5. ATTACHMENT (§ 337*)—BOND FOR RELEASE —DISCHARGE OF SURETIES—BANKRUPTCY OF PRINCIPAL.

Under Bankr. Act July 1, 1898, c. 541, § 67f, 30 Stat. 565 (U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3450), making void all attachments or other liens obtained against an insolvent at any time within four months before filing a petition of bankruptcy against him, and discharging the attached property, the filing of a petition in bankruptcy within four months after an attachment was levied against the insolvent's property, and his adjudication of bankruptcy after judgment went against him in the attachment suit, would not affect the liability of sureties upon a bond given to release the attached property.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Geo. H. Buck, Judge.

Action by the San Francisco Sulphur Company against the Ætna Indemnity Company. From a judgment for plaintiff and an order denying a motion for new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

See, also, 7 Cal. App. 98, 93 Pac. 888.

Geo. F. Hatton and H. F. Peart (Franklin P. Nutting, of counsel), for appellant. Wm. J. Herrin, for respondent.

KERRIGAN, J. This is an appeal from a judgment and from an order denying a motion for a new trial in an action on an undertaking given by the defendant to discharge an attachment in an action by the plaintiff against W. F. Clark & Bro. and the Seropian Bros. Company, a corporation. The undertaking given was the one required by section 540 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and therein the defendants in the original action, as principals, and the defendant here, as surety, jointly and severally undertook that the defendants there, W. F. Clark & Bro. and the Seropian Bros. Company, would pay whatever judgment the plaintiff might recover in that action, not exceeding a sum named. In December, 1904, plaintiff recovered judgment against W. F. Clark & Bro. in that action, and payment thereof was demanded of them, which they refused, whereupon plaintiff brought this action against the surety, the defendant here. In November, 1904, and within four months after the issuance of the attachment, W. F. Clark & Bro. filed a petition in bankruptcy, and upon that petition an adjudication in bankruptcy was made. A copy of the undertaking is attached to and made a part of the complaint, and according to the title of the exhibit and a recital in the body thereof it would seem that the original action was against W. F. Clark and E. C. Clark, copartners, doing business under the firm name and style of W. F. Clark & Bro., but from the allegations of the body of the complaint it appears that the action was against several persons who had been carrying on business under the common name of W. F. Clark & Bro., and that they were sued in the original action under such common name as authorized by section 388, Code Civ. Proc.

Under the authorities in this state, the variance between the exhibit and the allegations of the complaint cannot be raised by general demurrer. And as the point was not made by special demurrer the complaint must be held good. Mendocino Co. v. Morris, 32 Cal. 145; Palmer v. Lavigne, 104 Cal. 30, 37 Pac. 775; Blasingame v. Home Insurance Co., 75 Cal. 633, 636, 17 Pac. 925.

So far as the Clarks are concerned, the complaint alleges that the attachment was against the property of W. F. Clark & Bro. in an action against W. F. Clark & Bro., and that the judgment was obtained in that action against W. F. Clark & Bro.; that the condition of the bond was that defendant herein would pay any judgment recovered in that action. The bond was executed as follows: "W. F. Clark & Bro." The title of the undertaking and the recital in the body thereof already referred to may be evidence, but they do not serve as allegations that the original action was against the Clarks as individuals under section 414, Code Civ. Proc. Lambert v. Hackell, 80 Cal. 611, 22 Pac. 327. In any event this point was not made in the trial court nor here until at the oral argument, and the case had gone to judgment, in view of which facts we think the allegations in the body of the complaint should be held to control. Mendocino Co. v. Morris, supra; Blasingame v. Home Ins. Co., supra; Fudickar v. E. R. Irrigation Dist., 109 Cal. 29, 36, 41 Pac. 1024; Burkett v. Griffith, 90 Cal. 532, 541, 27 Pac. 527, 13 L. R. A. 707, 25 Am. St. Rep. 151; Seattle Crockery Co. v. Haley et al., 6 Wash. 302, 33 Pac. 650, 36 Am. St. Rep. 156; Penrose v. Pac. M. & L. Ins. Co. (C. C.) 66 Fed. 253; Cushing v. Pires, 124 Cal. 664, 57 Pac. 572.

Defendant demurred specially on the ground that it could not be ascertained from the complaint that an order was made by the superior court to discharge the attachment or to fix the amount of the bond.

There are two methods prescribed by the Code of Civil Procedure for releasing property from attachment by giving an undertaking: (1) Under section 540 the sheriff may release property from attachment at any time prior to his return on the writ; (2) after the return, however, such a release must be by the court as provided in sections 554 and 555. Here it is alleged in the complaint that the sheriff accepted the undertaking and discharged the attachment, and we will assume that he thus acted according to law, and received the undertaking while the writ was in his possession and before it was returned. Hesser v. Rowley, 139 Cal. 410, 73 Pac. 156; Maskey v. Lackmann, 146 Cal. 777, 81 Pac. 115; Preston v. Hood, 64 Cal. 405, 1 Pac. 487.

There is an affirmative defense set forth in the answer, and the parties admit that W. F. Clark & Bro. filed a petition in bankruptcy within four months after the levying of this attachment, and it is claimed by defendant that, by reason of this petition and the adjudication of bankruptcy which followed, the attachment became void from its inception, and that therefore the bond given to release the attachment was without consideration, and null and void. This contention rests on section 67f of the bankruptcy act of 1898 (Act Cong. July 1, 1898, c. 541, 30 Stat. 565 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3450]), which reads as follows: "That all levies, judgments, attachments, or other liens, obtained through legal proceedings against a person who is insolvent, at any time within four months prior to the filing of a petition in bankruptcy against him, shall be deemed null and void, in case he is adjudged a bankrupt, and the property affected by the levy, attachment, judgment or other lien shall be deemed wholly discharged and released from the same." The obligation of the surety was to pay the debt when it should be established by a judgment. A judgment was recovered in that action by plaintiff, and we think the liability of the surety to pay it was unaffected by the subsequent proceedings in bankruptcy. It has been so held in this state and elsewhere. In McCombs v. Allen et al., 82 N. Y. 115, upon the faith of an undertaking to pay the amount of any judgment which might be recovered, property held by virtue of an attachment was discharged, and it was there held to be no defense to an action against the sureties on the bond that the judgment debtor had filed a petition in bankruptcy within four months from the date of the attachment. The court said: "There was no attachment lien nor any attachment in force upon which such proceedings could operate, and this fact is conclusive against the defendants' claim so far as it rests upon the provisions of the bankrupt law." Continuing the court said: Whatever effect the provisions of the bankrupt law "might have had upon the attachment, they cannot avail the defendant in this action when called upon to perform his promise. By reason of it the debtor's property was restored to him, and became subject, whether in his own hands or those of his assignee in bankruptcy, to the claims of creditors. Neither the letter nor the policy of the statute is infringed by holding defendants liable upon their undertaking." See, also, King v. Block Amusement Co., 126 App. Div. 48, 111 N. Y. Supp. 102; Eastin v. Ormsby, 18 R. I. 309, 27 Atl. 216; Rosenthal v. Perkins, 123 Cal. 240, 55 Pac. 804.

In the last case it is said that if, at the time the proceeding in bankruptcy is instituted, there is no attachment in force on which the proceedings can operate, the attachment lien having already been discharged by a bond given, the liability of the sureties on the bond is not released or affected by the subsequent bankruptcy of their principal.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

1. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 511*)—TESTIMONY OF ACCOMPLICE—CORROBORATION—SUFFICIENCY.

On a trial for robbery, evidence held to sufficiently corroborate an accomplice under Pen. Code, § 1111, providing that the testimony of an accomplice is insufficient unless corroborated by other evidence which in itself tends to connect accused with the commission of the offense.

2. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 511*)—TESTIMONY OF ACCOMPLICE—CORROBORATION.

The corroboration of an accomplice required by Pen. 3. WITNESSES (§ 245*)—EXAMINATION—REPETITION OF QUESTIONS.

Where an accomplice, when first called as a witness, showed his reluctance to testify, and subsequently changed his disposition in that respect, the court was justified in permitting a repetition of questions to which the accomplice had admittedly given evasive answers.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Curtis D. Wilbur, Judge.

T. J. Garwood was convicted of robbery, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Willis & Robinson, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and George Beebe, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

SHAW, J. Defendant was convicted of the crime of robbery and appeals from the judgment and an order of the court denying his motion for a new trial.

Appellant's chief contention is that the record discloses no evidence tending to connect him with the commission of the crime, other than that of an acknowledged accomplice by the name of Pfeifer, who, with defendant and one Gavin, had been jointly charged with the offense. The person robbed conducted a store at the corner of Temple and Olive streets in the city of Los Angeles. The evidence of the accomplice Pfeifer was to the effect: That he, Gavin, and defendant, for the purpose of committing the robbery, repaired to the vicinity of this store on the evening of December 23, 1908; that in going to the store they walked north on Olive street to Temple street, at which point, and a few feet south of Temple street, he and Gavin stopped, while defendant, in accordance with the prearranged plan, walked a short distance east on Temple street, but in view of Pfeifer and Gavin, to whom he waved his hat as a signal to them to proceed, and, after receiving such signal, they did enter the store and robbed the proprietor thereof; that after committing the offense the three met in a room and divided the proceeds of the crime. The robbery occurred about 8:45 p. m. Under section 1111, Pen. Code, this evidence of Pfeifer is insufficient to justify the conviction of defendant, unless it is corroborated "by other evidence, which in itself, and without the aid of the testimony of the accomplice, tends to connect the defendant with the commission of the offense." In our judgment, there is ample evidence to satisfy the statute in this regard. Two witnesses called by the people testified: That about 8:30 o'clock on the evening of the robbery, while walking east on Temple street, they passed the store where the crime was committed, at which time they saw the defendant sitting upon a curb in front of a yard about 100 feet east of Olive street; that about 100 feet from where defendant was sitting they saw two men standing on Olive street, near Temple, towards whom and the store defendant was looking, and which two men they afterwards recognized as Gavin and Pfeifer. The active part in the robbery taken by defendant, according to the testimony of the accomplice, was that of a "lookout," and the independent evidence tends strongly to corroborate Pfeifer's statement in this respect. The fact that the corroboration does not extend to every detail covered by the statement of the accomplice is unimportant. It is not necessary that it should. People v. Kunz, 73 Cal. 315, 14 Pac. 836; People v. Cloonan, 50 Cal. 449. Neither does the rule require that the degree of such evidence be strong; indeed, "the corroborating evidence is sufficient if it of itself tends to connect the defendant with the commission of the offense, although it is slight and entitled, when standing by itself, to but little consideration." People v. McLean, 84 Cal. 482, 24 Pac. 32.

Counsel for appellant contends that the court erred in overruling defendant's objections to a number of questions which he claims assumed facts not in evidence and contradictory of the evidence theretofore given by the witness. Appellant does not specify the questions, other than to designate the folios of the transcript. Reference to the designated folios in some cases discloses no question asked of any witness; in others, no question to which the objection urged is applicable. The reluctance of Pfeifer to testify at all when first called as a witness and his subsequent change of disposition in this respect justified the court in permitting a repetition of questions to which the witness had admittedly given erroneous or evasive answers. We find no error in such rulings.

In reply to a question as to what Pfeifer and Gavin appeared to be doing when seen standing at the corner of Temple and Olive streets, the witness answered: "Why, they appeared nervous as if they were looking out, or as if they were being watched, or might be watched." Defendant moved to strike out this answer, which motion was denied. Conceding the ruling to have been error, nevertheless, such evidence having no reference to the defendant, his rights could not have been prejudiced thereby.

Appellant next contends that the court erred in permitting the prosecution to show, by a witness who was not present when the cars were operated, the running schedule of cars on

Temple street on December 23, 1908, and refers to transcript folios 511 to 519 as disclosing such error. Reference to the specified folios discloses that the only evidence included therein was that of a foreman of the street car line, who testified that the running time on Temple street was the same on the evening of December, 23, 1908, as it was at the time of the trial. This was not hearsay, as contended by appellant, but a statement of fact made, so far as the evidence shows, upon the personal knowledge of the witness. The time schedule was not offered in evidence.

The verdict of the jury is not the subject of an appeal (section 1237, Pen. Code), and the purported appeal therefrom must be disregarded.

The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

2. Criminal Law (§§ 369, 371*)—Admissibility of Evidence—Other Offenses.

In a prosecution for stealing an automobile, evidence that a pair of gloves left in the automobile by the owner when he used it the last time before it was stolen was found in the possession of accused at the time of his arrest is admissible, although it tends to prove the commission of another offense, for where an accused commits two offenses at the same time and place, so that they constitute the same or proximately the same transaction, evidence of the crime not charged is admissible if it shows motive or any other fact relevant to the crime charged.

3. Criminal Law (§ 517*)—Evidence—Confessions.

The confession of accused is admissible in evidence, where there is nothing to show that the confession was not freely and voluntarily given.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 1146–1156; Dec. Dig. § 517.*]

4. Criminal Law (§ 531*)—Admissibility of Confessions—Preliminary Evidence.

The question whether a confession has been obtained under such circumstances as to render evidence thereof competent is one of law, and testimony bearing upon that question alone is not admissible where it is offered after the question of the admissibility of the evidence of the confession has been decided.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; J. W. Hughes, Judge.

R. E. Cahill was convicted of grand larceny, and he appeals. Affirmed.

A. B. Reynolds, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Eugene S. Wachorst, Dist. Atty., for the People.

HART, J. The defendant was convicted of the crime of grand larceny under an information charging him with that offense, and he presents this appeal from the judgment of conviction and the order denying him a new trial.

The points urged for a reversal are: (1) That the evidence is insufficient to support the verdict; (2) that the jury received evidence out of court; (3) that the court erroneously permitted proof of another and distinct offense than that charged; (4) that the alleged confession of the accused was not free and voluntary, and that, therefore, evidence thereof was erroneously admitted; (5) that the court erred in excluding certain testimony offered by the defendant.

It appears from the record that on the 29th day of April, 1909, one H. C. Keyes, a citizen of the city of Sacramento, was the owner of an automobile, which bore the number 320, and on the evening of said day, at about the hour of 9 o'clock, he drove the machine into a garage in said city to be kept there for the night. On the following morning—April 30th—at about the hour of 9 o'clock, Keyes called at the garage for the machine, and it was then discovered that the "auto" was not there; it having been taken away. No one connected with the garage appeared to know where the machine was or just at what hour or in what manner or by whom it was taken from said garage. Investigation failed to throw any light on the whereabouts of the machine or on the mysterious circumstances by which it was taken from the garage until the 30th day of May—a month later—when it was found in the possession of the defendant at the Oakland mole.

1. The evidence sufficiently sustains the verdict. It was proved that the defendant was seen by the witness Tanquary near the hour of 5 o'clock on the morning of the 30th of April in the garage from which the car was taken. There was no other person in the garage at that time. Tanquary had taken his machine there for the purpose of having some repair work done on it prior to taking a trip to Stockton, where he contemplated going in his machine the next day. He intended to leave his machine in the garage, but could find no empty stall or aisle in which to place it. The defendant told Tanquary that the man in charge was asleep, and asked if there was any word he desired to leave. Tanquary replied in the negative, and then left the garage. On the 30th of May, 1909, one Gifford, an expert inspector of automobiles, drove to the Oakland mole in a machine, intending to take the boat for San Francisco. At the "mole" he saw the defendant in possession of the stolen car. Both Gifford and the defendant crossed the bay with their machines on the same boat. After reaching the San Francisco side, the defendant left the boat in the machine he had charge of and Gifford followed him. After following the defendant some distance, Gifford saw two policemen at some point on Clay street. He informed the policemen that the defendant had in his possession a stolen car, and they boarded Gifford's machine and followed the defendant to Montgomery avenue and Union street, where the latter stopped. When Gifford's car reached the point where the defendant had stopped, Gifford said to the policemen, pointing to the "auto" in the possession of the defendant: "This machine has been stolen from Sacramento. I wish you to hold it."

The defendant was questioned by the officers concerning the circumstance of his possession of the machine, and explained that he had been driving the car for a couple of weeks for a lady named Mrs. Consels, residing at Fruitvale, Alameda county. Subsequently the defendant, accompanied by Detective Andrew J. Gaughram, of the San Francisco police department, went to the home of Mrs. Consels, in Fruitvale. There the detective found the wife of the defendant and her mother. What occurred at the house of Mrs. Consels may best be told in the language of the detective: "I asked the lady in question (defendant's mother-in-law) how long this man (defendant) had been employed by her, and she replied about eight weeks. I asked her, 'Where did you get that machine? She says, 'I traded a Winton for it.' I says, 'Where?' She said in Fresno." The witness then asked her if she had a bill of sale for the machine, and she replied that she had, but that it was in the "safe deposit vaults." The detective continued: "I further asked her, 'You would know the man who exchanged machines with you again, if you would see him, would you not?' She says, in a kind of a bewildered way, 'I don't know.' She says, 'I never saw him.' I says, 'Who did make this exchange?' She pointed to Mr. Cahill, and says, 'Mr. Cahill made the exchange.'" Very readily it will be observed that the people presented evidence, independent of that of the confession of the accused, which in itself was enough to persuade the jury of his guilt and to justify the verdict returned. The opportunity for the theft of the machine by the defendant as shown by the fact of his presence at the garage from which it was taken at an early hour of the morning it was missed, his subsequent possession of the machine, his untruthful statement to the detective that he had been driving the machine for only two weeks for a lady at Fruitvale, and the story which he had evidently told the "lady of Fruitvale," who proved to be his mother-in-law, that he had exchanged her car for the one stolen, constituted circumstances of the most incriminatory significance. The further claim of counsel for appellant that the corpus delicti was not shown by these circumstances is, as is patent, without any foundation whatever. The corpus delicti consisted of the asportation of the machine. There can, of course, be no doubt that the evidence, independent of that of the confession, shows that the car was taken from the garage by some one, and that there is no pretense that it was shown that it was taken with the consent of either the owner or the manager of the garage, is a proposition equally as free from doubt, so far as the record discloses. In other words, the irresistible inference from the circumstances proved independently of the evidence of the confession is that the "auto" was wrongfully and feloniously taken from the garage, and hence the corpus delicti was clearly established without the aid of the confession.

2. There is absolutely no showing or even an attempt at showing that the jury received evidence touching the question at issue out of court. The court by the express consent of counsel on both sides made an order allowing the jury to view and inspect the car alleged to have been stolen. The machine was standing near the courthouse at the time of the inspection, which was conducted under the control and in the presence of the judge, as well as in the presence of the attorneys on both sides and the court stenographer, and the jury were in charge of an officer at the time. Section 1119, Pen. Code. The record does not show that this proceeding was in any respect extended beyond its legitimate scope by any act or word of either the jurors or the judge or other officers. To the contrary, the inspection appears from the record to have been conducted strictly in accordance with the requirements of the law.

3. Nor is there any merit in the contention that the court allowed proof of another and different crime from the one charged in the information. At the time the automobile was stolen a pair of gloves, used by the owner when driving the machine, was in the car. These gloves were found in the possession of the defendant at the time of his arrest. Mr. Keyes, owner of the machine, identified the gloves as those used by him when operating the car and which, he testified, he had left in the car on the night of April 29th, the last time that he saw the machine until after it had been found in the possession of the defendant. The court properly allowed proof of the ownership of the gloves, and admitted them in evidence as a circumstance tending to connect the defendant with the commission of the theft. The specific purpose of the proof was to show guilty knowledge. It is true that the general rule is that evidence of a different and distinct crime from the one charged cannot be admitted against a defendant, but there are exceptions to that rule. Where an accused commits two offenses at the very same time and place, so that they constitute the same or approximately the same transaction, evidence of the crime not charged is admissible if it tends to show motive or any other fact relevantly bearing upon the crime charged. People v. McGilver, 67 Cal. 55, 7 Pac. 49; People v. Rogers, 71 Cal. 565, 12 Pac. 679; People v. Walters, 98 Cal. 141, 32 Pac. 864; People v. Smith, 106 Cal. 81, 39 Pac. 40. The theft of the gloves in the case at bar was a part of the same transaction involving the larceny charged against the defendant, and, as stated, evidence that the gloves had been left with the machine by the owner when he last had possession of the car, and that they were found in possession of the defendant when arrested, was competent and admissible as a circumstance tending to show that he stole the machine.

4. Evidence of the confession of the defendant was properly admitted. The detective to whom, in the presence of others, the defendant confessed his guilt, testified that before any statement was made by the accused involving an admission of guilt the latter was fully informed of his rights; was told that any inculpatory statement he might make would be used against him at his trial; that no inducements holding out to him hope for a light punishment or for clemency were suggested, nor was the prisoner threatened or intimidated into making a confession or a statement of any character. The detective testified that, after the prisoner was thus fully apprized of his rights and in effect assured that he could or could not make a statement, according to his own pleasure, he (defendant) said, "It doesn't make any difference. I am up against it," and then proceeded to explain the circumstances under which he stole the machine. We have been unable to find anything in the testimony of the witnesses detailing the circumstances under which the confession was made indicating that it was not free and voluntary.

5. It is insisted that the court erred in sustaining objections to testimony sought to be introduced by the defense for the purpose of contradicting the witness, Gaughram, as to what occurred just prior to the confession of guilt by the defendant. The latter's wife was asked questions, the answers to which, assuming that they would have been favorable to the defendant, would have merely tended to show that the confession was wrung from the prisoner by the detective, and that it was, therefore not free and voluntary. The court ruled that the testimony should have been offered when the question whether the confession was voluntary or not was before the court, and that it could serve no purpose whatsoever after the confession had been admitted. The ruling of the court upon the proposition was eminently proper. The question whether a confession has been obtained under such circumstances as to render evidence thereof competent or incompetent is purely one of law and its determination committed exclusively to the court, and obviously testimony bearing upon that question alone and having no material relevancy, either directly or indirectly, to the main issue, is inadmissible where it is offered after the question of the admissibility of evidence of the confession has been decided.

We have carefully examined the record, and are warranted in saying that it is worthy of special remark that in the trial of the cause both the court and district attorney displayed commendable solicitude for the rights of the prisoner as well as for those of the people, and that the appellant was therefore accorded a fair and impartial trial.

SARNIGHAUSEN v. SCANNELL et al.

(Civ. 702.)

(Court of Appeal, Second District, California. Nov. 3, 1909.)

1. Bills and Notes (§ 451*)—Actions—Defenses.

Where the payees of a note agreed to lend the maker $2,500 more, the agreement to be filed with a trust company, which should, as trustee for the maker, make a trust agreement with the payees to secure payment of the loan, and that upon such filing the note was to be canceled and returned to the maker, and though the agreement was executed by the payees, who retained a duplicate of it, the maker failed to file the agreement and procure from the trust company the evidence of the indebtedness and security for its payment as the agreement contemplated, the payees were not required to perform any act under the agreement and were not required to surrender the note, though the maker was at all times ready, able, and willing to perform and cause to be performed the terms of the agreement, and the agreement would be no defense to an action on the note.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Bills and Notes, Dec. Dig. § 451.*]

2. Contracts (§ 253*)—Rescission.

It appearing that, though the payees had failed to perform any of the terms of the agreement on their part, no request had been made by the maker that they perform it, but that he had consented to such nonperformance, and, some three or four months after its execution, had accepted the duplicate tendered by the payees, there was a rescission of the agreement by consent of the parties, under Civ. Code, § 1689, providing that an agreement may be rescinded by consent of all the parties.

There being no provision for a replication to an answer, affirmative matter pleaded as a defense is deemed to be denied, and hence, where a contract is set up as a special defense, plaintiff may show that it was procured by fraud, menace, or duress, or that it has been rescinded, without pleading such matter.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; George H. Hutton, Judge.

Action by F. Sarnighausen against J. O. Scannell, J. K. Hawk, and R. M. Martin. From a judgment against the defendants Hawk and Martin and an order denying a new trial, they appeal. Affirmed.

Avery & French, for appellants. Z. B. Stuart and Wellborn, Wellborn & Campbell, for respondent.

SHAW, J. Plaintiff sues to recover upon a nonnegotiable promissory note transferred and assigned to him by Juliette and Mary E. Burns, to whom the note had been made and executed by the defendants. Judgment was rendered against defendants Hawk and Martin (service of process not being obtained upon Scannell), from which, and an order denying their motion for a new trial, they prosecute this appeal.

As a defense to the action, Hawk and Martin allege in their answer that at the time of the making and delivery of the note to plaintiff's assignors the latter did, for the purpose of securing the former to sign the same and for the benefit of said Hawk and Martin, execute and deliver to defendant J. O. Scannell a certain agreement in writing, prepared by defendant Martin, which is as follows: "This agreement entered into this 3d day of May, 1907, by and between J. O. Scannell, party of the first part, and Dr. Juliette and Mary E. Burns, party of the second part, both of the city and county of Los Angeles, state of California, witnesseth: That for and in consideration of the sum of two thousand five hundred dollars ($2,500) to be loaned to the said party of the first part by the party of the second part, one thousand dollars ($1,000) of said loan to be paid in cash, receipt of which is hereby acknowledged, the remaining one thousand five hundred dollars ($1,500) to be paid on or before thirty days from date of this agreement, the party of the first part agrees to give his note for the one thousand dollars ($1,000) the cash sum paid him on this contract this date. Said note to be dated May 3d, 1907, and maturing on or before one year from said date, and said note to be indorsed by Mr. R. M. Martin and Mr. J. K. Hawk, all of the city and county of Los Angeles, state of California. It is further understood and agreed that this sum of two thousand five hundred dollars ($2,500) is to be secured by the filing with the Title Insurance & Trust Company this agreement and that they as trustee for the party of the first part will make a trust agreement with the party of the second part to secure the payment of the aforesaid two thousand five hundred dollars ($2,500) coming after a trust agreement of seven thousand dollars ($7,000) now bearing against the undivided one-half interest in and to the twenty-eight (28) feet on the plaza by sixty and one-half (60½) feet on Los Angeles street. This lot covered by a two-story brick building. The title to the said undivided one-half interest of the party of the first part now resting in the Title Insurance & Trust Company as trustee. It is further understood and agreed that when this agreement is filed with the Title Insurance & Trust Company to secure the aforesaid sum of two thousand five hundred dollars ($2,500) advanced by the party of the second part to the party of the first part, that the note for one thousand dollars ($1,000) indorsed by R. M. Martin and J. K. Hawk is to be canceled and returned to the said party of the first part, and the security for the sum of two thousand five hundred dollars ($2,500) advanced to the party of the first part is to rest in the trust agreement above mentioned. This sum of two thousand five hundred dollars ($2,500) is to bear interest at the rate of eight per cent. (8%) per annum until paid."

Upon sufficient evidence the court, in effect, found that while the agreement had been duly executed by Juliette and Mary E. Burns, who retained a duplicate copy thereof, the same was made subsequent to and was no part of the transaction involving the loan for which Scannell and appellants made the note herein sued upon; and also found that appellants were not induced to sign the note by reason of the execution of the agreement. Notwithstanding this finding, appellants contend that, had the agreement been consummated, it would have resulted in the surrender and cancellation of the note, thus absolving them from liability thereon. Conceding this to be true, we fail to see wherein plaintiff's assignors were in default. Under the agreement it was the implied duty of Scannell to file the agreement and procure from the Title Insurance & Trust Company such evidence of the indebtedness and security for the payment thereof as the contract contemplated. In the absence of any performance or tender of performance of this obligation on the part of Scannell, Juliette and Mary E. Burns were not called upon to do any act whatsoever under the agreement. The note was to be surrendered only upon the giving of the security by Scannell. That "Scannell has at all times been ready, able, and willing to perform and cause to be performed the terms and conditions of said agreement," as found by the court, is wholly immaterial. The fact remains that neither he nor appellants ever performed or offered to perform the implied obligation imposed upon Scannell, without which no duty devolved upon plaintiff's assignors to make the additional loan of $1,500 or surrender the note. To hold that this unexecuted contract can be interposed as a defense to a recovery herein would, indeed, be a monstrous proposition.

The court also found that, while Juliette and Mary E. Burns had failed to perform any of the terms of the agreement on their part, no request had ever been made by defendants that they perform the same, "but, on the contrary, defendants have at all times * * * consented to the failure" of performance on the part of said Juliette and Mary E. Burns, who some three or four months after the making of said agreement tendered to appellants the duplicate copy of said agreement so left with them, and appellants accepted the return thereof. Even if we should concede the default of plaintiff's assignors, nevertheless defendants' failure to perform and their consent to like failure of performance on the part of plaintiff's assignors, coupled with the accceptance of the return of the duplicate copy of the agreement, is amply sufficient to show a rescission of the agreement by consent of the parties thereto. Section 1689, Civ. Code.

There is no merit in appellants' contention that this finding is outside the issues. Under our form of pleading, there is no opportunity offered for the filing of a replication to the answer. Colton L. & W. Co. v. Raynor, 57 Cal. 588. When affirmative matter is pleaded as a defense, it is deemed to be denied. Section 462, Code Civ. Proc. Thus, where a contract is set up as a special defense, plaintiff, without pleading such matter, may show that it was procured by fraud, menace, or duress, or that it has been rescinded. Sterling v. Smith, 97 Cal. 343, 32 Pac. 320; Brooks v. Johnson, 122 Cal. 571, 55 Pac. 423; Moore v. Copp, 119 Cal. 429, 51 Pac. 630.

1. TRUSTS (§ 72*) — "RESULTING TRUST" — PURCHASE OF PROPERTY WITH FUNDS OF ANOTHER.

Where land is purchased and paid for with the money of one person, and title is taken in the name of another, without any consideration running from the grantee, and without any gift being made to or intended for said grantee, a "resulting trust" in the land is created in favor of the person paying the purchase price.

2. TRIAL (§ 357*)—CONFORMITY OF FINDINGS TO PLEADINGS.

Plaintiff alleged that she furnished the consideration for the purchase of land conveyed to one defendant, and that defendants agreed, in consideration thereof, to furnish plaintiff a home and to take care of her whenever she resided on the land, and that defendants refused to perform any of the terms of the agreement. Defendants denied any such agreement, but alleged that plaintiff purchased the premises and caused the same to be conveyed to one of the defendants as a gift. Held, that findings that there was no consideration for the conveyance to defendant, and that there was no gift, were responsive to the issues.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; F. B. Ogden, Judge.

Action by Philippina Rothenbusch against Adolph Hebel and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Gray & Rode, for appellants. Traylor W. Bell, for respondent.

HALL, J. Plaintiff brought this action to compel defendant Adolph Hebel to convey to plaintiff a house and lot, bought and paid for with the money of plaintiff, but the title to which was taken in the name of Adolph Hebel. Plaintiff had judgment as prayed for. Defendants moved for a new trial, which was denied, and they have appealed from the judgment and order.

The land in question was purchased from one Daisy Greenlay, who conveyed the title to defendant Adolph Hebel. Plaintiff agreed to provide the entire purchase price, and, accordingly, the entire purchase price was paid out of the money of plaintiff. In her complaint she alleges: "That the consideration for said undertaking on the part of said plaintiff was that said defendant, Adolph Hebel, would at all times give said plaintiff a home with said defendant, Adolph Hebel, in the house situated on said premises, and that said defendant, Adolph Hebel, would take charge of the running of said house, and would cause meals to be cooked for said plaintiff whenever said plaintiff was residing in said house, and that said defendant, Adolph Hebel, would at all times take care of said plaintiff herein, and that said defendant, Adolph Hebel, would at all times permit said plaintiff to have a room in said house in which said plaintiff could keep her personal belongings and her private papers." It is further alleged that defendant Adolph Hebel has refused to perform any of the terms and conditions of said agreement on his part.

The defendants in their answer deny that defendant Adolph Hebel entered into or made any agreement as alleged in plaintiff's complaint, but allege that plaintiff purchased the premises and caused the same to be conveyed to defendant Adolph Hebel as a gift.

The court found: "That said plaintiff, in providing said sum of $2,300 for the purchase of said land, and in directing a deed of said land to be executed to said defendant, did so under the belief that said defendant had agreed with said plaintiff that said defendant would at all times give said plaintiff a home with said defendant in the house situated on said premises, and that said defendant would take charge of the running of said house, and would cause meals to be cooked for said plaintiff whenever said plaintiff was residing in said house, and that said defendant would at all times take care of said plaintiff, and would at all times permit said plaintiff to have a room in said house in which said plaintiff could keep her personal belongings and her private papers. * * * That said defendant, in taking the deed to said land in his own name, did so under the belief that said plaintiff intended to make an unconditional gift of said land to said defendant; but such was not the fact, and defendants repudiate and refuse to execute or perform said contract as understood by plaintiff. That there was no meeting of minds between said plaintiff and said defendant, and a resulting trust as to said property exists in behalf of plaintiff." The court further found that plaintiff did not make any gift of said land and premises to said defendant.

The effect of these findings and of the admissions contained in the pleadings is that the land in question was purchased and paid for with the money of plaintiff and the title taken in the name of defendant Adolph Hebel, without any consideration running from Hebel, and without any gift being made to or intended for said defendant. That a resulting trust in the land exists in favor of the party paying the purchase price under such circumstances cannot be doubted.

"The rule is familiar that when, upon a purchase of real property, the purchase money is paid by one person and the conveyance is made to another, a resulting trust immediately arises against the person to whom the land is conveyed, in favor of the one by whom the purchase money is paid." Campbell v. Freeman, 99 Cal. 546, 34 Pac. 113. To the same effect are: Polk v. Boggs, 122 Cal. 114, 54 Pac. 536; South San Bernardino, etc., Co. v. San Bernardino Nat. Bk., 127 Cal. 245, 59 Pac. 699; Faylor v. Faylor, 136 Cal. 92, 68 Pac. 482; White v. Costigan, 138 Cal. 564, 569, 72 Pac. 178; and Civ. Code, § 853.

It is, however, urged by the appellant that the facts alleged in the complaint do not show a case of a resulting trust, in that after alleging the purchase of and payment for the land by plaintiff, and conveyance of the title to defendant, it is alleged that this was upon consideration of an agreement by defendant Adolph Hebel to do and perform certain things, which it is alleged he refused to do and perform. Defendant, however, denied the existence of any such agreement, and based his claim to the property upon the allegation that it was conveyed to him as an unconditional gift. The court found in effect that there was no consideration for the conveyance to defendant, and that there was no gift of the premises to defendant. These findings respond to the issues tendered by the pleadings. The facts found and admitted by the pleadings boil down to the simple proposition that the land was purchased by plaintiff and paid for with her money, and title conveyed to defendant Adolph Hebel. No gift was made or intended, and no consideration given or agreed to be given for such conveyance. Immediately upon such conveyance being made a trust resulted in favor of the party paying the purchase price, and the trial court correctly so held.

Appellant contends that the finding that plaintiff did not make a gift of the land in dispute to defendant Adolph Hebel is not supported by the evidence. Upon this point it is sufficient to say that we have carefully examined the evidence, and think it is sufficient to support the finding made by the trial court.

The findings made are responsive to the issues tendered by the pleadings, dispose of all material issues, and support the judgment rendered.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

1. ATTACHMENT (§ 344*)—BOND—ACTION—CONDITIONS PRECEDENT—RETURN OF EXECUTION UNSATISFIED.

Code Civ. Proc. § 552, permits plaintiff, if execution be returned unsatisfied, to prosecute an undertaking given pursuant to sections 540 or 555, or proceed as in other cases upon the return of an execution. Section 540 requires a sheriff to whom a writ of attachment is directed to attach defendant's property, unless he gives security in an amount sufficient to satisfy the judgment or equal to the value of the property, in which case, to take the undertaking. Sections 554 and 555 provide for releasing attached property when defendant has appeared in the action, by moving to discharge the attachment, and requires an undertaking, etc., before making the order. The complaint alleged that plaintiff theretofore sued for a debt, and certain of the debtor's property situated in two counties was attached, and, in consideration of the release of such property, defendants herein, as sureties, executed to plaintiff an undertaking in consideration of which the attached property was released. The undertaking, after reciting the commencement of the action, issuance of the writ, etc., states that the sureties, in consideration of the release of the attached property, jointly and severally undertook in a certain sum, and promised that if plaintiff recovered judgment, defendant would, on demand, pay plaintiff the amount thereof with the percentage, interest, and costs. Held, that under section 540 the sheriff must accept the undertaking instead of making a levy, or, if made, must accept it when tendered, before making a return of the writ and release the property, and can only release it after the return upon an order of court under sections 554 and 555, and the bond herein, not having been given pursuant to section 540, the return of an execution unsatisfied was not necessary in order to sue on the bond.

2. ATTACHMENT (§ 349*)—BONDS — ACTIONS — COMPLAINT—SUFFICIENCY OF ALLEGATION—DEMAND.

Where a bond for the release of attached property provided that defendant would on demand pay any judgment recovered by plaintiff, in an action thereon, the complaint must allege a demand upon the judgment debtor and nonpayment of the judgment, and allegations that, after recovery of a judgment against the debtor, plaintiff incurred on execution costs in a certain sum, and of demand of payment upon the sureties and their refusal, were not sufficient allegations of a demand made upon the judgment debtor.

Action by Theo. Kanouse against L. C. Brand and Max Goldschmidt. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant Goldschmidt appeals. Reversed, with directions to sustain demurrer to complaint with leave to amend.

E. B. Coil, for appellant. D. Joseph Coyne, for respondent.

SHAW, J. This is an action to recover from the sureties on an undertaking given to procure the release of property levied upon under a writ of attachment.

It is alleged in the complaint that one H. J. Stocker, being indebted to the plaintiff, the latter, in June, 1907, brought suit to recover thereon, and procured to be issued therein a writ of attachment under which certain property of Stocker, situated in Los Angeles and Ventura counties, was attached by the sheriffs of said counties; that thereafter, in consideration of the release of said property so attached, the defendants herein as sureties made and executed to plaintiff an undertaking, in consideration of which the property so held by the sheriffs under and by virtue of said writ of attachment was released therefrom by this plaintiff.

This undertaking, which is set out in the complaint, after reciting the commencement of the action by plaintiff against Stocker, the issuance of the writ of attachment, and that the sheriff of Los Angeles county had, by virtue thereof, attached certain property of Stocker which the latter desired to have released therefrom, provides: "Now, therefore, we, the undersigned, residents and freeholders in the county of Los Angeles, in consideration of the premises, and also in consideration of the release from said attachment of the property so attached, as above mentioned, do hereby jointly and severally undertake in the sum of sixteen hundred and no-100 dollars, and promise that in case the plaintiff recover judgment in the action, defendant will, on demand, pay to plaintiff the amount of whatever judgment may be recovered in said action, together with the percentage, interest and costs; the same to be paid in United States gold coin, if so required by the terms of the judgment." Defendant Goldschmidt filed a general demurrer, which was by the court overruled. No answer was filed, and judgment was rendered against him and his codefendant, who had suffered default, in accordance with the prayer of the complaint.

Appellant contends that the complaint fails to state a cause of action, in that it does not appear therefrom that an execution had been issued and returned unsatisfied, as required by section 552, Code Civ. Proc., which provides: "If the execution be returned unsatisfied, in whole or in part, the plaintiff may prosecute any undertaking given pursuant to section 540 or section 555, or he may proceed, as in other cases, upon the return of an execution." The effect of the provision just quoted is to declare that no action for the recovery upon an undertaking given pursuant to the sections of the Code specified therein shall be prosecuted, unless an execution has been issued and returned unsatisfied, in whole or in part. Brownlee v. Riffenburg, 95 Cal. 447, 30 Pac. 587. This proposition is not controverted by respondent. He contends, however, that the undertaking is not one given pursuant to statute, but that it is a common-law bond, as to which (Palmer v. Vance, 13 Cal. 553; Smith v. Fargo, 57 Cal. 157) the provisions of said section 552 are inapplicable. Neither the issuance of an execution against the judgment debtor, nor the return thereof unsatisfied, is alleged in the complaint. It is therefore clear that if the undertaking declared upon be a statutory bond, the complaint fails to state a cause of action. By the provisions of section 540, Code Civ. Proc., it is made the duty of the sheriff to whom a writ of attachment is directed to attach the property of the defendant in the action wherein such writ is issued, "unless the defendant give him security by the undertaking of at least two sufficient sureties, in an amount sufficient to satisfy such demand, besides cost, or in an amount equal to the value of the property which has been, or is about to be, attached; in which case, to take such undertaking." Under this provision it is the duty of the sheriff, instead of levying the writ of attachment, to accept the undertaking in lieu of such levy, or, if he has made the levy and taken the property into custody, to accept the prescribed undertaking when tendered prior to the return of the writ and release the property so attached. Hesser v. Rowley, 139 Cal. 410, 73 Pac. 156. The making of his return to the writ divests the sheriff of any statutory power or authority to release the property so held by him under the writ of attachment. After the return thereof a defendant seeking the release of property must apply to the court for an order of release pursuant to the provisions of section 554 and section 555 of the Code of Civil Procedure, or secure such release by application to the plaintiff upon such terms as may be mutually agreed upon. It is clear the release was not obtained under an order of court. Neither is there anything in the allegations of the complaint, nor in the recitals of the undertaking, to indicate that it was given to the sheriff as security pursuant to the provisions of section 540. On the contrary, it is alleged the bond was "made and executed to this plaintiff," and "that the attachment heretofore mentioned under which the sheriffs of the aforesaid counties (Los Angeles and Ventura) held as security of the property of the said H. J. Stocker, and for the release of which attachment the aforesaid bond was given, was by this plaintiff released, in consideration of said bond so given by these defendants." The directions (section 540, Code Civ. Proc.) in the writ of attachment require the sheriff to make the levy and retain the property in custody only in case the defendant fails to give the prescribed undertaking, which, as we have seen, may be given him any time before he makes his return of the writ. Inasmuch as his authority to accept the undertaking and release the attachment is by virtue of the directions to him contained in the writ, the undertaking, the giving of which is authorized by section 540, should, by appropriate wording, show that it is such a one as he was directed to accept, and given pursuant to the command of the writ. The fact that, as appears from the complaint, the bond was given for the release of the property attached in both Los Angeles and Ventura counties, and that it was released by plaintiff, together with the fact that the undertaking is in form a common-law bond, fully justifies the conclusion that the undertaking was not given to the sheriff as security pursuant to said section 540. It, therefore, follows that, inasmuch as the instrument declared upon was not a statutory bond, the issuance of execution against the judgment debtor and return thereof unsatisfied was not a necessary prerequisite to the maintenance of suit thereon. Appellant cites Bailey v. Ætna Indemnity Co., 5 Cal. App. 740, 91 Pac. 416, wherein the court says: "For the protection of the surety it is required that an offer shall be first made to execute against a judgment debtor. Failing in this, the substitute for the attached property is immediately available, and the bond may be enforced at once." The point under consideration, and to which this language was directed, was the right of the obligee to institute suit upon the bond before the expiration of six months after the rendition of the judgment against the judgment debtor; it being claimed that the action on the bond had been prematurely brought. Moreover, we there held that the undertaking, owing to the peculiar wording thereof, aided by the allegations of the complaint, was a statutory bond.

It does not appear from the complaint that any demand was made upon the judgment debtor that he pay the judgment; nor is there any allegation showing the amount of the judgment to be unpaid. The absence of these allegations renders the complaint fatally defective. As appears from the undertaking, the promise on the part of the obligors therein was "that in case the plaintiff recover judgment in the action, defendant will, on demand," pay the same. It thus clearly appears that the promise to pay was conditional, and the bond imposed no obligation on the sureties, unless a demand for payment of the judgment was first made upon defendant Stocker. The allegation of such fact and the nonpayment of the judgment, or part thereof, was essential to the statement of a cause of action against these defendants. Mullally v. Townsend, 119 Cal. 47, 50 Pac. 1066; Pierce v. Whiting, 63 Cal. 538. Following the allegation of the recovery of a judgment for a specified sum, it is alleged "that thereafter on execution plaintiff incurred accruing costs of $1.50," for which, and the amount of the judgment, plaintiff prays judgment. Such averment as to the costs expended cannot be regarded as an allegation of demand of payment made upon the judgment debtor. The allegation of a demand of payment made upon the sureties and their refusal to pay is not inconsistent with the fact that the judgment debtor may not have paid the same.

The judgment appealed from is reversed, with instructions to the trial court to sustain the demurrer and to grant leave to plaintiff to amend his complaint, if he be so advised.

We concur: ALLEN, P. J.; TAGGART, J.

DICKINSON v. ZUBIATE MINING CO.

(Civ. 737.)

(Court of Appeal, Second District, California. Nov. 3, 1909.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1024*)—REVIEW—ISSUE OF FACT ON MOTION TO QUASH SUMMONS.

The finding of a trial court, on an issue of fact raised by a conflict between affidavits on a motion to quash the summons and the proof of service, will not be disturbed on appeal.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Dec. Dig. § 1024.*]

2. CORPORATIONS (§ 668*)—FOREIGN CORPORATIONS—SERVICE OF PROCESS ON MANAGING AGENT.

Code Civ. Proc. § 411, providing that, in a suit against a foreign corporation doing business and having a managing agent within this state, summons must be served by delivering a copy thereof to such agent, requires that such corporation must be "doing business" in this state to justify service on it through such agent.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Corporations, Cent. Dig. §§ 2603–2627; Dec. Dig. § 668.*]

3. CORPORATIONS (§ 668*) — ACTION AGAINST FOREIGN CORPORATION—WAIVER OF OBJECTION TO SERVICE OF PROCESS.

An objection to service of process on a foreign corporation that it was not at the time transacting business in the state may be waived.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Corporations, Dec. Dig. § 668.*]

4. CORPORATIONS (§ 668*)—FOREIGN CORPORATIONS—SERVICE OF PROCESS — OBJECTIONS — WAIVER.

If the fact that defendant corporation was not transacting business in the state at the time of service of process on it is not made a ground of its motion to quash the summons, and notice thereof given as required by Code Civ. Proc. § 1010, it will be deemed to have waived any objection to service on such ground.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Corporations, Dec. Dig. § 668.*]

5. CORPORATIONS (§ 82*)—PURCHASE OF STOCK —RESCISSION—AGREEMENT—BREACH — DAMAGES.

Where suit against a corporation by a purchaser of stock is solely to recover sums agreed to be repaid to plaintiff, according to agreement on his electing to rescind the purchase, the tender of a return of the stock left nothing to be done by him, as the consideration had passed to the obligor, and the only duty imposed on it was to repay the sums specified, bringing the case within Civ. Code, § 3302, providing that "the detriment caused by the breach of an obligation to pay money only, is deemed to be the amount due by the terms of the obligation, with interest thereon."

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Corporations, Dec. Dig. § 82.*]

6. PLEADING (§ 71*)—NECESSITY OF EXPRESSLY ALLEGING DAMAGE IN COMPLAINT.

When plaintiff alleges facts to exist, entitling him to recover the sum of money demanded, he has shown, so far as the complaint can, that he has sustained damages, and, having alleged that defendant promised to pay a specified amount for which judgment is prayed, plaintiff need not allege he had been damaged in such sum.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Pleading, Cent. Dig. § 142; Dec. Dig. § 71.*]

7. CORPORATIONS (§ 82*)—PURCHASE OF STOCK —CAUSE OF ACTION FOR MONEY PAID THEREFOR.

In a suit against a corporation to recover money agreed to be repaid a purchaser of stock on his electing to take a refund thereof in lieu of the stock, its value is immaterial to plaintiff's cause of action.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Corporations, Dec. Dig. § 82.*]

8. CORPORATIONS (§ 82*)—PURCHASE OF STOCK —CAUSE OF ACTION FOR MONEY PAID THEREFOR.

Whether or not defendant accepted plaintiff's tender of a return is likewise immaterial.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Corporations, Dec. Dig. § 82.*]

9. CORPORATIONS (§ 82*)—AGREEMENT TO REFUND MONEY PAID FOR STOCK—EFFECT OF MODIFICATION.

Modification of an agreement to refund money paid a corporation for stock on demand therefor, extending the time for the demand and providing for paying interest and repayment of an assessment on the stock, could not release it from the terms of the first agreement.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Corporations, Dec. Dig. § 82.*]

10. CORPORATIONS (§ 81*)—CONDITIONAL PURCHASE OF STOCK.

Where a corporation sold stock, agreeing in a contemporaneous written contract to refund the money paid therefor on demand, the transaction was, not a conditional subscription, but a conditional purchase of stock, where the stock had been theretofore issued to another and by him returned to it.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Corporations, Dec. Dig. § 81.*]

11. CORPORATIONS (§ 82*) — PURCHASE OF STOCK—CONSIDERATION FOR PROMISE TO REPAY PRICE.

The purchase price of stock, paid pursuant to the conditions in a contemporaneous written agreement for a return on the purchaser's election to rescind, was a sufficient consideration for the corporation's promise to repay it.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Corporations, Dec. Dig. § 82.*]

12. CORPORATIONS (§ 82*)—AGREEMENT TO REFUND MONEY PAID FOR STOCK—VALIDITY.

The rights of creditors not being involved, an agreement to refund money paid a corporation for stock if after inspection of its property the purchaser be dissatisfied is enforceable.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Corporations, Dec. Dig. § 82.*]

13. CORPORATIONS (§ 82*)—CONSIDERATION OF AGREEMENT TO REPAY MONEY PAID FOR STOCK.

Extension of time for repaying money paid for stock agreed to be refunded if the purchaser was dissatisfied. and payment of an assessment, is ample consideration for a contract to repay both sums with interest at the end of six months, if the purchaser elects to demand the same.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Corporations, Dec. Dig. § 82.*]

14. CORPORATIONS (§ 428*)—NOTICE OF AGREEMENT IN CORPORATION'S BEHALF.

Through the president and secretary who executed a written agreement in a corporation's behalf, it must be deemed to have had notice thereof when it was made.

15. CORPORATIONS (§ 426*)—ACTION ON CONTRACT—ESTOPPEL TO PLEAD WANT OF RATIFICATION.

Where a contract, which a corporation was authorized to make, was made in its behalf by its president and secretary, subject to approval of the directors, its failure for more than seven months after notice thereof to disaffirm the same, with the fact that it retained $200 paid thereunder, estops it to plead want of ratification as a defense to an action thereon.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; W. P. James, Judge.

Action by J. M. Dickinson against the Zubiate Mining Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Shankland & Chandler, for appellant. H. E. Guthrie and E. Sharp (Leonard B. Slosson, of counsel), for respondent.

SHAW, J. Action to recover a sum of money paid in the purchase of mining stock, which purchase was made under an agreement for the repayment of the same. Judgment went for plaintiff, from which defendant appeals upon the judgment roll accompanied by bill of exceptions.

Defendant was a foreign mining corporation authorized by its articles of incorporation to transact business in California. It is alleged in the complaint that at the time of the filing thereof, and at all times mentioned therein, defendant was engaged in the transaction of business in said state. That on December 7, 1903, plaintiff and defendant entered into an agreement whereby plaintiff purchased from defendant 1,000 shares of its capital stock for the sum of $3,500, the defendant on its part agreeing that in consideration of such purchase defendant would, on demand of plaintiff, after the latter had inspected and examined defendant's mining property situated in the Republic of Mexico, repay and refund to him the purchase price of such stock. That pursuant to this agreement plaintiff paid the $3,500, and defendant issued to him a certificate for said 1,000 shares of stock. That as a result of his inspection of the property plaintiff was dissatisfied with such purchase, and on January 13, 1904, tendered to defendant the redelivery of the stock, and demanded repayment of the purchase price thereof. That pending negotiations for settlement, and on March 12, 1904, the parties entered into another agreement, as follows:

"San Francisco, Cal., March 12, 1904.

"To Whom It may Concern:

"This agreement made and entered into the above date, between the Zubiate Mining Company of San Francisco and Mexico, party of the first part, and J. M. Sharp and J. M. Dickinson of Saticoy, California, the parties of the second part.

"Witnesseth: That whereas the said parties of the second part, on or about December 7, 1903, paid to the Zubiate Mining Company, three thousand five hundred (3,500) dollars each; said payment being for one thousand (1,000) shares of stock in said company, with an agreement that said Zubiate Mining Company would refund the money in case, after examination, said parties were not satisfied with the character of the mines, and

"Whereas said parties have made a demand upon the company to have the said amount refunded, and

"Whereas said company has levied an assessment of twenty (20) cents per share on the stock of said company, which assessment is now due and payable,

"Therefore, it is hereby agreed that said parties of the second part will pay the amount of the said assessment and the Zubiate Mining Company will agree to refund said amount of three thousand five hundred ($3,500) dollars to each of said parties; also the assessment of two hundred dollars ($200) to be paid by each of the parties, together with interest at eight (8) per cent. per annum from December seventh, 1903, on the principal, and from March 12, 1904, on the assessment, six (6) months from date hereof, provided said parties of the second part elect to accept such refund at that time in lieu of the one thousand (1,000) shares of stock held by each.

"Zubiate Mining Company,
"By Drew R. Oliver, President,
"J. R. Kenny, Secretary.

"Subject to the ratification of the board of directors.

"J. M. Sharp,
"J. M. Dickinson."

That pursuant to the terms of said agreement plaintiff paid to defendant an assessment of $200, and at the expiration of the six months specified in the agreement plaintiff notified defendant that he elected to accept a refund of the money so paid as provided in the agreement, and demanded that defendant pay to him the sums of money specified in the agreement pursuant to the terms thereof, and thereupon tendered the redelivery of the 1,000 shares of stock to defendant, but defendant refused to accept the same or to repay said sums of money and interest thereon. That at all times plaintiff was ready, able, and willing to return said stock to defendant.

Defendant denied all the allegations of the complaint other than the payment to it of said sums of money so alleged to have been paid in the purchase of the stock and payment of the assessment thereon, and admitted that it had refused to repay the same. As a further defense to the action, defendant alleged: (1) That the several agreements set forth in the answer were without consideration and void; (2) that defendant had no power or authority to make or enter into said contracts or either of them; and (3) that any rights which plaintiff may have had by reason of such agreements were lost by reason of his laches in failing to act thereunder within a reasonable time. The finding of the court as to all the issues was in favor of plaintiff, and judgment followed as prayed for in complaint.

Appellant contends that the court erred in denying its motion to quash the summons. As shown by the affidavit of the party serving the summons upon defendant, such service was had on January 13, 1906, in Los Angeles county, "by delivering to and leaving with George A. Hart, the president and managing agent, within the state of California, of said corporation, * * * a copy of said summons," etc. Thereafter defendant moved to quash the summons and set aside the service thereof upon the grounds, among others unnecessary to mention, that said corporation was organized under the laws of South Dakota, and "that said George A. Hart is not a managing agent, or business agent, or any agent, or cashier, or secretary of said defendant corporation." The notice of motion specified that it would be made upon the complaint and an affidavit of George A. Hart, which was sworn to on January 20, 1906, wherein it was averred that "affiant is not a managing agent, nor business agent, nor any agent, nor cashier, nor secretary of said corporation." Reference to the motion as made discloses that it was not made upon the ground that Hart was not managing agent, cashier, or secretary of the corporation at the time, to wit, January 13, 1906, when service was had upon the corporation, but at a time subsequent thereto; nor does this affidavit of Hart, sworn to on January 20th, from which it appears that he was not on that date the managing agent, etc., negative or tend to prove that he was not on January 13th the managing agent in California of defendant. Neither the motion nor affidavit is directed to the time of the service of the summons.

At the hearing of the motion another affidavit of Hart was submitted, where it was averred that he never had at any time been the managing agent of defendant corporation. Regarding this as having reference to and covering the time when service was made of the summons, and conceding the motion to have been directed to such time, it is sufficient to raise an issue of fact as to which there is a conflict between the affidavits of Hart and the person making the affidavit of service, as to which, like any other fact in dispute, this court will not disturb the finding of the trial court when there is a substantial conflict of evidence.

Conceding our position thus far to be correct, appellant, nevertheless, contends that it is shown by Hart's affidavit, which as to such fact is uncontradicted, that defendant was not at the time of service either actively or otherwise engaged in transacting business in California. That a foreign corporation must be "doing business" in this state to justify service upon it through a managing agent is required by section 411, Code Civ. Proc. See, also, Jameson v. Simonds Saw Co., 2 Cal. App. 584, 84 Pac. 289. Such objection to service of process, however, may be waived, and inasmuch as this was not made one of the grounds of the motion and notice thereof given, as required by section 1010, Code Civ. Proc., defendant must be deemed to have waived any objection to service based upon such ground. We, therefore, conclude the court did not err in its ruling upon the motion to quash the summons and vacate the service thereof.

Defendant contends that its demurrer should have been sustained upon the ground that the complaint failed to state a cause of action. The sole purpose of the action was to recover from defendant the sums of money agreed to be repaid in accordance with the terms of the agreements. The tender of the return of the stock, if such tender was necessary, left nothing to be done by plaintiff. The consideration had passed to the obligor, and the only duty imposed upon defendant was the obligation to repay the sums of money specified. Hellings v. Heydenfeldt, 107 Cal. 577, 40 Pac. 1026. This fact brings the case within the provisions of section 3302, Civ. Code, which provides that "the detriment caused by the breach of an obligation to pay money only, is deemed to be the amount due by the terms of the obligation, with interest thereon." As said in Bartlett v. Odd Fellows' Bank, 79 Cal. 218, 21 Pac. 743, 12 Am. St. Rep. 139: "When the plaintiff, as here, alleges facts to exist which, if proved, would entitle him to recover the sum of money he demands from the defendant, he has shown, so far as the recitals of the complaint can, that he has sustained damages." Having alleged that defendant had promised to pay a specified amount for which judgment is prayed, it was unnecessary to allege that plaintiff had been damaged in such sum Bank v. Port Townsend, 47 Pac. 896.[1] The value of the stock was immaterial for the reason that plaintiff's right to repayment did not depend upon its value; and, as to the cause of action, it is likewise immaterial whether or not defendant accepted plaintiff's tender of a return of the stock. The second agreement extended the time within which plaintiff might demand performance of the obligation to repay the purchase money, and also provided for the payment of interest thereon and repayment of the assessment. To such extent the first agreement was modified. Such modification, however, could not have the effect of releasing defendant from the terms of the first agreement. There was no error in the ruling of the court upon the demurrer.

The court found against the special defenses set up in the answer. It is contended that such findings are unsupported by the evidence, and that the court should have granted defendant's motion for a nonsuit. It is unnecessary to quote the evidence; suffice it to say, an examination of the record satisfies us that it is ample to justify the ruling of the court in denying defendant's motion for a nonsuit, and fully supports the findings. The transaction did not constitute an unconditional original subscription to the stock of defendant, but was a conditional purchase of stock, which the evidence tended to show had been theretofore issued to another and by him returned to the company. The purchase was made upon conditions fully set forth in a written contract which was contemporaneous with and part of the transaction of purchase. Jefferson v. Hewitt, 95 Cal. 535, 30 Pac. 772. Nor was the agreement secret. On the contrary, it appears from the evidence of witness Sharp that, early in January at least, plaintiff was, through him, advised by the secretary of the company that "they had a copy of the agreement in the office, and that the matter would be presented to the board of directors at the next meeting." Neither was there any want of consideration. The purchase price paid subject to the conditions contained in the agreement was a sufficient consideration for defendant's promise to repay if plaintiff, after inspection of the property, was dissatisfied therewith. In the absence of the rights of creditors being involved, and none appear, we perceive no reason why this agreement should not be enforceable against the corporation. Vent et al. v. Duluth Coffee & Spice Co., 64 Minn. 307, 67 N. W. 70. Says Mr. Cook in his work on Corporations (section 83): "Instead of subscribing for stock, a party may make a contract with a corporation to take the stock with the right to return it and receive back the purchase price within a certain time. Such a contract is legal, and the stock may be returned and the money recovered, if corporate creditors' rights do not intervene."

[1] 16 Wash. 450.

This being true, the extension of time for repayment, and the payment of $200 on account of the assessment furnishes ample consideration for the contract dated March 12, 1904, whereby defendant agreed to repay both sums with interest thereon at the expiration of six months, if plaintiff elected to demand the same. It is true this agreement was made subject to ratification by the board of directors, and appellant contends that the board failed to ratify it. Through its president and secretary the corporation must be deemed to have had notice of the agreement at the time of the making thereof. It appears from the minutes of the proceedings of its board of directors that it was formally submitted to the board for action on May 9, 1904. No action, however, was taken thereon until October 21, 1904, nearly six weeks after plaintiff, at the expiration of the time specified in this agreement, had made formal demand for repayment, which demand defendant then refused, and by its formal resolution disaffirmed the agreement. Conceding this contract so made on behalf of the corporation to have been unauthorized, nevertheless, it was one which it had authority to make, and its failure to disaffirm the same for more than seven months after notice thereof, coupled with the fact that it retained the $200 paid thereunder, if not a technical ratification of the contract, was nevertheless sufficient to estop the corporation from pleading want of ratification as a defense. Clark & Marshall on Private Corporations, §§ 716d, 716c; Phillips v. Sanger Lumber Co., 130 Cal. 431, 62 Pac. 749; Curtin v. Salmon River, etc., Co., 141 Cal. 308, 74 Pac. 851, 99 Am. St. Rep. 75; Blood v. La Serena L. & W. Co., 113 Cal. 221, 41 Pac. 1017, 45 Pac. 252.

The judgment is affirmed.

In Bank. Application by William H. Langdon, as district attorney of the city and county of San Francisco, for a writ of mandate to John A. Koster, auditor of the city and county of San Francisco. Granted.

Wm. Hoff Cook, for plaintiff. Francis V. Keesling (Campbell, Metson, Drew, Oatman & Mackenzie, as Friends of the Court), for defendant.

HENSHAW, J. This is mandate to compel the auditor of the city and county of San Francisco to audit the demand of the petitioner for expenses incurred by him. The expenses are for the payment of the services of William J. Burns as "special agent" at the rate of $625 a month, and of certain enumerated "assistant special agents" at the rate of $150 a month, the total aggregating for the month of April, 1909, the sum of $2,650. These demands were presented to the auditor by the individual claimants, and, upon his rejection of them in the form presented, demand was made by the district attorney in his own name, with an enumeration of the items charged.

In July, 1908, the district attorney addressed a communication to the mayor, seeking an appropriation of $70,000 for the expenses of his office. The communication was by the mayor sent to the board of supervisors, with the recommendation that the request of the district attorney be granted. In compliance with this request the board duly passed an ordinance August 3, 1908, which was approved by the mayor, known as Ordinance 525, authorizing the district attorney and empowering him to appoint additional employés and fixing their monthly compensation. The appointments were made by the district attorney, and the demands of the employés were for several months presented pursuant to the ordinance and provisions of the charter, and approved by the officer and paid. Thereafter the auditor refused to audit these monthly demands, and, to meet his objections to the manner of their presentation, the form of demand was changed; the demand being presented in the new form by the verified application of the district attorney himself. This demand also the auditor refused to recognize. The authority for the passage of the ordinance is found in section 35, art. 16, of the charter of the city and county of San Francisco. Much argument is made to the effect that this provision of the charter is void. The view which we take of the matter, however, renders unnecessary any consideration of the question, for clearly we think the expenses come within those authorized by section 4307 of the Political Code. That section makes a county charge "all other expenses necessarily incurred by the district attorney in the detection of crime and the prosecution of criminal cases." In Humiston v. Shaffer, 145 Cal. 197, 78 Pac. 651, the expenses occasioned by the employment of detectives are recognized as one of the class contemplated by section 4307. Against this it is argued that the expenditure cannot be said to be necessary within the meaning of the statute, since the district attorney has at his call the police force of the city and county of San Francisco and the detective department thereof. But to this it must be answered that the board of supervisors in authorizing the expenditure were the judges of the necessity, and that only in a plain case of an abuse of their powers would their judgment be subject to reversal.

Let mandate issue as prayed for.

PARKIN v. GRAYSON-OWEN CO.

(S. F. 4,614.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 23, 1909.)

1. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 706*) — STREETS—INJURIES FROM USE OF HIGHWAY—QUESTION FOR JURY.

In an action for injuries to plaintiff caused by the collision of defendant's team with plaintiff's buggy, where there was evidence that defendant violated a city ordinance forbidding a horse to be left standing in a street unless properly secured, only one of defendant's horses having been hitched, and that only by a strap snapped into the bit and tied to a telegraph pole, a nonsuit was properly refused.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Municipal Corporations, Cent. Dig. § 1518; Dec. Dig. § 706.*]

2. EVIDENCE (§ 470*) — OPINIONS — ADMISSIBILITY.

A general rule is that witnesses must testify to facts and not opinions, and that when the question to be determined is the result of the common experience of all men of ordinary education, or is to be inferred from particular facts, or where the inquiry relates to a subject not of such a nature as to require any peculiar habits or study in order to qualify one to understand it, or when all the facts on which the opinion is based can be ascertained and made intelligible to the court and jury, the inferences or conclusions must be drawn by the jury, and the opinion of the witness cannot be received.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Dec. Dig. § 470.*]

3. EVIDENCE (§ 506*)—SUBJECT OF EXPERT TESTIMONY—MATTERS IN ISSUE.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1870, subd. 9, providing that the opinion of a witness may be given on a question of science, art, or trade, when he is skilled therein, whether defendant's method of hitching his team was a safe one was not a proper subject of expert testimony, and such testimony would be an invasion of the province of the jury.

4. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1050*)—REVIEW—HARMLESS ERROR—ADMISSION OF EVIDENCE.

The erroneous admission of expert testimony that defendant's method of hitching a strap to the snaffle in the horse's bit was not a proper and safe method of tying horses because, if the horse pulled back, the bit was liable to pull apart, or the first buckle back of the bit, or some part of the bridle close up to the ear would give way, is not prejudicial to defendant, where the same information might have been properly obtained by asking the witness what would be the effect of fastening a strap to the snaffle, and where it was admitted that there were no injuries to the bridle at the time of the accident in question.

5. NEGLIGENCE (§ 131*)—ACTION—EVIDENCE—ADMISSIBILITY.

Evidence of precautions taken after an accident is not admissible to show a negligent condition at the time of the accident.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Negligence, Cent. Dig. §§ 255, 256; Dec. Dig. § 131.*]

6. WITNESSES (§ 269*)—CROSS-EXAMINATION—LIMITATION TO SUBJECTS OF DIRECT EXAMINATION.

Testimony that defendant drove the horses which had caused injury to plaintiff after the accident is insufficient to justify cross-examination as to what precautions defendant took after the accident in hitching the horses.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Witnesses, Cent. Dig. §§ 949–954; Dec. Dig. § 269.*]

7. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 706*) — STREETS—USE FOR TRAVEL—QUESTION FOR JURY.

In an action for injuries to plaintiff caused by a collision of defendant's team with plaintiff's buggy, whether the hitching of one of the horses was a sufficient securing of the team as required by a city ordinance was a question for the jury.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Municipal Corporations, Cent. Dig. § 1518; Dec. Dig. § 706.*]

8. TRIAL (§ 295*)—INSTRUCTIONS—CONSTRUCTION AS A WHOLE.

Instructions are to be read and considered as a whole.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 703–717; Dec. Dig. § 295.*]

9. TRIAL (§ 296*) — INSTRUCTIONS — CURE BY OTHER INSTRUCTIONS.

In an action for injuries caused by a runaway team, an erroneous instruction that the hitching of one of a team of horses was not a sufficient compliance with the city ordinance prohibiting the leaving of horses in a street without their being securely fastened was not cured by correct, but conflicting, instructions that if a hitching strap, fastened to the bit of one horse and not fastened to the other, does not properly secure the team, defendant was guilty of negligence, and if the driver set the brake hard down, and wrapped the reins around the brake and fastened one end of the hitching strap to one of the bits of the horses, these circumstances must be considered in determining whether he used reasonable care in securing the horses.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; John Ellsworth, Judge.

Action by Hirst Parkin against the Grayson-Owen Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, and an order denying a new trial, defendant appeals. Case transferred from District Court of Appeal to Supreme Court on motion for rehearing. Reversed.

Myrick & Deering, for appellant. Stanley Moore, B. H. Griffins, and Reed, Nusbaumer & Black, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. Defendant appealed to this court from a judgment in favor of plaintiff for $2,000, and from an order denying its motion for a new trial. The appeal was transferred to the District Court of Appeal for the Third Appellate District for determination. In that court, on December 21, 1908, judgment was given reversing the judgment and order denying the new trial. A petition for hearing by this court was granted, and the judgment of the appellate court vacated, and the matter transferred to this court for hearing and determination.

The opinion of the District Court of Appeal, written by Mr. Justice Burnett, was as follows:

"This is an appeal from the judgment and the order denying a motion for a new trial in an action for damages for the injury caused to plaintiff by the running away of defendant's team of horses attached to a butcher wagon, which collided with and upset a buggy in which plaintiff was riding. Plaintiff claimed that the horses were not fastened as required by a certain ordinance of the city of Oakland, which, as far as material here, is as follows: 'No person shall leave or allow any horse or mule to be or remain standing upon any of the public streets of the city of Oakland, unless such animal is in some way properly secured, either by hitching or being under the personal control of some person of suitable age.'

"(1) The court properly denied the motion for a nonsuit. There was sufficient evidence to justify the inference that defendant violated said ordinance. Indeed, the evidence for plaintiff warrants the conclusion that defendant failed to exercise ordinary care in the manner of securing the team. The horses were left standing on a prominent street while the driver went into a restaurant to get his lunch. Only one of the horses was hitched, and that by a strap snapped in the bit and tied to a telegraph pole. The jury from the evidence had a right to believe that the strap was not strong enough nor properly adjusted to secure the horse to which it was attached, and that under the circumstances both horses should have been hitched. At any rate, the showing made by plaintiff was sufficient to carry the case beyond the motion for a nonsuit.

"(2) Appellant contends that the court erred in allowing expert testimony as to the proper hitching of a horse. The matter is presented by the record as follows: 'Q. Let me ask you, Mr. Wright, whether or not using one of these hitching straps that snaffle into the horse's bit and fastening it to a pole or ring, or anything else at the other end, it don't make any difference, let me ask you whether that method is a proper and safe one for the tying of horses? (Objection as not being proper subject for expert testimony.) * * * A. No, simply because when it is put in the bit of a horse, if he pulls back on it, the bit is liable to pull apart, or the first buckle back from the bit will give away, or close up to the ear will give away, or some part of the bridle will give way with the snaffle. This snaffle will be stronger than the leather in the bridle, and therefore, away goes the bridle, if the snaffle don't break.'

"The application of the rule as to expert testimony is often attended with great difficulty, although the rule itself is clear enough. In Sappenfield v. Main St., etc., R. R. Co., 91 Cal. 59 [27 Pac. 592], it is said: 'Section 1870, subd. 9, Code Civ. Proc., provides that the opinion of a witness may be given "on a question of science, art or trade, when he is skilled therein." The general rule, however, is that witnesses must testify to facts, and not to opinions, and that whenever the question to be determined is the result of the common experiences of all men of ordinary education, or is to be inferred from particular facts, the inference is to be drawn by the jury, and not by the witness. Where the inquiry relates to a subject whose nature is not such as to require any peculiar habits or study in order to qualify one to understand it, or when all the facts upon which the opinion is founded can be ascertained and made intelligible to the court or jury, the opinion of the witness is not to be received in evidence. If the relation between the facts and their probable results can be determined without any special skill or training, the facts themselves must be given in evidence, and the conclusions or inferences must be drawn by the jury.' In that case the conclusion as to negligence depended upon the kind of coupling pin used by defendant on its street car and this question was asked of a witness: 'From your experience in driving those cars and using those pins, would you say that that was a safe pin—the straight pin?' The Supreme Court said: 'Whether this pin was "safe"—that is, unattended with personal risk to the driver—was an issue in the case for the jury to determine from all the circumstances that might be shown,' and it was held that it was not proper for the opinion evidence to be given, as the verdict of the jurors was to be based upon their own opinions from the facts, and should not be influenced by that of the witness. It is equally clear in the case at bar that the very issue to be determined by the jury was whether the method adopted by the defendant's employé for tying or securing the horses was a safe and proper one. The conclusion as to that question would necessarily determine whether plaintiff was entitled to recover. If the method adopted was not a safe and proper one, then defendant was chargeable with negligence. Indeed, the only allegation of the complaint in that respect is that: 'The driver of one of defendant's delivery wagons, to which there was attached two horses, did insecurely, negligently, and improperly hitch one of said horses, and then, without hitching the other horse at all, left said horses,' etc. In effect, therefore, the question was equivalent to asking the witness whether in his opinion negligence was imputable to the driver, and hence to his employer. It is manifestly a case where all the facts and circumstances in relation to the transaction could be disclosed and made intelligible to the jury as the correct basis for the verdict, and it was an invasion of the jury's province to seek to substitute the opinion of a witness as to defendant's conduct for that of the jurors themselves, who were capable and charged with the duty of observing and determining the relation between the facts and the consequences resulting therefrom.

"In Enright v. S. F. & S. J. R. R. Co., 33 Cal. 230, it was held that the opinion of experts is not admissible on the question of the sufficiency of a fence to turn cattle. It is said: 'The facts of the fence, bars and barway included, were to be testified to by the witness; but the question of sufficiency, assuming it to have been in the case, was with the jury and not with them.' In Shafter v. Evans, 53 Cal. 32, the judgment was reversed because the trial court admitted the opinion of witnesses as to the safety of a corral. In Kauffman v. Maier, 94 Cal. 269 [29 Pac. 481, 18 L. R. A. 124], it is held that it was error for the court to admit expert testimony 'as to whether it is more dangerous for a shaft having a rough surface or end to project into the room than it would be if the shaft were smooth, and as to whether a towel could be more safely taken from a smooth revolving shaft than a jagged and rough one.' In Linberg v. Glenwood Lumber Co., 127 Cal. 598 [60 Pac. 176, 49 L. R. A. 33], the questions held to be objectionable were: 'Can you state to the jury whether or not it is more safe for a teamster to sit on a bare load of lumber without a seat, or whether it is more safe with a seat for him?' and 'Can you state whether or not short lines used to drive horses are as safe as long lines without knots?'

"There is much plausability, however, in respondent's contention that the objection of appellant is not broad enough to reach the vice of the question, and also that it is apparent the answer could not have prejudiced the defendant. In reference to the objection itself respondent says: 'While questions in this form should not be put if objected to as to form, we would still contend that we had a right to bring out from skilled and experienced men in this line the various methods for tying horses and the facts recommending each method. For example, we would be entitled to show that bridles were weak in certain places, and that where a horse held by the bit pulled back, the strain came on the bridle close to the top of his head, where there were buckles or weak places.' Hence the contention is made that the general objection that the subject is not a matter of expert testimony was properly overruled and reference is made to the case of Giraudi v. Electric Imp. Co., 107 Cal. 120 [40 Pac. 108, 28 L. R. A. 596, 48 Am. St. Rep. 114,] as illustrating the distinction sought to be made. In that case plaintiff had been injured by coming in contact with a wire on the roof of a house, and he 'was allowed, over the objection of defendant, to ask certain questions of an expert electrician as to what matters should be taken into consideration in locating electric wires carrying such currents as these in question, and whether it was proper or prudent management to put them so low over a metallic roof. The objection was that it was the province of the jury to determine such matters, and not a proper subject for expert testimony.' The Supreme Court, in discussing the matter, through Mr. Justice Temple, says: 'The cases do undoubtedly hold that an expert cannot be asked whether a structure is a safe one, or whether certain methods are prudent, but all hold that facts may be elicited from the witness from which the conclusion inevitably follows. To illustrate: In Bemis v. Central Vt. R. R. Co., 58 Vt. 636 [3 Atl. 531], an expert was held not allowed to testify "that it was not prudent to use a certain hoisting apparatus with less than three men, on a stone of two tons heft." Yet the court said there might have been shown "the number of men required, danger in its use by a less number, its safety and adequacy when properly used," and added that the jurors could as well decide for themselves. * * * The difference is largely one as to the form of the question; and, while I do not mean to say that it is immaterial, or that such an error may never be cause for a reversal, I do not think it should be so held here. The answer of the witness gave the facts in full, and explained what methods would have been safe. All this information might have been obtained by proper questions.' So here it would have been proper to ask Mr. Wright what would be the effect of fastening a strap to the snaffle, and the same information would have been obtained. It is true he says it was not a safe way of hitching the horse, but that obviously is his conclusion from the statement that 'some part of the bridle will give way' if the horse pulls back. And again, since it was admitted that there was no injury to the bridle at the time of the accident, it is hard to see how the answer of the witness could have hurt defendant.

"(3) On cross-examination of the driver, George Vincent, called by defendant, the following proceedings took place: 'Q. Where are these horses now? (Objected to as immaterial, irrelevant, and incompetent. Objection overruled. Defendant excepts.) A. One of them is in the company's possession. Q. On what team is he working? (Same objection, ruling and exception.) A. On the city team. The other horse was sold. I don't know where he is. Q. Why was he sold? (Same objection, ruling, and exception.) A. It was sold because we did not particularly have any use for him then. We got in some more new horses. * * * Q. What strap did you use, or what means did you adopt for the tying of these horses after the accident? (Objected to as to the tying of the team subsequent to the accident as immaterial, irrelevant, and incompetent, and no proper cross-examination.)' The objection was overruled, and the witness answered, 'I used a rope'; and he proceeded to state, over objection, how he tied the rope. The ruling in relation to what became of the horses may be disregarded, as appellant, by the objection, should have called the court's attention to the fact that it was not proper cross-examination, and besides, the answer was probably not prejudicial; but the method adopted for tying the horses after the accident presents a more serious question.

"As stated by the Supreme Court, through Mr. Justice Angellotti, in Helling v. Schindler, 145 Cal. 312 [78 Pac. 713]: 'It is now well settled in this state, in accordance with the rule prevailing generally elsewhere, that evidence of precautions taken after the happening of the accident is not admissible to show a negligent condition at the time of the accident.' Other cases are therein cited, where the matter is elaborately discussed, and the wisdom of the rule is clearly demonstrated. However, the rule is not questioned by respondent, but the contention is made that the questions were in the line of proper cross-examination. We fail to find any inquiry in the direct examination as to the method of tying the horses subsequent to the accident. The nearest approach to it is found in the statement of the witness: 'I had been driving this pair of horses from November, 1903, up to the time of the accident. In fact, I drove them up until about four months ago; that is, since the accident. I drove them after the accident just the same.' Hitching the horses is a subject entirely distinct from driving them, and we cannot agree with counsel that the questions were within the legitimate scope of cross-examination.

"(4) Among other instructions, the court gave the following (No. 23): 'It is provided by city ordinance that any horse left standing unattended on the public streets of the city of Oakland shall be properly secured by hitching; and, if the jury believes that defendant's bay horse, which stood farthest away from the curb on San Pablo avenue while defendant's team was left standing by the driver unattended, was not properly secured by hitching, then I instruct you that the defendant was guilty of a violation of the city ordinance.' The evidence, without conflict, showed that only the black horse next to the curb was hitched, but the driver testified on behalf of the defendant that: 'I set it [the brake] hard down, chock-a-block sufficiently tight to block the wheels, so that they were set as near as I could so they would slide, and I wrapped the reins three or four times around the brake.' We think it should have been left to the jury to determine whether this was a sufficient compliance with the requirement of the ordinance. In other words, we consider it unreasonable to hold that when a team is left standing and unattended, the ordinance requires in any event that every horse constituting the team should be hitched. The ordinance should have a reasonable construction, in harmony with its purpose to secure the safety of the citizens in their property and persons. Whether that purpose could be best subserved by requiring every horse of a team to be tied depends upon various circumstances of each particular case, which should be left to the determination of the jury in view of all the evidence. Here the jury was instructed as a matter of law that, 'if the bay horse was not properly secured by hitching,' then the ordinance was violated. It was virtually admitted that the bay horse was not hitched. Hence the court might as well have instructed the jury to find for the plaintiff on the issue of negligence.

"The question, as we view it, was properly presented in instructions 31 and 36 as follows: 'If you should believe from the evidence that the defendant's hitching was safe and sound just before the accident, and still if you should further find that such a hitching strap, when fastened to the bit of one horse and not fastened in any way to the other, does not properly secure the team, then the defendant was guilty of negligence in fastening its team in such a manner upon the occasion in question,' and, 'If you find that upon driving up to the sidewalk, upon dismounting to go into the restaurant, Vincent, the driver, set the brake hard, wound the reins around the brake, and then fastened one end of the hitching strap reasonably fit for that purpose to the bit of one of the horses, and the other end to a post at or near the edge of the sidewalk, you must consider all these circumstances in determining whether the driver used reasonable care and precaution to secure the horses in thus hitching them. If you find, as a fact, that the driver used reasonable care and caution in hitching the horses, then the ordinance was not violated, and your verdict must be for the defendant.' In other words, the jury was told that whether the horses were properly secured and the ordinance violated must be determined by a consideration of all the circumstances, but in said instruction 23 the inquiry was limited to the single circumstance of the failure to hitch the bay horse.

"It is true that instructions are to be read and considered as a whole, but there is no room here for the application of the principle stated in Stephenson v. Southern Pacific Co., 102 Cal. 143 [34 Pac. 618, 36 Pac. 407], and other cases, that 'the fact that when taken separately some of them may fail to enumerate in precise terms and with legal accuracy propositions of law does not necessarily render them erroneous; but it is sufficient if all the instructions taken together, and not being inconsistent with each other or confusing, shall give to the jury a fair and just motion of the law upon the point discussed.' The said instructions are inconsistent and confusing. The direction that a violation of the ordinance follows from the determination of one fact by necessary implication excludes the consideration of other facts and circumstances. If the law had been correctly given in said instruction 23, it might be held that the others were too favorable to defendant, and that the error was without prejudice, but we are of the opinion that this conclusion would necessitate a stricter construction of the ordinance than is warranted.

"In view of the foregoing, we do not see how the verdict can be upheld."

Learned counsel for plaintiff strenuously urge that the evidence adduced by them from the driver as to the change in the method of hitching the horses after the accident was properly elicited on cross-examination, in view of matters testified to by him on direct examination. The only testimony so given on direct examination on which reliance is thus based is set forth in the opinion of the District Court of Appeal. We agree with that court in the view that it did not warrant the cross-examination.

In view of the facts of this case the trial court, by instruction 23, clearly told the jury that, in order to comply with the ordinance, the bay horse must be separately hitched, which, concededly, had not been done. The two horses were securely attached one to the other, and remained so attached throughout the runaway, and up to the time of the injuries caused plaintiff thereby, and the question in the case was not whether one or the other of the horses was properly secured by hitching, but whether the team of two horses was so secured. One of the two horses could not be so secured unless the other also was, and there could be no reason for singling out the bay horse and directing the jury that, unless it was "properly secured by hitching," the defendant was guilty of a violation of the city ordinance, other than to inform them that to comply with the ordinance each horse of the team must be separately hitched. This was the necessary implication from the instruction, and we do not see how it could have been understood by the jury in any other way, or how its prejudicial effect was obviated by the giving of other instructions inconsistent therewith.

After mature consideration, we are satisfied with the views expressed in the opinion of the District Court of Appeal and adopt the same as the opinion of this court.

The judgment and order denying a new trial are reversed.

GRAHAM et al. v. BAILARD, Road Commissioner, et al. (L. A. 2,275.)

1. Appeal and Error (§ 1033*) — Harmless Error—Right to Urge Error—Error Favorable to Party Complaining.

In a suit against a road commissioner to enjoin the cutting away a bank on the side of the road, the question being whether the proposed work is on plaintiff's land, the court found that an order establishing the highway had been legally made, and did not include the land in question. Held that, on appeal by defendant, the plaintiff cannot question the correctness of such finding, but must concede the establishment of a valid order declaring a public highway.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 4059; Dec. Dig. § 1033.*]

2. Highways (§ 53*)—Construction of Order Establishing Highway.

An order establishing a highway may merely designate a line without defining the width of the highway, and a road so described will be deemed a road of the minimum width prescribed by statute, and such a line will be deemed to refer to the center line of the road, in the absence of anything to indicate a contrary intention, but the intention to have the line mark a side of the road may appear from other parts of the description.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Highways, Cent. Dig. §§ 159, 160; Dec. Dig. § 53.*]

3. Highways (§ 68*)—Restraining Improvement—Evidence—Location of Highway.

In a suit to restrain a road commissioner from cutting away banks on the side of a road adjoining plaintiff's land, evidence held not to sustain the findings of the court that the highway as described in the order establishing it includes only the land actually worked and traveled as a highway.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Highways, Cent. Dig. §§ 227–233; Dec. Dig. § 68.*]

4. Highways (§ 79*)—Abandonment.

Where a highway is legally established, the fact that the ground has not been made fit for travel to the entire width does not amount to an abandonment of the portion not used.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Highways, Cent. Dig. §§ 283, 284; Dec. Dig. § 79.*]

5. Eminent Domain (§ 170*)—Taking Land for Highway—Consent of Owners—Conformity to Law.

Under the road law, viewers were required to report the damage to lands over which the road was to run, the names of the landowners who consented to give the right of way, with their written consent, and the names of the landowners who did not consent, and that, where owners did not consent, the board of supervisors should fix the damages to be awarded them, and, if they accepted the same, the board might then make an order opening the highway, but, if any owner should not accept, a condemnation suit might be brought, and, when the title was acquired, the order declaring a highway might be made. A report of viewers stated that an owner consented only to one-half of the width, and that a road 50 feet wide would damage him materially and a communication by such owner annexed to the report protested against more than 25 feet being used, and consented only to the taking of that much. The report of the viewers was accepted. Held, that the order establishing the road which did not specify the width is invalid in so far as it purports to appropriate more than 25 feet in width along such owner's property, as in acquiring private property for highway purposes against the will of the owner the authority granted to the board must be strictly construed.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Eminent Domain, Cent. Dig. § 466; Dec. Dig. § 170.*]

6. Highways (§ 63*) — Establishment—Collateral Attack.

An order establishing a highway cannot be attacked in proceedings to restrain a road commissioner from cutting down banks on land upon the side of the road by showing that the order attempted to establish a highway of a less width than the minimum prescribed by law, and was therefore void.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Highways, Cent. Dig. § 168; Dec. Dig. § 63.*]

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Barbara County; S. E. Crow, Judge.

Action by Lee Ealenor Graham and another against John W. Bailard and the City of Santa Barbara. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendants appeal. Reversed and remanded.

W. P. Butcher, City Atty., H. C. Booth, and E. W. Squier, for appellants. W. S. Day, for respondents.

ANGELLOTTI, J. The plaintiff Lee Ealenor Graham, owning a tract of land in the county of Santa Barbara, commenced this action against the defendant Bailard, as road commissioner, to enjoin him from digging into and cutting away certain points and banks of land upon the side of a road adjoining plaintiff's land. The question in dispute is whether the location of the proposed work is on plaintiff's land, or whether it is within the limits of a public highway. Since the commencement of the action the boundaries of the city of Santa Barbara have been extended so as to include this territory, and the city has been joined as a party defendant. The land owned by Mrs. Graham is a tract of some 23 acres. It consists of the westerly end of a mound or hill, sloping more or less abruptly to the north, west, and south. On the south it is bounded by the Santa Barbara channel. A road, known as the East boulevard, runs easterly along the shore of the channel from the city of Santa Barbara, until it strikes a point on the westerly front of the mound, there connecting with a road which skirts the foot of the mound along its westerly and northerly sides, and runs, in part, between the mound and a salt pond. The work proposed to be done by the defendants is the cutting off and leveling of portions of the hill, consisting of points or projections of earth adjoining this latter road, with a view to elevating and widening the road.

The complaint alleges that these points or projections are within the limits of Mrs. Graham's property. The answer asserts that they are within the boundary lines of the highway. The road as actually marked out and traveled upon the ground does not include the ground in dispute. The defendants allege, however, that there was a legally established highway of a width sufficient to include it, and base their claim in this regard upon the creation of such highway, first, by proceedings taken under Pol. Code, § 2681 et seq.; second, by dedication; and, third, by prescription. The court found that there never had been any road laid out or established either by judicial or legislative action or acquired by dedication or prescription over the premises of the plaintiff other than the present road as now opened, maintained and traveled. Judgment was entered, enjoining the defendants as prayed in the complaint. The defendants appealed from the judgment within 60 days after its entry, and bring up the evidence by means of a bill of exceptions.

It is urged that the evidence fails to support the findings. While the appellants contend for a highway both by dedication and by prescription, they rely in the main upon the position that the highway, to the extent claimed, was established as the result of proceedings taken by the board of supervisors.

The findings in regard to this, in addition to the general finding set forth above, are that on the 21st day of July, 1877, the board of supervisors made and entered an order declaring certain land to be a public highway, and directing the roadmaster to open the same, "that said road as declared, laid, and established was not of the uniform width of 50 feet nor was it entirely on the southeast side of the said line [the line described in said order], but was bounded by the salt pond on the northerly and westerly sides and the foot of the hill on the southerly and easterly sides"; that a road was thereupon laid out in full accord with said order which has ever since been well defined and open and worked for its full width, but none of the projections and points of earth upon which defendants are alleged to be trespassing are within said road "as declared or as laid out"; that said board by said order "did * * * establish and cause to be located a public highway," but that the same was the road as actually laid out on the ground and worked and traveled, and no other. These findings must be read in connection with the general finding first quoted, and show what was meant by the court when it found that there had never been any road laid out or established on the premises of Mrs. Graham other than the present traveled road.

All these findings are attacked by defendant. It is apparent that such findings concede and establish for all of the purposes of this appeal the validity of all of the proceedings for the establishment of a public highway to and including the order purporting to declare the same. On this appeal by defendants from a judgment in favor of the plaintiffs, plaintiffs are not, of course, in a position to question the correctness of these findings. For the purposes of this appeal, they must concede that the findings conclusively establish a valid order declaring a public highway. Defendants claim that the public highway as described in the order includes more than the land now actually worked and traveled as a public highway. The findings of the trial court are against them on this proposition, being in effect, as we have seen, that the highway described in the order is the road actually laid out and used and traveled on the ground, and that it included no more ground. The only question is, then: What land did the description in the order include? We are satisfied that the findings of the trial court upon this particular question are not sustained by the evidence.

The description of the road, as contained in the order, is as follows: "Commencing at a point from which the northwest corner of the Santa Barbara cemetery bears south 37 links distant. Thence 1st. S. 50¾° W. 8.53 chains thence 2nd S. 75¼° W. 6.51 chains To a stake from which an oak tree one foot in diameter bears S. 32¼ W. 74 links distant Thence along south side of Salt Pond the north foot of the hill. 3rd S. 80⅜° W. 2.65 chains to a stake. 4th. S. 85° W. 2.48 chains to a Stake. 5th. S. 85¼° W. 7.50 chains to a stake. 6th. S. 77¾° W. 1.95 chains to a stake, being a stake set in the partition of the estate of George Nidever deceased. 7th S. 44° W. 4.50 chains to a stake. 8th S. 19¾° W. 5.03 chains to a stake. 9th S. 8¼ W. to high water mark of the Santa Barbara Channel, as surveyed by A. S. Cooper whose report accompanies papers on file, and map of the proposed road." The width of the road in feet is not stated in the order; the whole description therein being as above set forth. Defendants' claim is that the order did not attempt to define its width, but only a line along its length. This is permissive in highway proceedings where a minimum width of highway is prescribed by statute. Where a road is so described, it will be deemed to be a road of the minimum width prescribed by statute in the absence of anything showing to the contrary. Elliott on Roads and Streets (2d Ed.) § 381; Crowley v. Board of Com'rs, 14 Mont. 292, 36 Pac. 313; Hentzler v. Bradbury, 47 Pac. 330; Willis v. Sproule, 13 Kan. 257. At the time of these proceedings, section 2710 of the Political Code provided that all highways must be at least 50 feet wide excepting those now existing of a less width. A single line of length being given and the width being determined, the exact location of the road cannot be fixed until it is known whether the line described marks the center, or one or the other side of the road. In the absence of anything to indicate a contrary intention such line will be deemed to refer to the center line of the road. Freshour v. Hihn, 99 Cal. 443, 34 Pac. 87. The intention to have the line mark a side of the road may appear, however, from other parts of the description. 15 A. & E. Ency. of Law (7th Ed.) p. 384; McDonald v. Payne, 114 Ind. 359, 16 N. E. 795; Freshour v. Hihn, supra. Defendants further claim that it clearly appears, when the description is considered in connection with the viewers' reports and map to which it refers, that the line given was intended to mark the northern and western line of the road, and that the whole of the road lies to the south and east thereof. The claim of plaintiffs, sustained to the letter by the findings, is that the order described a road limited in width by the "south side of Salt Pond" on the one side and the "north foot of hill" on the other. The latter construction, as the evidence very clearly shows, will give a strip of very irregular width, in many places several feet less than 25 feet.

The claim of plaintiffs in this regard is based entirely on the words, "thence along south side of Salt Pond the north foot of hill," following the second course, and forming apparently a part of the description of the third course. They say, and the court found, that this is a limitation of width, and was intended to define a road which should be bounded on the one side by the edge of the pond and on the other by the foot of the hill.

We do not find any reasonable support for the latter construction. It is not reasonable to suppose that the surveyor in laying out a road intended to define the width of a small part only of the road, leaving the other undefined, or that the viewers, or the supervisors, in adopting this description, intended to make any such limitation. The construction sought to be placed on these words by plaintiffs is not even the natural and reasonable interpretation. They appear to be only additional terms showing the course and direction of the line of the road, serving to make more certain by reference to fixed natural monuments. The documents referred to, and, in effect, made a part of the order—i. e., the report of the surveyor and the map attached to the report of the viewers—clearly show that plaintiffs' construction is without support, and also that the line described was the northerly and westerly line of the road. The map shows the nine stations referred to in the field notes, and a series of straight lines, in black, connecting them. South and east of these lines and parallel to them are a series of similar lines marked in red ink. The locations of these lines on the map indicate, at a glance, that they are meant to mark the sides of the road, and that the black lines (i. e., those referred to in the field notes) represent the northerly and westerly boundary, and the red the southerly and easterly boundary of the proposed road. The map further shows that the red lines were so drawn as to indicate a road fifty feet in width the whole length. The viewers' report had annexed to it the written consent of Jarrett T. Richards, then the owner of the westerly and larger part of plaintiffs' property, that a road 25 feet in width be located over his property "southeast of the line run by the surveyor, shown on map by black line," and his statement that he would claim no damage therefor, but that he protested against the creation of the road "as made by the viewers." In their report the viewers, stating as required by the law the names of landowners who consent, said that Jarrett T. Richards consented "to ½ of the width." They further said: "We consider the 25 feet in width consented to by Mr. Richards to be an ample width. If a road was made 50 feet in width, it would damage Mr. Richards' property materially." The description in the petition for a road does not materially tend to support plaintiffs' claim. In the light of all this, it is impossible to come to any other conclusion than that the description in the order was simply a description of the northerly and westerly line of the proposed road. Whether the road thus described in the order was a road 50 feet or 25 feet wide throughout its entire length, or a road 50 feet wide except in front of Mr. Richards' property, and there only 25 feet wide, is another question, the determination of which is not material to the particular question we have been discussing. In any event, the findings already referred to are unsupported by the evidence, and, as they are essential to the judgment on the record on this appeal, the judgment must be reversed. It is well settled that, where a highway is legally established by proper proceedings, the mere fact that the ground has not been graded and made fit for travel to the entire width does not amount to an abandonment of the portion not used. Moore v. Roberts, 64 Wis. 538, 25 N. W. 564; McClelland v. Miller, 28 Ohio St. 488; Wolfe v. Sullivan, 133 Ind. 331, 32 N. E. 1018; Humphreys v. Mayor, 48 N. J. Law, 588, 7 Atl. 301; Hentzler v. Bradbury, 5 Kan. App. 1, 47 Pac. 330. Upon a new trial, the question of the exact width of the road will probably be an important one, as well as the question of the validity of the order whether it be construed as purporting to establish a road 50 feet wide on the property formerly owned by Richards, or a road only 25 feet wide on the Richards' property and 50 feet wide elsewhere, or a road 25 feet wide throughout.

It is clear to us that the order must be held invalid in so far as it may purport to appropriate in front of Richards' property more than 25 feet in width lying south and east of the line described. In acquiring private property for highway purposes against the will of the owner, the authority granted to a board or tribunal must be strictly pursued, and an order purporting to open a road in such a case is void unless the requirements of the statute have been substantially complied with. Damrell v. Board of Supervisors, 40 Cal. 154; County of Sonoma v. Crozier, 118 Cal. 680, 682, 50 Pac. 845. It affirmatively appeared on the face of this order that Mr. Richards had consented and waived damages only so far as appeared by the report of the viewers. Under the road law, the viewers were required to report an estimate of the damage to the owners of the lands over which the road was to run, the names of the landowners who consented to give the right of way with their written consent, and the names of the landowners who did not consent. They reported that Mr. Richards consented only "to ½ of the width," and that a road 50 feet wide would damage him materially. His own writing annexed was a vigorous protest against more than 25 feet, and a consent only to the taking of 25 feet. The road law further provided that, where owners did not consent, the board of supervisors should fix the amount of damages to be awarded them, and set the same apart in the treasury for them, and that, if they accepted the same, the board might then make an order declaring the public highway, but, if any owner should not accept, a condemnation suit might be brought, and, when the title was acquired, the order declaring a highway might be made. In this proceeding the board made the order on the theory that Richards was a consenting owner and without making any allowance whatever for the damage accruing to him. Of course, they could not take any of his property without his consent in this way, and any order purporting to do so would be invalid. The provisions of the road law stating these requirements were designed to safeguard the owner against any violation of his constitutional rights, and substantial compliance with them was essential to a valid order taking his property. Richards' written consent to the taking of a road 25 feet wide would probably estop him and his successors from alleging any invalidity in the order so far as that width is concerned, especially now that a road has been constructed.

But we do not think that the order should be construed as purporting to take more than 25 feet in width along Richards' property. To so construe it would attribute to the board of supervisors an intention to take a portion of his property against his consent without compensation. The viewers' report was clear and explicit so far as their intention in the matter was concerned. They said that they considered the 25 feet in width consented to by Mr. Richards to be "an ample width," and that to make the road 50 feet in width would damage him materially, and it was clearly on that theory that they made him no allowance for damages. The law requires that the board of supervisors should approve or reject the viewers' report, and provided that, if they approved it, they may proceed in the matter of opening the road. They did order the report "accepted," and so proceeded, all of which necessarily implies an approval of the report. This conclusion involves, of course, the holding that the board intended to make a road of less width, in part at least, than the minimum prescribed by law, the contrary of which should be presumed in the absence of a showing otherwise. We are of the opinion that the record of the proceedings does so show.

It is suggested that an order declaring a public highway of less width than the minimum prescribed by law would be void. While such an objection might be effectual in a proceeding seasonably brought, we think the more reasonable view to be that the proceedings may not be impeached for this reason on a collateral attack, especially when the road has been constructed and traveled and acquiesced in for a long period of years. See Elliott on Roads and Streets (2d Ed.) § 381.

We are further of the opinion in the light of the record that the limitation as to width can be regarded only as applying exclusively to the Richards' property. If we are correct in our views as to the proper construction of the order, it is clear that there can be no force in the claim that there has been any dedication or acquirement of an easement by prescription as to any of the Richards' property more than 25 feet from the line described in the order, except in so far as any of such property is included in the road as actually used for highway purposes.

There is no other matter that requires attention for the purposes of a new trial.

The judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

CITY OF LOS ANGELES v. LELANDE, City Clerk. (S. F. 5,430.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 22, 1909.)

1. Municipal Corporations (§ 106*)—Officers—City Clerk.

The city clerk of Los Angeles is a ministerial officer who must sign every ordinance duly passed, regardless of any views which he may entertain as to its legality.

2. Mandamus (§ 176*)—Compelling the Signing of City Ordinance.

The mandate directed against the city clerk of Los Angeles for his refusal to sign an ordinance duly passed may properly go no further than to order him to perform the plain duty of signing it.

In Bank. Petition by the City of Los Angeles for a writ of mandamus against Harry J. Lelande, city clerk thereof. Denied.

See 104 Pac. 717.

Leslie R. Hewitt, City Atty., and John W. Shenk, Asst. City Atty., for petitioner. W. B. Mathews, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. The petition is denied. The application is within the precedent established by City of Los Angeles v. Hance, 137 Cal. 490, 70 Pac. 475, but the court is of the opinion that this decision should not be followed. The city clerk is a purely ministerial officer, whose duty it is to sign any and every ordinance which has been duly passed, regardless of any views which he may entertain as to its legality or illegality. Mandate directed against the clerk for his refusal to sign an ordinance could properly go no further than to order him to perform his plain duty, and any discussion touching the legality or illegality, constitutionality or unconstitutionality, of the ordinance in question would be the merest obiter, binding upon no one, and not determinative of any rights.

LLEWELYN v. LEVI. (L. A. 2,248.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 23, 1909.)

1. New Trial (§ 61*)—Grounds—Failure to Make Findings.

Where plaintiff contracted to sell land to defendant for $10,000, and deposited a deed in escrow, to be delivered if defendant made certain payments within fixed dates, and the parties made a further agreement that up to the date for the last payment the property might be sold for any sum not less than $12,000, the profit to be divided equally, and the defendant orally agreed to use his best endeavor to sell the property at the highest price obtainable, and no sale was made, but defendant agreed to take the property at $15,000, paying plaintiff one-half the difference, but plaintiff alleged that defendant failed to make any fair and reasonable effort to sell the land, and that if he had made such effort, he would have sold it for $20,000, or more, and this was denied by the answer, the failure of the court to find on the issue thus made requires a new trial.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see New Trial, Cent. Dig. § 127; Dec. Dig. § 61.*]

2. Partnership (§ 7*)—What Constitutes.

An agreement between a seller and purchaser of land that it might be sold for an advanced price at any time before the time fixed for the last payment of the purchaser, and the profit should be shared between them, constituted them partners in the enterprise of resale.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Partnership, Cent. Dig. § 20; Dec. Dig. § 7.*]

3. Partnership (§ 70*)—Mutual Rights and Liabilities.

Under Civ. Code, §§ 2410, 2411, partners are trustees for each other, and in proceedings connected with the conduct of the partnership, each is bound to act in the highest good faith to his copartner and may not obtain any advantage by the slightest misrepresentation, concealment, threat, or adverse pressure of any kind.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Partnership, Cent. Dig. § 114; Dec. Dig. § 70.*]

4. Partnership (§ 96*)—Partnership Property—Rights of Partners.

A partner has no right to deal with partnership property other than for the benefit of the partnership.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Partnership, Cent. Dig. § 144; Dec. Dig. § 96.*]

5. Partnership (§ 79*)—Mutual Rights—Sale of Property.

Where a purchaser of land agreed to use his best endeavors to sell the land at an advanced price, the profit to be divided with the vendor, he had no right to refrain from selling at the best price obtainable, exceeding the minimum fixed by the agreement, for the reason that he thought the property was worth more than the price offered, and for the purpose of making a greater profit for himself.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Partnership, Cent. Dig. § 127; Dec. Dig. § 79.*]

6. Partnership (§ 79*)—Mutual Rights—Sale of Property.

The obligation of a purchaser, under an agreement with a vendor of land, to resell the land for the best price obtainable, was not affected by the receipt of a telegram from the vendor advising him to accept a certain price.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Partnership, Cent. Dig. § 127; Dec. Dig. § 79.*]

7. Accord and Satisfaction (§ 20*)—Validity.

Where plaintiff sold land to defendant for $10,000, with an agreement that defendant should use his best endeavors to find a purchaser therefor at not less than $12,000, the profit to be divided between them, and defendant, having procured an offer of $15,000, which plaintiff was willing to accept, falsely reported that the offer had been withdrawn, and offered to take the land at $15,000, paying plaintiff his share of the advance in the price, where plaintiff claimed that defendant, by fair effort could have sold the land for $20,000 or more, on which issue the court made no finding, the settlement at $15,000 is of no avail to defendant.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; E. S. Torrance, Judge.

Action by William Llewelyn against Adolph Levi. From a judgment for defendant, and an order denying a new trial, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

J. Wade McDonald, for appellant. Sam Ferry Smith and Collier, Smith & Hoff, for respondent.

ANGELLOTTI, J. This is an appeal from a judgment in favor of defendant, and an order denying plaintiff's motion for a new trial. The action was one to obtain judgment setting aside a settlement of their differences, previously had between the parties, on the ground that the same was procured by fraudulent misrepresentations on the part of defendant, and for the amount of $5,000 alleged to be the true amount due from defendant to plaintiff.

In view of the condition of the pleadings and certain unassailed findings of the trial court there can be no dispute as to certain material facts. On July 12, 1906, plaintiff was the owner of certain real property in the city of San Diego. On that day he entered into an agreement with defendant in regard to said property, evidenced by two writings signed by both parties. One of these was an agreement for the sale of the property by plaintiff to defendant, for $10,000, payable $2,500 cash, the receipt whereof was acknowledged, $2,500 within 30 days, and $5,000 "on or before the 1st day of January, A. D. 1907." This agreement recited that plaintiff had executed a deed to defendant, to be held in escrow by the First National Bank of San Diego, for delivery to defendant if he paid to the bank or plaintiff $2,500 on or before 30 days from July 12, 1906, and $5,000 on or before January 1, 1907, with interest, and if such payments were not made the deed was to be redelivered to plaintiff. It was further provided therein that plaintiff was to have the use and occupancy of the premises until January 1, 1907, paying therefor $40 per month from August 1, 1906. The other writing was an agreement between defendant, as party of the first part, and plaintiff, as party of the second part, which, after reciting the sale by plaintiff to defendant and the deposit of the deed in escrow, and, further, "whereas, said parties are to share in the profits of a sale of said property, if sold prior to the first day of January, A. D. 1907," provided: "It is therefore understood by and between said parties, that the said property may be sold at any time before the 1st day of January, A. D. 1907, for a sum of not less than $12,000, and if so sold, that out of the proceeds of said sale said sum of $10,000 as aforesaid shall be paid to the said party of the first part, together with interest thereon from this date, at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum, and all sums over said $10,000 and said 6 per cent. per annum (exclusive of expenses of sale) are to be divided equally between said parties. That is to say, to the said party of the first part one-half thereof, and to said party of the second part one-half thereof. It is further understood and agreed, that if a sale of said premises is not made prior to the 1st day of January, A. D. 1907, that all the interest, rights and equities of said party of the second part under this agreement shall cease, end and determine."

At the time of the execution of these agreements it was understood between the parties that plaintiff was intending to leave San Diego county and go into the northern part of the state, and the defendant "verbally promised and agreed that he would use his best endeavors to sell said property during the life of said agreements for the highest price obtainable therefor, and said plaintiff did leave said county and remained away therefrom continuously, except for a period of two weeks during the latter part of the month of August and the early part of the month of September, and for about two days in the month of November, 1906, during which visits similar conversations to those had at the time of the execution of said agreements were had between said parties." The deed was deposited in escrow as provided. On August 22, 1906, defendant paid to the bank the $2,500 installment, and on December 24, 1906, he paid to the bank the $5,000 installment, whereupon the deed was delivered to him.

It is alleged in the complaint, and must be deemed admitted by the form of denial in the answer, that during the latter part of the month of December, 1906, much of the property in the city of San Diego made a rapid and permanent increase in value and price, and that this property had attained a market and selling value of practically $20,000. There is no finding on this, but the evidence is all one way, to the effect that this property had a market value of $20,000 during the last 12 or 14 days of December, 1906. On December 18, 1906, Charles S. Hardy made, through one Walsh, a real estate agent, a cash offer of $15,000 for this property, less the agent's commission of 5 per cent. Defendant, on receiving this offer, telegraphed plaintiff as follows: "W. Llewelyn, Asti, Sonoma Co., Cal. Have sold lots fifteen thousand ($15,000) dollars. Are you satisfied? Answer quick. Adolph Levi." On receiving this message, plaintiff, on December 20, 1906, telegraphed defendant as follows: "A. Levi, San Diego, Cal. Satisfied. Sell, though might bring more later. W. Llewelyn." Defendant thereupon refused to accept Mr. Hardy's offer "for the reason that he believed the same to be worth more money," and offered it to Hardy for $20,000, which offer was not accepted. Defendant never received any bona fide cash offer other than Mr. Hardy's $15,000 offer. On December 24, 1906, according to the findings, he "elected to take said property to himself" for the sum of $15,000, believing, the court found, that he had a legal right to do so, inasmuch as plaintiff had indicated his willingness to sell for that sum. He apparently did not notify plaintiff of his "election." Plaintiff returned to San Diego in January, 1907. He was informed by defendant that the offer of $15,000 by Mr. Hardy had been withdrawn by the purchaser because of the delay in the receipt by defendant of plaintiff's reply to the telegram, and that he had not been able to sell the property prior to January 1st for any sum greater than $15,000. He said that he was willing to take the property himself at the sum of $15,000, and would pay plaintiff one-half the difference between that price and $10,000, provided plaintiff would allow defendant one-half of the commission which would have been paid to a real estate agent for making the sale at $15,000. Plaintiff believed and relied on all the statements of defendant, and had no knowledge whatever to the contrary, and, relying thereon, agreed to a settlement. The defendant gave to plaintiff his promissory note for $2,250, and plaintiff executed and delivered to defendant a writing reciting that the parties "have this day settled all matters and differences between them, arising out of the sale," etc., except a certain matter of taxes, which has since been settled.

It was substantially alleged in the complaint that the property could have been sold for $20,000, or more, between the 15th day of December, 1906, and the 1st day of January, 1907, if the defendant had made any reasonable and fair effort to so sell it, and that the defendant failed to make any reasonable or proper effort to sell it for $20,000, or any other sum or amount whatever above the sum of $15,000, after December 18, 1906, and before January 1, 1907. All this was denied by the answer. The trial court failed to find on the issue thus made, although there was evidence which would have sufficiently sustained a finding in accord with the allegations of the complaint. The failure of the trial court to make any finding on this issue is assigned as a particular in which the decision is against law. Plaintiff sought by this action to recover the amount in which he had been damaged by the alleged fraudulent failure of defendant to perform his agreement. In view of the facts stated we are satisfied that the issue last referred to was most material, and that, owing to the failure of the trial court to find thereon, a new trial must be had.

The intent of the agreement of the parties is clear and unmistakable. Plaintiff's views as to the probable real value of his property were such that he was unwilling to part with it for $10,000, except upon the condition specified in the second paper, and defendant's consent to this condition was, of course, a material part of the consideration for the agreement to sell. That condition was, in substance, that the plaintiff and defendant were to share equally in the profits of any sale that could be made of the property prior to January 1, 1907, for $12,000 or more. The effect of this was to constitute them partners until January 1, 1907, in the enterprise of a resale of this property, at a profit for their mutual benefit, with the proviso that no resale was to be made for less than $12,000. It was the understanding and agreement of the parties, relied on implicitly by plaintiff, that, owing to the proposed absence of plaintiff, the defendant was to assume the burden of endeavoring to make such sale, and defendant promised "that he would use his best endeavors to sell said property during the life of said agreements for the highest price obtainable." Partners are trustees for each other, and in all proceedings connected with the conduct of the partnership every partner is bound to act in the highest good faith to his copartner, and may not obtain any advantage over him in the partnership affairs by the slightest misrepresentation, concealment, threat, or adverse pressure of any kind. Civ. Code, §§ 2410, 2411. A partner has no right to deal with partnership property other than for the sole benefit of the partnership. Koyer v. Willmon, 150 Cal. 785, 90 Pac. 135. Under the agreement it was the plain duty of defendant to plaintiff to make all reasonable and proper effort to sell the property prior to January 1, 1907, for the best price obtainable. He had no right to refrain from selling for the best price obtainable (if that price exceeded the minimum fixed by the agreement), for the reason that he thought the property was worth more than the amount offered. If he could by reasonable and proper effort sell for $12,000 or more prior to January 1, 1907, he must do so for the common profit of himself and his partner, and it was his plain duty to his partner to obtain the best price which was, in his judgment, obtainable. He could not abstain from doing this for the purpose of making a greater profit for himself. If he did so abstain, he would be guilty of fraud against his copartner, and liable to him for the damage caused thereby. His obligation in this regard continued to January 1, 1907, notwithstanding the telegram from plaintiff relative to Mr. Hardy's offer.

There appears to be some claim that, inasmuch as plaintiff by his telegram signified his willingness that the offer of $15,000 be accepted, defendant was released from the necessity of making further effort to sell for a higher price, and given the right to elect to close the partnership transaction and retain the property himself upon the theory of a resale for $15,000, although he then believed the property to be worth in the market more than that sum, which is what the court finds he did. But plaintiff had not given his consent to any such course. He had done no more than to indicate his assent that his partner might, if he thought it best for their mutual interests, sell the property to some third party for the sum of $15,000, and this assent was given in response to a communication from defendant, which was calculated to impress plaintiff with the belief that defendant deemed it best for their common interest that such sale to a third person should be consummated. When defendant refused to accept the $15,000 offer, the obligation created by the partnership agreement continued to exist. If defendant thenceforth secretly repudiated his trust, and willfully refrained from further effort to sell for the benefit of the partnership, with the intention and for the purpose of making a greater profit for himself, it appears clear that he should be held liable to account to his partner, upon the theory of a resale made for the highest sum that he would have obtained for the property prior to January 1, 1907, if he had made all reasonable and fair efforts to sell it. The damage to plaintiff was the amount of which he was deprived by the failure of defendant to make such a sale. We think the principles enunciated in King v. Wise, 43 Cal. 628, Koyer v. Willmon, 150 Cal. 785, 90 Pac. 135, and Calmon v. Saraille, 142 Cal. 638, 642, 76 Pac. 486, require the conclusion we have reached.

In the absence of a finding upon the issue we have been discussing, the subsequent settlement between the parties of their differences cannot avail defendant. According to the findings said settlement was procured by the positive statement of defendant to plaintiff that the offer of $15,000 had been withdrawn by the proposed purchaser "because of the delay in the receipt by the defendant of plaintiff's reply to said telegram," which statement, it appears from what has already been said, was untrue, and by the further material positive statement of defendant that he had not been able to sell said property to any person prior to the 1st day of January, 1907, for any sum greater than $15,000, as to the truth of which we have no finding, although that matter was directly in issue under the pleadings.

We consider it unnecessary for the purpose of this appeal to discuss the other points made, further than to say that we cannot, upon the record, order judgment entered for plaintiff upon the findings. Defendant's liability, if any, for any sum in excess of what would have been realized by plaintiff upon a resale for $15,000, depends upon the determination of the question whether by reasonable and proper effort defendant could have made a sale for any higher sum, and if so, then for what amount. This matter, as we have seen, is not settled by the findings as they stand.

The judgment and order denying a new trial are reversed.

We concur: SHAW, J.; SLOSS, J.; LORIGAN, J.; MELVIN, J.; HENSHAW, J.

KEECH v. JOPLIN, County Treasurer.

(L. A. 2,358.)

1. COURTS (§ 212*)—APPELLATE JURISDICTION—COURTS OF CALIFORNIA.

Const. 1904, art. 6, § 4, provides that the Supreme Court shall have appellate jurisdiction on appeal from the superior courts in all cases in equity, except such as arise in justices' courts, and in all cases at law involving the title or possession of real estate, or the legality of any tax, or in which the demand, exclusive of interest or the value of the property in controversy, amounts to $2,000, and gives the District Courts of Appeal jurisdiction in all cases at law in which the demand amounts to $300, and does not amount to $2,000, and in mandamus, certiorari, and prohibition proceedings. Held, that the District Courts of Appeal have appellate jurisdiction in all cases specifically mentioned as belonging to its jurisdiction, although they may incidentally involve the questions over which the Supreme Court has been given jurisdiction, and that a proceeding by mandamus to compel the county treasurer to pay a warrant is appealable to the District Court of Appeal, though a defense was interposed on the ground of the invalidity of the tax by which the fund was raised out of which the warrant was payable.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Courts, Dec. Dig. § 212.*]

2. COURTS (§ 488*)—SUPREME COURT—TRANSFER FROM DISTRICT COURT OF APPEAL.

A proceeding by mandamus, to enforce payment of a warrant drawn on the funds of a protection district, was properly appealed to the District Court of Appeal, but was erroneously transferred to the Supreme Court because the validity of a tax was involved. The case was regularly ordered submitted to the Supreme Court by agreement of parties at a prior term, to take effect when briefs were filed; the Supreme Court not being then informed that the appeal had been first taken to the other court. Held that, the briefs having been filed, and the case being ready for disposition, the Supreme Court would retain the appeal, and formally order a transfer from the District Court of Appeal.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Courts, Dec. Dig. § 488.*]

3. STATUTES (§§ 107, 123*)—SUBJECTS AND TITLES OF ACTS—EXPRESSION OF SUBJECT IN TITLE.

An act, approved February 23, 1907 (St. 1907, p. 16, c. 25), entitled "An act providing for the organization and government of districts for the protection of lands of farming or other communities or neighborhoods within this state from overflow or damage from the waters of any unnavigable stream, water course, canyon or wash extending by, through or over such communities or neighborhoods and to provide for the acquisition of lands, rights of way and other property by purchase, gift or condemnation and for extending, straightening, locating, improving, and maintaining the channels of such streams, water courses, canyons or washes and confining said waters in such channels and preventing the overflow thereof and for the construction by such districts of the necessary works for such purposes," is not unconstitutional either on the ground that the title embraces more than one subject, or that the subjects in the act are not expressed in the title, because there is no mention in the title of the calling and holding of elections, levying and collection of taxes, assessment of property, voting and issuing of bonds, qualifications of electors, and certain matters of procedure in civil actions, which are provided for in the act; the details not mentioned in the title being merely incidental to the main subject.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Statutes, Dec. Dig. §§ 107, 123.*]

4. CONSTITUTIONAL LAW (§ 65*)—DISTRIBUTION OF GOVERNMENTAL POWERS—DELEGATION OF LEGISLATIVE POWERS.

An act, approved February 23, 1907 (St. 1907, p. 16, c. 25), to provide, govern, and maintain local districts for the protection of lands from overflow or damage from the waters of an unnavigable stream, which provides that, "This act is not intended to supersede or repeal any other act for the organization of reclamation or protection districts or for protection purposes, but is intended as an independent and alternative means of effecting the protection herein provided for, where the provisions of this act are most favorable or desirable to the parties interested," is not rendered void by such provision on the ground that it makes the existence of the law as a statute in force depend on the action or nonaction of the persons who may be concerned, so as to be an unauthorized delegation of the legislative power, as this is not the effect of such provision, but its purpose is merely to prevent complications which arise from the enactment of a new law upon the subject to which previous laws also apply.

5. CONSTITUTIONAL LAW (§ 46*)—VALIDITY OF STATUTE—QUESTIONS CONSIDERED—MATTERS NOT NECESSARY TO DECISION.

The validity of an amendment to the act approved February 23, 1907 (St. 1907, p. 16, c. 25), which provides that any owner of land in a district for protection of lands from the overflow of an unnavigable stream may vote, although he may not be a resident therein, will not be considered on appeal in mandamus proceedings to compel the county treasurer to pay a warrant issued on the fund of one of those districts, where it is conceded that the election in question was not affected by the votes of landowners not residing in the district.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Constitutional Law, Dec. Dig. § 46.*]

6. STATUTES (§ 143*)—AMENDMENT—VALIDITY—EFFECT ON ACT AMENDED.

Act Feb. 23, 1907 (St. 1907, p. 16, c. 25), providing for the establishment, government, and maintenance of local districts for the protection of lands from overflow or damage from the waters of unnavigable streams, was amended in section 6 (St. 1907, p. 850, c. 464) so as to permit an owner of land in such district, though not resident therein, to vote at elections held under the act. Held that, even if the amendment were invalid for any reason, its invalidity would not affect the act which it purported to amend.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Statutes, Cent. Dig. § 211; Dec. Dig. § 143.*]

7. STATUTES (§ 97*)—GENERAL OR SPECIAL LAWS—CREATION OF SPECIAL DISTRICTS.

Act approved February 23, 1907 (St. 1907, p. 16, c. 25), to provide, govern, and maintain local districts for the protection of lands from overflow or damage from the waters of any unnavigable stream, is not invalid as special legislation, by reason of the fact that districts may not be organized in every county, and that the rules of procedure are fixed for the class of actions authorized by the act, as it is no violation of the constitutional provision against special legislation to provide particular rules of procedure applicable only to peculiar proceedings; and, if these provisions were invalid, they would not render the statute void, as they are not vital to the main purposes of the statute, nor essential to its practical operation.

8. LEVEES (§ 7*)—FLOWAGE—ORGANIZATION OF PROTECTION DISTRICTS—"COMMUNITY"—"NEIGHBORHOOD."

Act approved February 23, 1907 (St. 1907, p. 16, c. 25), provides that whenever 50 or a majority of the owners, who are also the owners of a majority of the lands of any farming or other community or neighborhood within this state, which lands lie in one body, and are liable to overflow or damage from the waters of any unnavigable stream, and may be protected by the same system of works, desire to provide for the protection of such lands, they may petition the board of supervisors in the county in which the lands of the community or neighborhood and within the proposed district or the greater portion thereof are situated for the organization of such protection district. Held, that these provisions do not limit the area of any district to a territory which might afterwards be determined by a court to be a single community or neighborhood, or give the court power to declare the district organization invalid if it should find that the boundaries included two or more such communities or neighborhoods, as the term "community" refers rather to the people who reside in a given locality, in more or less proximity, than to the territory which includes them, and the term "neighborhood" describes a territory of indefinite size and without fixed limits, and therefore a district may be organized which embraces two or more communities or neighborhoods, provided the lands lie in one body, and are liable to damage from the same stream and may be protected therefrom by the same system of works.

9. LEVEES (§ 6*)—FLOWAGE—ORGANIZATION OF PROTECTION DISTRICTS.

Act approved February 23, 1907 (St. 1907, p. 16, c. 25), provides for the organization and maintenance of local districts for the protection of lands from overflow or damage from the waters of any unnavigable stream, and requires that the petition for the organization of such district "shall pray that the same be organized under the provisions of this act." A petition for the organization of a district stated that the petitioners proposed the organization of a district under an act "duly approved February 22, 1907," and set out the title of the act in full. There was no other statute of the state so entitled, and there was no statute of any kind approved on February 22, 1907. Held, that the identification of the act was complete and the error in the date immaterial.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Levees, Dec. Dig. § 6.*]

10. LEVEES (§ 32*)—APPORTIONMENT OF TAXES—LEVEE FUNDS—POWER OF TREASURER.

Act Feb. 23, 1907 (St. 1907, p. 16, c. 25), which is an act to provide, govern, and maintain local districts for the protection of lands from overflow or damage from the waters of any unnavigable stream, in section 45 directs the creation of a bond fund, a construction fund, a general fund, and a funding fund, and declares that the moneys properly belonging to these funds shall be apportioned to them by the treasurer. A district levied a certain rate of tax for the bond fund, and an additional rate for the general fund, but the treasurer arbitrarily transferred to the bond fund the whole amount collected. Held, that he exceeded his power, as his authority was simply to apportion to the funds the moneys properly belonging to them, and give to each the proper proportion of the money received in the payment of the general taxes calculated upon the rate fixed for that fund.

11. LEVEES (§ 22*)—VALIDITY OF TAX.

Act approved February 23, 1907 (St. 1907, p. 16, c. 25), which provides for the organization and maintenance of local districts for the protection of lands from overflow or damage from the waters of an unnavigable stream, in section 45 directs the creation of a bond fund, a construction fund, a general fund, and a funding fund, and declares that moneys properly belonging to these funds shall be apportioned to them by the treasurer. Held that, if the tax laid to pay the interest on the bonds is illegal because at the time of its levy and collection no bonds had been sold, the legality of the tax for the general fund will not be affected thereby.

12. LEVEES (§ 6*)—LEVEE DISTRICT—ORGANIZATION—COLLATERAL ATTACK.

In mandamus proceedings to compel a county treasurer to pay a warrant on the general fund of a district organized under act approved February 23, 1907 (St. 1907, p. 16, c. 25), for the purpose of protecting lands from overflow or damage from the waters of an unnavigable stream, the defendant cannot show that the signers to the original petition for the organization of the district did not own a majority of the lands of the district, where the recital in the record of the proceedings before the board upon the petition is that the board determined that the petition complied in all respects with the law, as the validity of the organization can be questioned only in a proceeding in quo warranto at suit of the state.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court Orange County; S. W. West, Judge.

E. E. Keech brought mandamus proceedings against J. C. Joplin, County Treasurer of Orange County. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Transferred from Court of Appeal to Supreme Court. 9 Cal. App. 217, 101 Pac. 417.

H. C. Head, B. T. Williams, and Hutton & Williams, for appellant. E. E. Keech, in pro. per.

SHAW, J. The defendant appeals from a judgment in mandamus directing him to pay to the plaintiff the sum of $500 out of the money in his hands as county treasurer, belonging to the general fund of the Newbert Protection District, in satisfaction of a warrant for that sum issued to the plaintiff by the directors of said district. The appeal was taken to the District Court of Appeal for the Second District. The fund of the district, alleged to be in defendant's hands and applicable to the payment of the plaintiff's warrant, was raised by taxation of the property within the district. The Newbert Protection District was organized under the provisions of an act approved February 23, 1907 (St. 1907, p. 16, c. 25), and is a public corporation, or state agency, designed to make and maintain such protective works and structures as may be necessary and convenient to prevent damage to land and property from the waters of streams. One of the alleged defenses to the action is that the tax aforesaid was invalid because it was levied at the same time and by the same order as an additional levy to raise money to pay interest on bonds of the district. This additional levy is said to be invalid because at the time it was ordered no bonds had been issued, and the argument is that the invalidity of the bond interest tax vitiates the tax for the general fund. The district court, deeming itself without jurisdiction because the validity of this tax was involved, transferred the case to this court. We will first consider whether or not that court had jurisdiction.

The successive provisions of the state Constitution giving appellate jurisdiction to the Supreme Court have been productive of not a little difficulty in their application and construction. The Constitution of 1849 (article 6, § 4) gave it appellate jurisdiction "in all cases when the matter in dispute exceeds two hundred dollars, when the legality of any tax (etc.) is in question, and in all criminal cases" of felony. It was held that the first clause of this sentence was independent of the second, so that the court had jurisdiction where the matter in dispute exceeded $200, whether the legality of a tax was involved or not. Conant v. Conant, 10 Cal. 249, 70 Am. Dec. 717. In 1862 the article was amended so as to give the Supreme Court appellate jurisdiction "in all cases in equity; also in all cases at law which involve the title or possession of real estate, or the legality of any tax (etc.), or in which the demand, exclusive of interest, or the value of the property in controversy amounts to three hundred dollars." In the same language it gave the former district trial courts original jurisdiction of the same matters. Section 6. There are cases formerly cognizable in the common-law courts, and therefore "cases at law," which do not involve real estate, or the legality of any tax, etc., or property or rights measurable in money, or of the value of $300. The question arose whether the district courts had jurisdiction of cases in mandamus, certiorari, and prohibition, as they had theretofore had; the specific case being mandamus to compel payment of a warrant for less than $300. The court was driven to hold that the above language must be construed to include all cases at law, and not merely cases at law of the character thereby described. Perry v. Ames, 26 Cal. 383. In People v. Rosborough, 29 Cal. 415, this interpretation was applied to the provision concerning the Supreme Court, and was extended so as to give the Supreme Court appellate jurisdiction in cases of insolvency which were classed among "cases at law." In Knowles v. Yates, 31 Cal. 84, it was further enlarged so as to include appellate jurisdiction of contests of election. In the separate opinions of Justices Temple and Wallace in Houghton's Appeal, 42 Cal. 60, 64, the reasoning of Knowles v. Yates is sharply criticised, but the point was not involved, and the previous cases were not overruled. The Supreme Court continued thereafter to exercise appellate jurisdiction in accordance with the principle established in Knowles v. Yates and People v. Rosborough. The Constitution of 1879 (article 6, § 4), so far as this point is concerned, was in the same language as the amendment of 1862 to the Constitution of 1849, and necessarily had the same meaning. This was the condition when the amendment of 1904, to section 4, which we are now considering, was adopted. The provision regarding the Supreme Court was not changed by this amendment, unless its meaning is modified by the subsequent clause prescribing the jurisdiction of the District Courts of Appeal created by that amendment.

Section 4, upon this subject, and with respect to the Supreme Court, now reads thus: "The Supreme Court shall have appellate jurisdiction on appeal from the superior courts in all cases in equity, except such as arise in justices' courts; also in all cases at law which involve the title or possession of real estate, or the legality of any tax, impost, assessment, toll, or municipal fine, or in which the demand, exclusive of interest, or the value of the property in controversy, amounts to two thousand dollars." The corresponding provision, giving jurisdiction to the District Courts of Appeal is as follows: "The District Courts of Appeal shall have appellate jurisdiction on appeal from the superior courts in all cases at law in which the demand, exclusive of interest, or the value of the property in controversy, amounts to three hundred dollars, and does not amount to two thousand dollars; also in all cases of forcible and unlawful entry and detainer (except such as arise in justices' courts), in proceedings in insolvency, and in actions to prevent or abate a nuisance; in proceedings of mandamus, certiorari, and prohibition, usurpation of office, contesting elections and eminent domain, and in such other special proceedings as may be provided by law (excepting cases in which appellate jurisdiction is given to the Supreme Court)."

It is a matter of history that the reason which led to the creation of the District Courts of Appeal by this amendment was the great congestion of cases constantly accumulating in the Supreme Court, which that court could not dispose of within a reasonable time, a condition then rapidly growing worse. The object was to provide courts to which should be given a part of the appellate jurisdiction previously vested in the Supreme Court; to divide the burden of litigation and increase the force working to dispose of it. The obvious intention of the clauses above quoted was to apportion the cases so that each court would have a share of the work proportioned to its capacity to dispatch it; to so divide the labor that one court would not be idle while another was overburdened with the cases properly assignable to it under the classification that was made. It was recognized that an absolutely correct apportionment was difficult, in the absence of any statistics of the average number of cases belonging to the respective classes, and in view of the varying conditions which might arise in the future tending to increase one kind of litigation and decrease another. To obviate the effects of any inequality in the apportionment of the jurisdiction between the respective courts, or in delimiting the districts of the state assigned to the several Courts of Appeal, which might render the burdens unequal, the amendment made the wise provision that the Supreme Court should have control of the entire work of both courts, and should have power at will to transfer cases pending from one district court to another, from a district court to the Supreme Court, or from the Supreme Court to a district court, and to change the limits of the several districts, thus enabling it to keep the work properly distributed in case experience proved that the constitutional distribution was unequal.

It is plain from these circumstances that the clause prescribing the jurisdiction of the District Courts of Appeal was intended to modify the previous construction of the clause relating to Supreme Court jurisdiction, and to diminish the jurisdiction formerly vested in the Supreme Court. The provision regarding the Supreme Court jurisdiction, though unchanged in its verbiage on the point here involved, must be considered as having now a meaning somewhat different from that formerly ascribed to it. It is modified to the extent necessary to give the district courts full jurisdiction of the classes of cases expressly assigned to them. The result will be what the framers of the amendment evidently intended, namely, that the District Court of Appeal will have appellate jurisdiction in all cases which the amendment specifically mentions as belonging to its jurisdiction, although they may incidentally involve the title or possession of real estate, or the legality of a tax, impost, assessment, toll, or municipal fine. These things, or some of them, may be involved in cases of certiorari, mandamus, prohibition, unlawful and forcible entry and detainer, insolvency, condemnation proceedings, or in actions to prevent or abate a nuisance, but the fact that they are so involved in such a case will not deprive the District Courts of Appeal of appellate jurisdiction thereof. This construction has the additional advantages of being the most easily understood, and the most practical in operation.

The conclusion necessarily follows that the District Court of Appeal had jurisdiction of the appeal in this case, and that it should not have transferred the case to this court. The case was regularly ordered submitted to this court by agreement of the parties at the April session of 1909, to take effect when the briefs should be filed. This court was not then informed of the fact that the appeal was originally taken to the District Court of Appeal. The briefs have all been filed, and the case is now ready for disposition. In view of these circumstances we think it advisable to retain the case in this court. It is now ordered that the case be transferred from the District Court of Appeal of the Second District, to the Supreme Court, for determination and judgment. Perhaps the order of submission would have like effect, but to prevent question we make the formal order.

The defendant contends that the law under which the district was organized is unconstitutional, that the district was not legally organized under it, and that the court erred in excluding evidence offered by the defendant. It is claimed that the act is void because it embraces more than one subject, and that the subjects are not expressed in the title. The title is as follows: "An act providing for the organization and government of districts for the protection of the lands of farming or other communities or neighborhoods within this state from overflow or damage from the waters of any unnavigable stream, water course, canyon, or wash extending by, through, or over such communities or neighborhoods, and to provide for the acquisition of lands, rights of way, and other property by purchase, gift, or condemnation, and for extending, straightening, locating, improving and maintaining the channels of such streams, water courses, canyons, or washes, and confining said waters in such channels and preventing the overflow thereof, and for the construction by such districts of the necessary works for said purposes." If we were inclined to criticise this title, we should say that it was faulty because of its unnecessary prolixity in giving the details of the subject to which the act relates. If the title had been simply, "An act to provide, govern and maintain local districts for the protection of lands from overflow or damage from the waters of any unnavigable stream," its sufficiency might not have been questioned. But because of the unnecessary subdivision of the main subject, objection is now made to it because it does not also mention all the other particulars, such as the calling and holding of elections, levying and collecting of taxes, assessment of property, voting and issuing of bonds, the qualifications of electors, and certain matters of procedure in civil actions, all of which, being incidental to the main purpose of the act, are provided for in its various sections. We are of the opinion that the title expresses the subject of the act with unnecessary particularity, and that the details provided for in the act, but not expressed in the title, are incidental to the main subject which is expressed, and that the act is not void because of any fault in its title.

It is further contended that the act is inoperative because of the provisions of section 92 (page 42), which reads as follows: "This act is not intended to supersede or repeal any other act for the organization of reclamation or protection districts or for protection purposes, but is intended as an independent and alternative means of effecting the protection herein provided for where the provisions of this act are most applicable or desirable to the parties interested." This section it is urged, makes the act entirely inoperative until the landowners of some district desire to avail themselves of its provisions. It is argued that this makes the existence of the law as a statute in force, depend on the action or nonaction of the persons who may be concerned, and that this is an unauthorized delegation of the legislative power. This, however, is not the effect of the section. Its purpose was merely to prevent the complications which frequently arise from the enactment of a new law upon a subject to which previous laws also apply. Doubts often arise whether or not there is an implied repeal of previous laws. To remove all these doubts section 92 was enacted, declaring that it does not repeal or supersede previous acts. It has no other effect, and it does not make the act invalid.

Section 6 of the act was amended shortly after the passage of the main act (St. 1907, p. 850, c. 464), the amendment providing that any owner of land in the district may vote, although he may not be a resident therein. It is unnecessary to determine whether this amendment is valid or invalid. The appellant concedes that the election was not affected by votes of landowners not residing in the district. If the amendment is invalid, it would not affect the act which it purports to amend.

Another objection is that the act violates the Constitution because it prescribes certain rules of procedure in certain actions, authorized by the act, to contest elections therein provided for, and to establish the validity of bonds of the district, also because it prescribes certain duties for county officers of the counties in which such districts are located, not required of other county officers, all of which, it is argued, is local and special legislation. There is no force in these objections. The act is general because it applies generally throughout the state. It is not made special or local by reason of the fact that districts may not be organized in every county. The rules of procedure are fixed for the class of actions authorized by the act. These actions are in the nature of special proceedings; they are of a class by themselves and it is no violation of the constitutional provisions against special legislation to provide particular rules of procedure applicable only to these peculiar proceedings. Furthermore even if these provisions were invalid for this reason they are not vital to the main purposes of the statute, nor essential to its practical operation, but are only incidental and auxiliary thereto. It is evident that if the act had been passed with these features omitted, its usefulness would not have been seriously impaired by the omission. The invalidity of such unimportant provisions would not destroy the other parts of the act.

Numerous objections are made to the validity of the proceedings taken for the organization of the district. The first one we will notice is that the whole proceeding was void because the district described in the petition, and which by the final order was declared to be a protection district, embraces more than one farming neighborhood. This, it is claimed, is contrary to the provisions of the act. On this subject the act provides as follows:

"Section 1. Whenever fifty, or a majority of the owners who are also the owners of a majority of the lands of any farming or other community or neighborhood within this state, which lands lie in one body and are liable to overflow or damage from the waters of any unnavigable stream, water course, canyon, or wash extending by, through, or over such community or neighborhood, and may be protected by the same system of works, desire to provide for the protection of such lands from said damage, they may propose the organization of a protection district under the provisions of this act, and when so organized, such district shall have the powers, rights and duties conferred, or which may be conferred by law upon such protection districts. * * *

"Sec 2. In order to propose the organization of a protection district, a petition shall be presented to the board of supervisors in the county in which the lands of the community or neighborhood and within the proposed district, or the greater portion thereof, are situated, signed by the required number of owners of lands within such proposed district, as above provided, which petition shall set forth and particularly describe the proposed boundaries of such district and the purposes of such organization, and shall pray that the same be organized under the provisions of this act."

We are of the opinion that these provisions are not to be construed to limit the area of any district to a territory which might afterwards be ascertained and determined by a court to be a single community or neighborhood, or so as to give a court power to declare the district organization invalid if it should find that the boundaries included what it deemed to constitute two or more such communities or neighborhoods.

In this state, where the mountain canyons discharge streams upon the more gently sloping plains, the effect always is that the sand and gravel, which the rapid torrent of the canyon carries in suspension, begin to be deposited in the stream bed as soon as it reaches the less precipitous plain. The result is a constant tendency to fill the bed of the stream, causing the water to overflow and find other channels, running over and through lands occupied by orchards, vineyards, and grain fields, to the great damage of the lands in its course. Damage also comes from the water being too rapidly carried to the lower lands. It is not lawful or just for the owners above to change the natural course of the stream to the detriment of those below. To give adequate, practical, and lawful protection against the stream, it is necessary that all whose lands are likely to be affected by changes in its course should unite to keep the channel open and clear to some point below, a point where the water can be discharged without serious damage, and that all subject to flood shall have a common plan for protection therefrom; otherwise there would be endless conflict between the upper and lower systems. The act in question deals with conditions such as these, and its main purpose, so far as the boundaries of the districts are concerned, is to put into a single district all the lands which are so situated with reference to the stream that they are liable to damage therefrom, or from its departure from its channel, and which may be protected from such damage by the same system of works, so that the respective landowners can unite their efforts and funds for their mutual and more effectual protection, without detriment to any. The term "community," properly speaking, refers rather to the people who reside in a given locality, in more or less proximity, than to the territory which includes them. The term "neighborhood" describes a territory of indefinite size, and without fixed limits. What one person would consider a single community or neighborhood another might believe to embrace two or more communities or neighborhoods. It was the two considerations of identity of the cause of danger and feasibility of protection by the same means or system which were intended to constitute the controlling factors in determining the area and boundaries of the districts to be organized under the act. The mention of a community and neighborhood is to be taken as matter of description, but not of limitation, and the other factors are to be given controlling force. In view of the evident object of the act, the conditions to which it was intended to apply, the remedy it was designed to afford, and the immediate context relating to the same point, the rule that the singular includes the plural should be applied to the words, "community or neighborhood," in the respective introductory sentences of sections 1 and 2 of the act. Thus understood, a district may be organized which embraces what may, in a sense, be considered two or more communities or neighborhoods, provided the lands lie in one body, are liable to damage from the same stream, and may be protected therefrom by the same system of works. The petition in the present instance stated the necessary facts to bring it within the scope of the act as thus construed, and it was therefore sufficient in this particular.

Another objection is that the petition states that the petitioners propose the organization of the district "under the provisions of an act of the Legislature of the state of California, entitled [Here the petition gives the title of the act in full as heretofore quoted.], duly approved February 22, 1907." The act appears to have been approved on February 23, 1907. Section 2 (page 17) of the act requires that the petition "shall pray that the same be organized under the provisions of this act." It is claimed that the inaccuracy in the date of the approval of the act, as recited in the petition, makes the proceeding void. There is no sound reason for giving it such effect. It is sufficient if the petition, in some reasonably certain manner, identifies the said act as the one under which it is proposed that the district shall be organized. The extremely long and prolix title of the act is set out in full in the petition. There is no other statute of this state so entitled, and there is no statute of any kind that was approved on February 22, 1907. The identification of the act is complete and unmistakable, and the error in the date is immaterial.

The defendant refused to pay the warrant upon the ground that there were no funds with which to pay the same. The district had levied a certain rate of tax for the bond fund and an additional rate for the general fund. The warrant of the plaintiff was payable out of the general fund. Collections had been made of these taxes from time to time, amounting to something near $4,000. The defendant, as county treasurer, had arbitrarily transferred to the bond fund the whole amount collected, and upon that fact he based his statement that there was no money in the general fund out of which to pay this warrant. The taxes collected consisted of general payments by property owners of the taxes upon their property within the district, including both the amount levied, for the general fund and that for the bond fund. The act (section 45 [page 30]) directs the creation of the bond fund, construction fund, general fund, and funding fund, and declares that the moneys properly belonging to these funds shall be apportioned to them by the treasurer. This does not give the treasurer an arbitrary power to apportion the money all to one fund. What is meant by the direction to him to apportion to the funds the moneys properly belonging to them is that he shall give to each the proper proportion of the money received in the payment of the general taxes, calculated upon the rate fixed for that fund. When apportioned in this manner, there was money enough in the treasury belonging to the general fund to pay the warrant of the plaintiff.

It is claimed that the tax is illegal because a large proportion of the levy was for purposes of raising money to pay the interest on bonds authorized to be issued by the district, and that at the time of the levy and collection of the tax no bonds had been sold. It is immaterial whether the levy for the bond fund was valid or not. It is not asserted that the levy for the general fund is in any respect irregular; and, as the plaintiff's claim is against the general fund, and he seeks payment out of that fund alone, the invalidity of the levy for the bond fund is no defense to the payment of his claim.

Upon the trial the defendant offered to prove that the signers to the original petition for the organization of the district did not own a majority of the lands of the district, but only a little over one-third thereof. This proof was offered for the purpose of having the district declared invalid. The recital in the record of the proceedings before the board, upon the petition, is that the board determined that the petition complied in all respects with the law. We do not think it necessary to determine what effect such proof would have upon the validity of the district, or whether it would be admissible in any collateral attack thereon. The present action is an action against the treasurer of the county to compel the payment of a claim. The evidence abundantly shows that the district has been organized, and that it has been acting as a district. In other words, that it is a de facto district. It is a public corporation of a similar character to irrigation districts and reclamation districts. The law is well settled that the validity of the organization of such a district cannot be questioned by private individuals, but only in a proceeding in quo warranto at the suit of the state. Quint v. Hoffman, 103 Cal. 506, 37 Pac. 514, 777; Reclamation Dist. v. Turner, 104 Cal. 335, 37 Pac. 1038. The evidence was properly rejected by the court below. It may be here remarked that several other objections which we have considered might have been dismissed upon the same ground, but we deemed it best to decide them upon the merits. There are no other points requiring consideration.

The judgment and order denying a new trial are affirmed.

TIMMONS v. JOPLIN, County Treasurer.
(L. A. 2,373.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 17, 1909.)

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Orange County; Z. B. West, Judge.

J. A. Timmons brought mandamus proceedings against J. C. Joplin, County Treasurer of Orange County. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Transferred to the District Court of Appeal for the Second District for further proceedings.

Hutton & Williams, B. T. Williams, and H. C. Head, for appellant. E. E. Keech, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. This is an appeal from a judgment of the superior court in mandamus, and also from an order denying plaintiff's motion for a new trial.

The points involved are, for the most part, identical with those discussed and decided by this court in Keech v. Joplin (L. A. No. 2,358) 106 Pac. 222. The appeals, as is shown in that decision, were erroneously taken to this court.

It is therefore ordered that this cause be transferred to the District Court of Appeal for the Second District for further proceedings.

LAMB et al. v. McMULLEN et al.

(L. A. 2,319.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 17, 1909.)

COURTS (§ 212*)—APPELLATE JURISDICTION.

The District Court of Appeal, under Const. art. 6, § 4, giving District Courts of Appeal jurisdiction in certiorari proceedings, has appellate jurisdiction in certiorari proceedings to review the acts of a county board of supervisors in organizing a protection district under the act approved February 23, 1907 (St. 1907, p. 16, c. 25).

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Courts, Dec. Dig. § 212.*]

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Orange County; Z. B. West, Judge.

Certiorari proceedings brought by W. D. Lamb and others against D. A. McMullen and others. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiffs appeal. Transferred to the District Court of Appeal of the Second District for further proceedings.

Hutton & Williams, B. T. Williams, and H. C. Head, for appellants. S. M. Davis and E. E. Keech, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. This case is an appeal from a judgment of the superior court in a proceeding in certiorari to review the proceedings of the board of supervisors of Orange county, whereby the Newbert Protection District was organized under the act approved February 23, 1907. St. 1907, p. 16, c. 25.

The points raised are substantially the same as those considered and decided by this court in Keech v. Joplin (L. A. No. 2,358) 106 Pac. 222. The appeal purports to have been taken directly to the Supreme Court. For the reasons given in the opinion in Keech v. Joplin, it should have been taken to the District Court of Appeal. That court has the appellate jurisdiction in certiorari proceedings.

It is ordered that this cause be transferred to the District Court of Appeal of the Second District for further proceedings.

Ex parte McCAPES. (Cr. 1,526.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 22, 1909.)

1. CONSTITUTIONAL LAW (§ 87*)—RIGHT TO ENJOY PROPERTY.

Though it is within the police power of the state to enact laws to prevent the spread of fires, Pen. Code, § 384, subd. 3, making it a misdemeanor for any person to build a fire on his own land to burn brush, stumps, logs, or any other things whatsoever, provided that any state or district fire warden may give him a written permit to build fires, is an unreasonable interference with the right of property.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Constitutional Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 156–171; Dec. Dig. § 87.*]

2. CONSTITUTIONAL LAW (§ 67*)—DISTRIBUTION OF POWERS—JUDICIAL QUESTION.

While the right to exercise the police power is acknowledged by the courts, the question whether the constitutional rights of a citizen as to his person or property have been unduly invaded in a particular instance is always a judicial question.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Constitutional Law, Cent. Dig. § 123; Dec. Dig. § 67.*]

In Bank. Application by one McCapes for a writ of habeas corpus. Writ granted, and prisoner discharged.

W. H. Larew, for petitioner. G. G. Goucher, Dist. Atty., U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, Deputy, for respondent.

HENSHAW, J. Petitioner was charged with and convicted of a violation of subdivision 3 of section 384 of the Penal Code. That section declares it to be a misdemeanor if any person shall willfully or negligently "build a fire on his own land for the purpose of burning brush, stumps, logs, rubbish, fallen timber, fallows, grass or any other thing whatsoever, * * * provided that any state or district fire warden may in his reasonable discretion give a written permit to any person desiring to build fires," etc. He earnestly contends that the section under which he is charged is unreasonable and oppressive, that it unduly and unwarrantedly interferes with his right to the enjoyment and use of his property, and that thus and therefore it is in violation of section 1 of the fourteenth amendment of the Constitution of the United States and of section 1 of article I of the Constitution of this state. The contention of the petitioner, we think, must be upheld.

It is to be noted that the act is designed to prevent the destruction of property, and particularly of forests, by the careless setting of fires. In its purview and purpose, therefore, the act is within the police power of the state. No one at this day can be unaware of the great havoc wrought by forest fires, and, indeed, in states such as this, which undergo long periods of drouth, of the loss which results from fires sweeping over the farming lands and destroying the crops. The purpose of the law being for the general good of the state to prevent the destruction of property by fires carelessly set and allowed to escape control, not only brings the act strictly within the police power, but the purpose must commend the act to every court. Nevertheless, in the accomplishment of that purpose, it is quite plain that the Legislature has transgressed all reasonable bounds. It is an exemplification of what this court said in Ex parte Jentzsch, 112 Cal. 468, 44 Pac. 803,

32 L. R. A. 664: "So, while the police power is one whose proper use makes most potently for good, in its undefined scope and inordinate exercise lurk no small danger to the republic. For the difficulty which is experienced in defining its just limits and bounds affords a temptation to the Legislature to encroach upon the rights of citizens with experimental laws, none the less dangerous because well meant."

We are here concerned only with the validity or invalidity of subdivision 3 of section 384, under which this petitioner is charged. But a consideration of other sections will serve to illumine the discussion. Section 1 makes it a misdemeanor to set fire to any forest, woodland, brush, prairie, grass, grain, stubble, or any other material being or growing on lands not owned by the person who may set the fire without the permission of the owner of such land. But the same section permits one to build camp fires upon lands not his own without the permission of the owner, or anybody else, if the lands are uninclosed, if the camp fire is built "in a careful manner," and if, before departing from the place where such camp fire has been built, the builder "first totally extinguishes the same." But by section 3 a man cannot build a fire on his own land for the purpose of burning brush, stumps, logs, rubbish, fallen timber, fallows, grass, or any other thing whatsoever, without first obtaining a permit so to do, or unless the fire be built (subdivision 5) in good faith and with reasonable care as a "back fire" for the purpose of stopping the progress of a fire then actually burning. Railroad companies, in the dry season, frequently burn the weeds along their rights of way for the very purpose of preventing fires. Road overseers and supervisors do the same thing along the highways. Yet under this law, not only may this not be done, but a farmer may not burn a brush pile or a rubbish heap in his back yard without first obtaining permission from some fire warden, and if in his county there be no such fire warden he may not make a fire at all, until in due course one shall have been appointed, to whom he may make petition. The language of this section is so broad as to have little or no relation to the real purpose of the act. It prevents the setting of any fire without permission from a fire warden, though the fire be set with scrupulous care, and by no possibiltiy could work the destruction of property. Such a law upon the face of it is an unreasonable interference with the rights of property. But if it be said that, notwithstanding the language, the law will be given a construction which will avoid hardship, it must be answered that by its terms it makes it a crime for any man to light a fire on his land for the purpose of burning "anything whatsoever," and declares the person who does so a criminal, regardless of the fact that the fire was carefully set and guarded, and regardless of the fact that no injury to anybody resulted from the setting. In other words, every person so setting a fire would be guilty of a crime, and the question as to whether he should be punished or not would rest largely in the friendship or hostility of his neighbors, or of the informer who by this law receives one-half of the fines upon conviction. The facts in the case at bar may be referred to in illustration of the working of such a law. The petitioner was digging a well upon his own land. It became necessary for him to blast rock. Fearful lest a burning fuse hurled by the exploding blast might set fire to the grass in the vicinage, he prudently and carefully burned off this dry grass without causing the slightest damage to any property. He built this fire, however, without obtaining permission from a district fire warden. Indeed, at the time that he set it there was no district fire warden. Subsequently the county of Madera caused the appointment of a fire warden, and this fire warden procured the arrest of the defendant for a violation of the law. This brief statement will better serve to illustrate the unreasonableness of the law than would many pages of exposition.

It is unnecessary to elaborate upon the principle involved in this determination, namely, that while the right to legislate in the exercise of the police power is fully acknowledged by the courts, in each instance the question as to whether or not the constitutional rights of the citizen as to his person or property have been unduly invaded is always a judicial question. It is sufficient upon this to refer to such cases as Ex parte Whitwell, 98 Cal. 73, 32 Pac. 870, 19 L. R. A. 727, 35 Am. St. Rep. 152; Ex parte Jentzsch, 112 Cal. 468, 44 Pac. 803, 32 L. R. (S. F. 5,137.)

1. WILLS (§ 522*)—DEVISE TO CLASS.

A testamentary gift to a class is a gift of an aggregate sum to a body of persons uncertain in number at the time of the gift, to be ascertained at a future time, who are all to take in equal or some other definite proportions; the share of each being dependent for its amount upon the ultimate number.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Wills, Cent. Dig. § 1114; Dec. Dig. § 522.*]

2. Wills (§ 523*)—Construction—Devise to Class.

Where a gift is to devisees nominatim and the particular share they shall each receive is mentioned, the devise is deemed a gift to individuals as tenants in common, and not to a class.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Wills, Cent. Dig. § 1115; Dec. Dig. § 523.*]

3. Wills (§ 523*)—Construction—Devise to Class.

If words, which, standing alone, would create a class, are followed by equally operative words of devise to devisees by name and in definite proportions, the law infers that the devisees are to take individually, and that the descriptive portion of the clause is for identification.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Wills, Cent. Dig. § 1115; Dec. Dig. § 523.*]

4. Wills (§ 439*) — Construction as a Whole.

Rules of construction of wills are not absolute, but must give way to the manifest intention of testator, gathered from the whole will, and which, when the language of the will is not sufficiently clear, may be ascertained from the circumstances surrounding the making of it under the express provisions of Civ. Code, § 1318.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Wills, Cent. Dig. §§ 952–957; Dec. Dig. § 439.*]

5. Wills (§ 775*) — Lapse of Devise — Construction to Prevent Intestacy—Application of Rules.

Civ. Code, § 1343, providing that, if a devisee die during testator's lifetime, a devise to him fails unless an intention appears to substitute some other in his place, with immaterial exceptions, the canon of construction that such an interpretation should be given to a will as will prevent intestacy as to any portion of the estate cannot be invoked to set aside the statute declaring such effect.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Wills, Cent. Dig. §§ 1997–2000; Dec. Dig. § 775.*]

6. Wills (§ 523*)—Construction—Devise to Class.

A will gave all the residue of testator's personal property and all his real estate to be divided equally among the four children of a named deceased sister, naming the children. One of the children died during testator's lifetime. There was nothing in extraneous facts to show an intention to substitute some other person in the place of any child who might die in testator's lifetime. Held, that there being nothing on the face of the devise indicating any uncertainty in the number of persons who were to take the property, or that they were to be ascertained at a future time, or that the share of the estate which the devisees were to have was to be determined as to the amount by the number of those who would survive testator, the devisees took not as a class, but individually and as tenants in common under Civ. Code, § 683, providing that a joint interest created by will exists only when expressly declared in the will to be a joint tenancy, and under section 685, declaring that every interest created in favor of several persons with certain immaterial exceptions is an interest in common unless declared in its creation to be a joint interest, and as to the share which would have gone to the devisee dying in testator's lifetime testator died intestate.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; J. V. Coffey, Judge.

Petition by Timothy J. Flynn and others, executors of Denis B. Murphy, for distribution of the estate, to which Katherine Murphy and others objected. From the decree of distribution, the contestants appeal. Reversed.

Sullivan & Sullivan and Theo. J. Roche, for appellants. Mastick & Partridge and E. J. Mize, for respondents.

LORIGAN, J. The will of Denis B. Murphy contained, among other provisions, the following residuary clause: "Fourth. It is my will and desire that all the rest of my property both real estate and personal property shall go to, and be equally divided among the four children of my late sister Catherine F. Flynn, deceased; that is to say: I give, devise and bequeath all the rest of my personal property and all my real estate of whatsoever kind and wheresoever situate, share and share alike, to Timothy J. Flynn, William D. Flynn, Mary Jane Logan and Kate I. Prendergast." The will was admitted to probate, and in due time the executors thereof petitioned for a distribution of the estate. The petition set forth the will of deceased, and referring to the clause thereof above quoted alleged that William D. Flynn, named therein as one of the residuary legatees of the estate of decedent, had died prior to the death of the testator, and then with reference to said clause in the will it was alleged: "That the intention of said decedent in said will was to devise and bequeath the residue of his estate to the said Timothy J. Flynn, William D. Flynn, Mary Jane Logan and Kate I. Prendergast as a class, namely, as the children of his said sister, and to those of said class only who should be living at the death of the said decedent, and upon the death of the said William D. Flynn during the life of the said decedent, the said Timothy J. Flynn, Mary Jane Logan, and Kate I. Prendergast became and are the sole survivors of said class, and are entitled to the whole of said residue."

Certain nieces and nephews of the deceased, claiming to be among his heirs at law, answered the petition for distribution denying all the foregoing allegations as to the intent of the testator to devise the residue of his estate to the devisees named in said fourth clause as a class, and averring that, on the contrary, said William D. Flynn, named in said will as a devisee, died prior to the death of the testator without issue; that as to the portion of his estate devised to said

William D. Flynn the testator died intestate; and that they, with other heirs at law of the testator, were entitled to participate in the distribution thereof. A hearing was had on the petition and the court made findings of fact wherein it found, as alleged in the petition for distribution, that the intention of the decedent was to devise the residue of his estate to the devisees named in said fourth clause of his will as a class, namely, to the children of his said sister and to those of said class who would be living at the death of said decedent. In accordance with this finding, the court distributed the property to the survivors of those mentioned in the residuary clause of the will, namely, Timothy J. Flynn, Mary J. Hyde (formerly Logan), and Kate I. Prendergast, share and share alike.

This appeal is by those heirs at law of decedent—the nieces and nephews—who contested the distribution of the estate to the devisees named in the residuary clause as a class, and is taken from the decree of distribution accompanied by a bill of exceptions.

It must be conceded upon this appeal that under the testamentary clause in question the devise to William D. Flynn lapsed upon his death without leaving lineal descendants, before the testator (Civ. Code, § 1343), and that as to the portion of the estate devised to him the testator died intestate, unless from the clause in the will creating the devise in which he was to participate, considered by itself, it is apparent that the testator intended the devise of the residue of his estate to go to the children of his sister Catherine as a class, or that such intention appears from extraneous evidence properly admissible to disclose it. While the lower court reached the conclusion that the devise in question was to a class consisting of the children of the deceased sister of testator who might survive him, we are of the opinion, in the light of the established rules of construction and authorities, that this conclusion was not justified either from the express terms of the devise itself or aided by extrinsic evidence.

It is declared by the Civil Code, § 683, that a joint interest created by a will exists only "when expressly declared in the will to be a joint tenancy," and by section 685 of the same Code it is declared that every interest created in favor of several persons (except acquired under certain conditions not involved here) is an interest in common unless declared in its creation to be a joint interest. It is quite apparent from an examination of the testamentary clause in question that this devise does not expressly declare a joint tenancy with its accompanying right of survivorship in the devisees named therein, and, unless there is some rule capable of application so as to prevent it, the interest which each devisee took under the devise was an interest in common.

It is not contended by the respondents that the clause does create any joint tenancy, nor do they predicate their right to take the whole devise as survivors by reason of any expressly created joint tenancy. They base their claim solely on the ground that the devise, while not in terms creating a joint tenancy, still is a devise to a class—the children of the deceased sister of testator—and that under a well-recognized rule of law, where a devise is made to a class, the death of one of the class prior to the death of the testator does not have the effect of causing the legacy to lapse, but those of the class who survive the testator take the whole devise. The rule contended for by respondents is correct, but we cannot agree with them, or the trial court, in the conclusion that either the terms of the devise disclose an intention on the part of the testator to devise to a class, or that, accepting the extraneous testimony admitted as bearing on his intention, it discloses any such intention. As to a gift to a class, the rule is stated as follows: "In legal contemplation a gift to a class is a gift of an aggregate sum to a body of persons uncertain in number at the time of the gift, to be ascertained at a future time, who are all to take in equal or some other definite proportions, the share of each being dependent for its amount upon the ultimate number." Jarman on Wills (6th Ed.) § 232; Matter of Kimberly, 150 N. Y. 90, 44 N. E. 945; Matter of Russell, 168 N. Y. 169, 61 N. E. 166; Kent v. Kent, 106 Va. 199, 55 S. E. 564. Tested under this rule, there is nothing in the devise which would indicate that the intention of the testator was that the devisees should take as a class, or in any other way than as individuals, and under our Code provision as tenants in common. There is nothing on the face of the devise indicating any uncertainty in the number of persons who were to take the property, or that they were to be ascertained at a future time, or that the share of the residuary estate which the devisees were ultimately to have was to be determined as to the amount by the number of those who would survive the testator. All the persons who are to take were specifically named and the share of each was designated. In fact, it is not only quite apparent that under the rule relied on this devise cannot be said to contain any of the elements which should characterize a gift to a class, but the plain impression which one would receive by reading the clause is that the testator intended to give to each individual an equal portion of his estate. It is true that the testator uses language in the clause of his will which would, if it stood alone, amount to a devise to a class. This would be the result if the devise had been to "the four children of my late sister Catherine" without further words. But here the terms of the bequest—the designation of the number of the children, followed by a repeated and express devise to them by name and in an equal share—cannot be ignored so as to make the other words in the will constitute a class.

And in determining whether a devise is to a class or to individuals great importance is attached in the solution of the question to the fact that the gift is to the devisees nominatim and that the particular share they shall each receive is mentioned, and, when this appears, the bequest is held to constitute a gift and devise individually as tenants in common, and not as a devise to a class. Savage v. Burnham, 17 N. Y. 561; Hornberger v. Miller, 28 App. Div. 199, 50 N. Y. Supp. 1085; Rockwell v. Bradshaw, 67 Conn. 8, 34 Atl. 758. But, assuming, however, that the language used in the clause in question is capable of two different legal meanings resulting from the testator devising his estate to the four children of his late sister, followed by other words of express devise to each of the children by name and in equal proportions, still this mention of them by name and a devise to them in equal shares will control the description of them as children of his deceased sister. If words, which, standing alone, would be effectual to create a class, are followed by equally operative words of devise to devisees by name and in definite proportions, the law infers from the designation by name and mention of the share each is to take that the devisees are to take individually and as tenants in common, and that the descriptive portion of the clause (children of a deceased sister) is intended merely as matter of identification. Hoppock v. Tucker, 59 N. Y. 202; Hornberger v. Miller, supra.

In the Estate of Hittell, 141 Cal. 432, 75 Pac. 53, which was a case similar in some respects to the one at bar, the devise there in question was of the testator's property "to Anna P. Greer and Mary M. Greer, with whom I live at this house, * * * and whom I regard and treat as my adopted daughters." It was contended that this was a devise to a class, and the lower court so decreed. In reversing the decree this court discussed the rule of construction which we have been considering, and said: "A common instance of a devise to a class is where a testator gives property, generally to the 'children' of a certain person, without naming them—as to 'the children of my brother John'; and in such a case it is held that the devise is to such children of John as will be in existence at the time of the testator's death. There are cases where in the devise the individuals and the class are both named—as, for instance, where it is 'Charles, James, and Robert, children of my brother John'—and in such cases courts have had some difficulty in determining whether the devise was to the individuals named or to the class. In such a case, the general rule is that the persons named take as individuals and not as a class, unless some other clause of the will, or some evidence outside of it calls for a different construction. The result of the authorities—and counsel for each side have cited a large number of them—is correctly stated in Page on Wills, § 543, as follows: 'Where there is a gift to a number of persons who are indicated by name, and also further described by reference to the class to which they belong, the gift is held prima facie to be a distributive gift and not a gift to a class.' And, after citations in his notes, he says: 'In such cases if one of the beneficiaries dies before the testator, there is therefore no right of survivorship to the other named beneficiaries.' * * * Therefore in the case at bar, even if a class had been named, the gift would have been to the individuals, because there is nothing in the other parts of the will, or in any extrinsic evidence, showing a different intent, and there are no operative words creating any right of survivorship."

It is true that these rules of construction are not absolute, but must give way to the manifest intention of the testator, which is always paramount, as that intention may be gathered from a consideration of all provisions of the will, or when the language of the will is not sufficiently clear to remove all doubt as to its intention, by a consideration of the circumstances surrounding the making of it (exclusive of the oral declarations of the testator) in so far as they may throw light on that intention. Civ. Code, § 1318; Estate of Langdon, 129 Cal. 451, 62 Pac. 73.

It is not pretended that there are any other provisions of the will bearing on the subject, and the only circumstances appearing from the extrinsic evidence are that the testator had lived with his sister, the mother of the devisees mentioned in the clause of the will in question, and who constituted all her children; that he had lived with this sister, paying for room and board, from the childhood of said devisees up to the death of their mother; that he had a deep affection for these four children and took great interest in them and in their welfare; also, that he had other nieces and nephews not mentioned in his will. But these facts throw no more light on the intention of the testator than appears upon the face of the devise itself. All that this evidence discloses is just what the clause of the will does. It furnishes a reason generally why the testator devised his estate to these four devisees in preference to his other nieces and nephews, and a particular reason why, having an equal affection for all of them, he made no distinction between them in his bequest, but gave to each an equal share in his estate. Giving this evidence the greatest force that can be claimed for it, it discloses at most that the intention of the testator was just as compatible with the devise to these children individually as to them as a class. But this cannot aid the respondents. It would simply leave the intention of the testator as much in doubt after a consideration of these intrinsic facts as before. This evidence throws no more light on the intention of the testator than appears upon the face of the devise itself, and so we are still remitted to the application of the general rule that when in a devise a class and individuals are both mentioned, and nothing appears from other clauses of the will or extraneous evidence requiring a different construction, the devise will be construed as one to devisees individually and not to them collectively—to them as tenants in common and not to them as survivors of a class.

Nor is the claim of respondents that the devise should be held to be one to a class strengthened by invoking the canon of construction that such an interpretation should be given to a will as will prevent intestacy as to any portion of the testator's estate. The Code provides that where a devisee dies before the testator the devise to him lapses unless an intention appears on the face of the will to substitute some other person in his place. So that the question presented here is not: Did the testator by the terms of his will intend to prevent intestacy as to any portion of his estate, but whether in the terms of this particular clause of his will did he use language disclosing an intention to leave his estate to the devisee individually or to them collectively? The question is one of intention to be derived from the language used in the devising clause itself, there being nothing in other provisions of the will bearing on it. By the clause in question the testator undoubtedly intended when he made his will to dispose of all the residue of his property and to dispose of it in favor of the devisees therein named, because he expressly said so. The language, however, which he used, naming the devisees individually and giving to each an equal portion of all the residue of his estate, is construed under well-settled rules of law, to which we have heretofore referred, to be a devise to the devisees named as individuals and as tenants in common, and not as a class. The law declares this to be the meaning of the language which he has used, and a canon of interpretation applicable to prevent intestacy cannot be invoked to set aside plain rules of law declaring the legal meaning and effect to be given to language used in such a devise as is here under consideration.

In the Estate of Hittell, supra, 141 Cal. 436, 75 Pac. 54, from which we have heretofore quoted, practically the same contention as the one which is urged now was made, and it was said: "The will was made in view of conditions existing at the time of its execution; and as he gave all of his property to the two women, both of them living, of course, he intended at that time and under existing circumstances that his heirs should take nothing. * * * As in the case of innumerable wills, the testator did not anticipate changed conditions, and did not provide for the event of the death during his lifetime of one of the named devisees, which he could easily have done, if he so desired, by giving the property to them or to the survivor of them. What his actual intent may have been after the conditions were changed by the death of Mary we have no means of knowing, except from the fact that he allowed the will to stand as originally executed. He may have thought that one-half of his estate would be sufficient for the wants of the remaining woman. At all events, we must apply the law to the will as it reads, and to the fact of the death of Mary before that of the testator, and, thus applying it, the conclusion clearly follows that the living devisee, Anna, took one undivided half of the estate, and that the other half vested in the heirs at law."

In support of their claim that this devise was properly construed by the trial court as a devise to a class, respondents rely on Schaffer v. Kettell, 14 Allen (Mass.) 528; Stedman v. Priest, 103 Mass. 293; Swallow v. Swallow, 166 Mass. 241, 44 N. E. 132; Bolles v. Smith, 39 Conn. 217; Warner's Appeal, 39 Conn. 253; Springer v. Congleton, 30 Ga. 976. But in none of those cases was any different rule of construction announced. All of them—save Bolles v. Smith and Swallow v. Swallow—are commented on in Church v. Church, 15 R. I. 138, 23 Atl. 302, and with reference to them it is said: "In these cases, however, the general rule that a gift to persons named is a gift to them individually is recognized, and reasons are found in the language or structure of the will, or in the circumstances, for deciding that the intent of the testator, which is, of course, paramount to the rule, would be best subserved by disregarding it." In all these cases, too, while the gift was to individuals named, language was used which might imply a gift to them as a class, and as it appeared, either from other parts of the will or from extraneous facts, that it was the manifest intention of the testator to make a gift to the devisees named as representing some particular member or branch of the family as a class, it was held that the presumption of a devise individually must give way to the paramount intention of the testator. But here there is nothing in the will or in the extraneous facts to overcome the presumption of a devise to each of the devisees individually under the general rule; and hence it must apply.

There is nothing further to be said on this subject. We do not discuss the claim of appellants that the court improperly admitted testimony showing the relationship between the testator and the devisees when the will was made. It is not necessary. Assuming it was properly admitted, it proved nothing as to intention more than the devising clause did. Under the law, that clause must be construed as a devise to the devisees individually and as tenants in common. By it each devisee was given one-fourth of the residue of the testator's estate, and, had all lived, each would have been entitled to that proportion on distribution. One of the devisees, William D. Flynn, having died prior to the testator, the devise of one-fourth of the residue of the estate to him lapsed. No provision being made in the will otherwise disposing of this portion of his estate, the testator died intestate as to it and it vested in his heirs at law, and should have been distributed to them and not to the surviving devisees as a class.

The decree of distribution is reversed.

1. Master and Servant (§ 13*) — Statutes Limiting Hours of Labor.

In determining whether an act limiting the hours of labor in any occupation is in violation of the federal Constitution, the primary consideration is whether the occupation possesses such characteristics of danger to those engaged in it as to justify the Legislature in concluding that the welfare of the community demands a restriction.

2. Statutes (§§ 74, 76, 87*)—Constitutional Law (§ 205*)—Special Laws—Punishment of Crimes.

St. 1909, p. 279, c. 181, provides that the period of employment for all persons employed in underground mines or in smelters and in institutions for the reduction or refining of ores or metals shall not exceed eight hours within any 24, and that the hours shall be consecutive, and makes a violation of the statute a misdemeanor punishable by a fine or imprisonment. Held, that the statute does not violate Const. art. 4, § 25, subd. 2, prohibiting the Legislature from passing any local or special law for the punishment of crimes and misdemeanors, nor subdivision 33, prohibiting a special or local law where a general law can be made applicable, nor article 1, § 21, in that it grants to citizens or classes of citizens privileges or immunities which are not on the same terms granted to all, nor article 1, § 11, as not being of uniform operation.

In Bank. Application by Fred J. Martin for a writ of habeas corpus to obtain petitioner's release from custody on a charge of violating St. 1909, p. 279, c. 181. Writ dismissed.

Solinsky & Wehe and Paul C. Morf, for petitioner. James Keith, Dist. Atty., for respondent.

SLOSS, J. Upon the application of Fred J. Martin, a writ of habeas corpus was issued by this court. Martin had been arrested upon a charge of violating the terms of a statute entitled "An act regulating the hours of employment in underground mines and in smelting and reduction works" (St. 1909, p. 279, c. 181), approved March 10, 1909. The provisions of the act are as follows:

"Section 1. That the period of employment for all persons who are employed or engaged in work in underground mines in search of minerals, whether base or precious, or who are engaged in such underground mines for other purposes, or who are employed or engaged in other underground workings whether for the purpose of tunneling, making excavations or to accomplish any other purpose or design, or who are employed in smelters and other institutions for the reduction or refining of ores or metals, shall not exceed eight hours within any twenty-four hours, and the hours of employment in such employment or work day shall be consecutive, excluding, however, any intermission of time for lunch or meals; provided that, in the case of emergency where life or property is in imminent danger, the period may be a longer time during the continuance of the exigency or emergency.

"Sec. 2. Any person who shall violate any provision of this act, and any person who as foreman, manager, director or officer of a corporation, or as the employer or superior officer of any person, shall command, persuade or allow any person to violate any provision of this act, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction shall be punished by a fine of not less than fifty dollars ($50.00) nor more than three hundred dollars ($300.00), or by imprisonment of not more than three months. And the court shall have discretion to impose both fine and imprisonment as herein provided.

"Sec. 3. All acts and parts of acts inconsistent with this act are hereby repealed."

It is not questioned by the petitioner that the complaint which furnished the basis for his arrest stated a violation of the terms of the act. His position is, however, that the act is void as being in contravention of constitutional provisions.

The ground of attack usually advanced in cases of this character, namely, that the statute is in conflict with the guaranties of the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States, is not here urged. Indeed, such contention is hardly open to the petitioner in view of the decision in Holden v. Hardy, 169 U. S. 366, 18 Sup. Ct. 383, 42 L. Ed. 780, where the Supreme Court of the United States decided that a statute of Utah, substantially identical in its main features with the one before us, did not deprive persons affected by it of any right conferred by the federal Constitution. Conceding the binding force of that decision as an adjudication of all federal questions involved, the petitioner here bases his claim to immunity from prosecution upon certain provisions of the Constitution of this state.

Before proceeding to a consideration of the particular points made in this connection, it may be well to briefly state the basis of the decision in Holden v. Hardy, since, in our opinion, the points there decided go far toward answering the main objections predicated upon the state Constitution. The right on the part of the state to restrict the freedom of citizens to make contracts concerning their callings or occupations was there upheld with respect to the particular callings covered by the Utah statute, i. e., mining and working in smelting and reduction works, upon the ground that the restriction in question was a proper exercise of the police power for the preservation of the public health. "The right of contract," says the court, "is itself subject to certain limitations which the state may lawfully impose in the exercise of its police powers. While this power is inherent in all governments, it has doubtless been greatly expanded in its application during the past century, owing to an enormous increase in the number of occupations which are dangerous, or so far detrimental to the health of employés as to demand special precautions for their well-being and protection, or the safety of adjacent property. While this court has held * * * that the police power cannot be put forward as an excuse for oppressive and unjust legislation, it may be lawfully resorted to for the purpose of preserving the public health, safety, or morals, or the abatement of public nuisances, and a large discretion is necessarily vested in the Legislature to determine, not only what the interests of the public require, but what measures are necessary for the protection of such interests." Again, in the same opinion, it is said that: "While the general experience of mankind may justify us in believing that men may engage in ordinary employments more than eight hours per day without injury to their health, it does not follow that labor for the same length of time is innocuous when carried on beneath the surface of the earth, where the operative is deprived of fresh air and sunlight, and is frequently subjected to foul atmosphere and a very high temperature, or to the influence of noxious gases, generated by the processes of refining or smelting." The right to limit the hours of labor generally was not involved in Holden v. Hardy. No such right was asserted. It was, however, decided that the particular occupations affected by the act possessed such elements of danger and risk to the employé that the Legislature might reasonably conclude that in such occupations a restriction of the time of labor was necessary for the protection of those engaged in such labor.

The limitations of the doctrine are well illustrated by the subsequent decision in Lochner v. New York, 198 U. S. 45, 25 Sup. Ct. 539, 49 L. Ed. 937, in which the court, reversing the decision of the Court of Appeals of New York in People v. Lochner, 177 N. Y. 145, 69 N. E. 373, 101 Am. St. Rep. 773, declared invalid a law limiting the hours of labor of bakers. The real ground of that decision is, we think, to be found in the following extract from the opinion of Mr. Justice Peckham: "We think that there can be no fair doubt that the trade of a baker, in and of itself, is not an unhealthy one to that degree which would authorize the Legislature to interfere with the right to labor, and with the right of free contract on the part of the individual, either as employer or employé." The decision in the Lochner Case was by a bare majority of the court, but the majority itself recognized the correctness of the decision in Holden v. Hardy and distinguished that case upon the ground that the callings involved in the two statutes were essentially different.

It follows, from a comparison of these two decisions, that, in determining whether an act limiting the hours of labor in any occupation is in violation of the provisions of the federal Constitution, the primary consideration is whether or not the occupation possesses such characteristics of danger to the health of those engaged in it as to justify the Legislature in concluding that the welfare of the community demands a restriction.

And this brings us to the petitioner's contention that the act is violative of the provisions of the state Constitution respecting special legislation. It is contended that the act violates subdivision 2 of section 25 of article 4, in that it is a special law for the punishment of a crime or misdemeanor created by said act; that it violates subdivision 33 of said section, in that it is a special law passed in a case where a general law can be made applicable; that it violates section 21 of article 1, in that it grants to citizens or classes of citizens privileges or immunities which are not, upon the same terms, granted to all citizens; that it violates section 11 of article 1 as not being of uniform operation. These various specifications are in effect directed to the same point, namely, that the law arbitrarily selects for its operation a special class of persons. It is, we think, unnecessary at this date to cite many authorities in support of the proposition that a law is not special or lacking in uniformity merely because it does not apply to every person or subject within the state. "An act to be general in its scope need not include all classes of individuals in the state; it answers the constitutional requirements if it relates to and operates uniformly upon the whole of any single class." Abeel v. Clark, 84 Cal. 226, 24 Pac. 383. The classification created for the purposes of legislation must, of course, be a reasonable one. The test of its propriety is well stated in City of Pasadena v. Stimson, 91 Cal. 238, 27 Pac. 604, where the court declared "that, although a law is general and constitutional when it applies equally to all persons embraced in a class founded upon some natural or intrinsic or constitutional distinction, it is not general or constitutional if it confers particular privileges or imposes peculiar disabilities or burdensome conditions in the exercise of a common right upon a class of persons arbitrarily selected from the general body of those who stand in precisely the same relation to the subject of the law." But in view of the decision in Holden v. Hardy, based as it was upon the fact that the occupations covered by this act were so peculiarly dangerous as to justify special regulation, how can it be said that the Legislature in selecting these occupations and applying to them provisions designed to protect the health of those engaged in them was making "a class of persons arbitrarily selected from the general body of those who stand in precisely the same relation to the subject of the law"? The very grounds which led the Supreme Court of the United States to hold that the Utah statute did not deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law, nor deny to any person the equal protection of the laws, requires the conclusion that the legislation was not special within the meaning of our state Constitution. See Julien v. Model B. L. & I. Co., 116 Wis. 79, 92 N. W. 561, 61 L. R. A. 668. For if it could be said that the limitation of the hours of labor of miners and those engaged in smelting and reduction works could not be supported by any natural or intrinsic distinction between those occupations and others, the legislation would, for the reasons declared in Lochner v. New York, necessarily fall before the provisions of the federal Constitution.

The appellant relies with great confidence upon the decision of the Supreme Court of Colorado in Re Morgan, 26 Colo. 415, 58 Pac. 1071, 47 L. R. A. 52, 77 Am. St. Rep. 269. In that case it was held that an act similar to the one under consideration was unconstitutional, this conclusion being based upon the ground, among others, that the law was "class legislation." We have not had access to the Constitution of Colorado and are not informed of its precise terms regarding general and special legislation. It may be observed, however, that some of the grounds relied on by the Colorado court for its decision are clearly in conflict with the views of the Supreme Court of the United States in the Holden Case. In other states, having constitutional provisions directed against the passing of special laws, legislation of this character has been upheld. Ex parte Boyce, 27 Nev. 299, 75 Pac. 1, 65 L. R. A. 47; Ex parte Kair, 28 Nev. 127, 80 Pac. 463, 113 Am. St. Rep. 817; State v. Cantwell, 179 Mo. 245, 78 S. W. 569.

It is argued by the appellant that the act is special because it does not include in its scope many occupations other than mining which are equally dangerous to the health of the persons engaged in them. Reference is made, for example, to marble cutters and marble drillers, diamond cutters, workers in furnaces and laundries, men employed in wine cellars, breweries, and ice houses, men in boiler works, match makers, cleaners of clothes, makers of white lead, of china and earthenware, and many others. The argument is, apparently, that any law is special which does not include all of these occupations. This view is obviously unsound. Whether these other occupations present the same dangers to health as those involved in mining, etc., and whether, if they do, these dangers can best be met by restricting the hours of labor, are primarily questions for the Legislature. The Legislature has determined one or both of them in the negative by enacting this law. The selection of the businesses requiring regulation is confided to the legislative discretion, and this discretion is not subject to judicial review unless it clearly appears to have been exercised arbitrarily and without any show of good reason. It certainly cannot be justly said to be apparent that each or any of the trades instanced by counsel is, in its effect upon the health of workers, identical with the occupations covered by the act under discussion, nor that the most appropriate method of counteracting any injurious effects pertaining to any of them is necessarily the same as that found to be suitable for miners and men working in smelting and reduction works. In other words, the law is not rendered special by the mere fact that it does not cover every subject which the Legislature might conceivably have included in it. It is enough that the subjects covered possess such intrinsic peculiarities as to justify the legislative determination that those subjects require special enactment.

It may be questioned whether, in view of the title of the act, the limitation of hours applies to all underground work or only to that performed in mines. But if we assume, with petitioner, that only work in mines is covered, the act is not thereby rendered obnoxious to the constitutional provision against special legislation. This point was made in State v. Cantwell, supra, and was met by the answer that the discrimination between work in mines, and that in other underground diggings was justified by the fact that mining is a permanent business in which men are engaged steadily for long periods of time, whereas other underground diggings are ordinarily temporary and irregular in duration and for that reason do not require the same measure of regulation.

The act and the title thereof do not embrace more than one subject. Const. art. 4, § 24; Ex parte Boyce, supra. It is designed, as we have said, for the protection of the health of persons engaged in occupations regarded by the Legislature as dangerous. Such occupations as in the legislative view were subject to the same kind of danger and which required the same kind of regulation could properly be joined together in one act. We may remark the inconsistency between the argument that the act is void because it covers different kinds of employment and petitioner's other contention that the act is void because it does not cover a greater number of employments.

Petitioner attacks the provision of the act that the hours of employment shall be consecutive (excluding, however, any intermission of time for lunch or meals). We are not prepared to say that this limitation bears no reasonable relation to the protection of the health of the workmen. The Legislature may have considered that persons working in underground mines, in smelters, or in reduction works required for their protection, not only that the total number of hours of employment in a day should be limited, but that the hours of labor should be so adjusted as to allow the employé a long consecutive period for rest and recreation. This is a question of legislative policy with which the courts have no concern.

Upon the whole case, we are satisfied that the act is a valid exercise of the legislative power, and that the petitioner is properly held.

It is ordered that the writ be dismissed and the petitioner remanded to the custody of the constable.

MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 13*) — STATUTORY PROVISIONS—RESTRICTION OF HOURS OF EMPLOYMENT.

St. 1909, p. 279, c. 181, provides that the period of employment for persons engaged in work in underground mines shall not exceed 8 hours within any 24. Held, that the limitation of time is to be construed as referring to the time when men are actually engaged in work, and not when they are going to or from their work.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Dec. Dig. § 13.*]

In Bank. Application by Fred J. Martin for a writ of habeas corpus to obtain his release from custody on a charge of violating St. 1909, p. 279, c. 181. Petitioner discharged.

Solinsky & Wehe and Paul C. Morf, for petitioner. James Keith, Dist. Atty., for respondent.

SLOSS, J. The petitioner in this case was also petitioner in Cr. No. 1,539, just decided (106 Pac. 235), and is held under a complaint purporting to charge him with a violation of the terms of the act regulating the hours of employment in underground mines and in smelting and reduction works, approved March 10, 1909 (St. 1909, p. 279, c. 181). The validity of the act as a whole was considered and upheld in the foregoing case. The present proceeding presents solely a question of construction. The petitioner is charged in the complaint with having required a miner to work eight full and consecutive hours at the face of a drift in a mine in addition to the time necessarily occupied in traversing the shaft, underground drifts, and tunnels between the surface of the mine and the face of said drift. The time so occupied in going to and from the place of work was in excess of 30 minutes.

We think the petitioner's contention that no violation of the act is here charged is correct and should be sustained. The act provides that the period of employment of persons employed or engaged in work in underground mines, etc., shall not exceed 8 hours in any 24 hours. The purpose of the act is, as has been pointed out in the opinion in Cr. No. 1,539, the protection of the health of men working in underground mines. The injury to health which seems to have been apprehended is that which would be encountered by one subjected to the strain of performing manual labor under detrimental conditions. Giving to the words of the act their ordinary and reasonable meaning, the limitation of time is to be construed as referring to the time when men are actually engaged in work, not when they are going to or from their work. There is nothing in the language of the act which would justify a more restricted interpretation.

A somewhat similar question has arisen under the federal statute (5 Fed. St. Ann. p. 819 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 2637]), providing that "if any letter-carrier is employed a greater number of hours per day than eight he shall be paid extra for the same in proportion to the salary now fixed by law." The "employment" which entitles a carrier to extra pay under this law is held to be employment "in work that is not inconsistent with his general business under his employment as a letter-carrier." United States v. Post, 148 U. S. 124, 13 Sup. Ct. 567, 37 L. Ed. 392. It does not include short intervals, nor "swings," between trips, when the carrier is not actually employed in work, and not required to remain in or about the post office. United States v. Langston, 85 Fed. 613, 29 C. C. A. 379; United States v. McCrory, 119 Fed. 861, 56 C. C. A. 373.

The petitioner is discharged.

St. 1909, p. 279, c. 181, provides that the period of employment of all persons engaged in work in smelters and other institutions for the reduction or refining of ore shall not exceed 8 hours within any 24. Held, that a quartz mill is within the meaning of the statute, though the metal is extracted solely by the process of pulverizing and crushing.

4. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 13*)—STATUTORY REGULATION—POLICE POWER.

St. 1909, p. 279, c. 181, prohibits the occupation of any one in a quartz mill more than 8 hours within any 24. Held that, as the air in the vicinity of the crusher frequently becomes filled with fine particles of rock in the form of dust, it cannot be held that such occupation is not detrimental to health to such an extent as to place the statute within the police power.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Dec. Dig. § 13.*]

In Bank. Application by Fred J. Martin for a writ of habeas corpus to obtain his release from custody on a charge of having violated St. 1909, p. 279, c. 181. Petition dismissed.

Solinsky & Wehe and Paul C. Morf, for petitioner. James Keith, Dist. Atty., for respondent.

SHAW, J. This case was submitted upon the same briefs and at the same time as the two cases with the same title, numbered, respectively, 1,539 (106 Pac. 235), and 1,540 (106 Pac. 238). The only point wherein it differs from the other two cases is that in this case the petitioner was charged with having commanded a workman to work more than eight hours in one day, upon a mill in control of the petitioner and then in operation crushing and pulverizing quartz for the purpose of extracting precious metals therefrom; in other words, in an ordinary stamp mill.

The only arguments in favor of the writ, not answered in the opinions in the other two cases, are: First, that the mill in question is working free milling ore, and the metal is extracted solely by the process of pulverizing and washing, which, it is claimed, is not embraced within the phrase "smelters and other institutions for the reduction or refining of ores or metals," contained in the act; and, second, that the occupation of laboring in a quartz mill of this kind is not sufficiently injurious to health to bring it within the scope of the police power.

As applied to mining, the word "reduce" means to bring to a specified form or condition, as, to reduce a rock to powder, or, to deprive an ore of nonmetallic constituents, and the word "reduction" means the separation of metals from their ores. Standard Dic. The application of heat to flux the ore is not necessary in order to make the establishment an "institution for the reduction of ore." A quartz mill comes as clearly within the meaning of that phrase as a smelter. We cannot agree to the proposition that the insertion of the word "smelters," at the beginning of the phrase used in the statute, brings it within the rule noscitur a sociis, so as to confine the application of the statute to institutions wherein ores are reduced by smelting.

The Legislature has by this act declared that in its judgment the occupation of laboring in reduction works of this character is so dangerous to the health of those engaged in it as to make it a proper subject of regulation. As was remarked in the opinion in case No. 1,539, supra, the legislative judgment upon a matter of fact such as this "is not subject to judicial review unless it clearly appears to have been exercised arbitrarily and without any show of good reason." In a quartz mill the ore is first crushed and then washed in order to separate the metal from the rock. In this process it is obvious that frequently the air in the vicinity of the crusher will become filled with fine particles of the rock in the form of dust, which the workmen in breathing must draw into their lungs. We cannot say that this will not be detrimental to their health to such an extent as to make it advisable to shorten the hours of labor therein. It has been so held in cases in other states, with respect to similar statutes. Ex parte Boyce, 27 Nev. 299, 75 Pac. 3, 65 L. R. A. 47; Ex parte Kair, 28 Nev. 141, 80 Pac. 465, 113 Am. St. Rep. 817; State v. Holden, 14 Utah, 98, 46 Pac. 1105, 37 L. R. A. 108; Holden v. Hardy, 169 U. S. 396, 18 Sup. Ct. 383, 42 L. Ed. 780.

For these reasons we are of the opinion that the facts charged in the complaint against the petitioner state an offense defined in the statute, and that the statute is, in this particular, a constitutional enactment. The process upon which he is in custody is therefore valid.

It is ordered that the petition be dismissed, and that the petitioner be remanded to the custody of the officer.

CLUTE et al. v. TURNER, Superintendent of Streets, et al. (S. F. 5,158.)

1. STATUTES (§ 71*) — GENERAL LAWS — UNIFORMITY OF OPERATION.

If a law operates equally upon all the objects embraced within it that may come within the scope of its authority, the uniformity of operation contemplated by the Constitution by article 1, § 11, is attained, and St. 1889, p. 70, c. 76, being an act for laying out, opening, etc., any street, alley, court, etc., within municipalities, and to condemn and acquire property necessary or convenient for that purpose, providing a complete scheme for carrying out purposes stated in its title, including assessment of lands benefited within the improvement district established, is uniform in operation; the class to which it applies, municipalities, being a well-recognized class to which general legislation of such character may be addressed, and the subject of the legislation being one usually committed to such municipalities either by charter or general laws.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Statutes, Cent. Dig. § 71; Dec. Dig. § 71.*]

2. STATUTES (§ 123*) — TITLE — SUBJECT EMBRACED IN TITLE.

The act is not a violation of Const. art. 4, § 24, because the subject of assessment is not mentioned in the title.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Statutes, Cent. Dig. §§ 130, 132, 177, 181; Dec. Dig. § 123.*]

3. EMINENT DOMAIN (§ 2*)—TAKING PRIVATE PROPERTY FOR PUBLIC USE — SOVEREIGN POWER.

Under the Constitution, private property may be taken for public use either by the exercise of eminent domain or by taxation, which powers are separate and distinct.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Eminent Domain, Cent. Dig. §§ 3–12; Dec. Dig. § 2.*]

4. STATUTES (§ 97*)—SPECIAL OR LOCAL LAWS.

St. 1889, p. 70, c. 76, being an act for laying out, opening, etc., any street, square, alley, etc., within municipalities, and to condemn and acquire property necessary or convenient for that purpose, and providing for the assessment of lands benefited within the improvement district established, is not an eminent domain act, and, so far as it provides for an assessment for benefits, merely grants the power of taxation, and no property of those within the district created to pay for the benefits conferred is taken, and hence the act is not unconstitutional as being a special or local eminent domain law relating to municipalities only.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Statutes, Cent. Dig. § 109; Dec. Dig. § 97.*]

5. EMINENT DOMAIN (§ 2*) — STATUTES — VALIDITY—OPENING STREETS.

The act was not violative of Const. art. 1, § 14, prohibiting the taking of private property for public use without just compensation.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Eminent Domain, Cent. Dig. §§ 3, 11; Dec. Dig. § 2.*]

6. EMINENT DOMAIN (§ 2*)—LOCAL IMPROVEMENTS—ASSESSMENTS—DELEGATION OF POWER TO MUNICIPALITY.

Under the power of taxation the Legislature may confer upon municipalities the authority to require local improvements, such as the laying out or widening of streets, to be borne by those owning property in the vicinity of the improvement, and who are specially benefited by it, and the exercise of such power does not contravene the constitutional provision respecting the exercise of the power of eminent domain.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Eminent Domain, Cent. Dig. §§ 3–12; Dec. Dig. § 2.*]

7. CONSTITUTIONAL LAW (§ 233*) — EQUAL PROTECTION OF LAWS.

St. 1889, p. 70, c. 76, providing for the laying out, opening, etc., of any street, alley, etc., within municipalities, and providing for the assessment of lands benefited within the improvement district established, is not violative of Const. U. S. Amend. 14, guaranteeing to all the equal protection of the law.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Constitutional Law, Cent. Dig. § 686; Dec. Dig. § 233.*]

8. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 408*)—OPENING AND LAYING OUT STREETS—REPEAL OF STATUTE.

The act was not repealed by St. 1903, p. 376, c. 268, on the same subject; that act simply providing an alternative method of proceedings for opening and laying out streets, etc., and expressly providing, by section 35 thereof, that its provisions should in no way affect the act of 1889 (St. 1889, p. 70, c. 76).

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Municipal Corporations, Cent. Dig. § 1005; Dec. Dig. § 408.*]

9. Municipal Corporations (§ 408*)—Opening and Laying Out Streets—Repeal of Statute.

The act, being one providing for taxation for special benefits as far as the lands within the improvement district are concerned, and having nothing to do with eminent domain, was not repealed by the amendment in 1907 (St. 1907, p. 742, c. 399) of Code Civ. Proc. § 1238, relative to the exercise of eminent domain as to roads and streets.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; William H. Waste, Judge.

Action by A. B. Clute and others against E. Q. Turner, Superintendent of Streets, and others. From a judgment for defendants and an order denying a new trial, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

J. C. Bates, for appellants. Redmond C. Staats and J. M. Koford (F. D. Stringham and Geo. L. Hughes, of counsel), for respondents.

LORIGAN, J. The trustees of the town of Berkeley instituted proceedings under the act of 1889 to open and extend Eighth street in that town. The lands of plaintiffs were included within the district established by the board, under the act, as among those to be benefited or affected by the opening of the street, and which were to be assessed to pay the damages, costs, and expenses thereof. In due course an assessment was levied against the lands of plaintiffs and others by the commissioners appointed by the board of trustees for that purpose, for benefits to their lands by reason of the opening of the street. The assessment against the lands of plaintiffs having become delinquent, the superintendent of streets was proceeding to sell their lands within said district to collect it, when they brought this action against the superintendent and the board of trustees of the town to obtain an injunction restraining the sale, and a decree declaring the assessment invalid. A demurrer to the complaint was sustained, and a motion of plaintiffs for a preliminary injunction denied. The plaintiffs declining to amend their complaint, judgment was entered against them, and they appeal therefrom and from the order denying their motion; the principal question on the appeal being the correctness of the ruling of the court sustaining the demurrer to the complaint.

We have not set forth in particular the allegations of the complaint because the action is not based on any claim of invalidity in any of the proceedings taken by the board of trustees for nonconformity to the provisions of the act under which they were instituted. Their regularity is practically conceded, and the attack on the assessment is made exclusively upon the ground that the act itself, under which the proceedings for opening the street were brought, is invalid because violative of certain provisions of both the state and federal Constitutions, and, if not invalid for those reasons, that the act had, nevertheless, been repealed before the proceedings in question were instituted.

As to the constitutional objections, it is claimed that the act in question is void under article 1, sections 11 and 14, of our Constitution, providing, respectively, that all laws of a general nature shall have a uniform operation, and that private property shall not be taken or damaged for public use without just compensation having been first paid to the owner; that the act is not a general law, particularly when compared with the general act of eminent domain; and that it also conflicts with article 4, § 24, of the same organic law, which requires the subject of an act to be expressed in its title, the point in this regard being that the subject of "assessment," to pay for the lands taken for the opening of the street, is not mentioned in the title to the act. As to the federal Constitution, it is claimed that the act denies to plaintiffs "the equal protection of the laws" guaranteed to them by article 14 of that Constitution (Const. U. S. Amend. 14).

Upon the subject of repeal of the act, it is insisted that it was repealed by the passage of the subsequent act of 1903 (St. 1903, p. 376, c. 268) on the same subject of opening and laying out streets, and also by the amendment in 1907 (St. 1907, p. 742, c. 399) of section 1238, Code Civ. Proc., relative to the exercise of the right of eminent domain as to roads and streets. The constitutionality of this particular act of 1889 has repeatedly been attacked under constitutional objections, and as repeatedly sustained, and in the present assault, where an objection is now urged, which it is claimed has not been heretofore made against the act itself, it will be found to have been urged against legislation of a similar character and determined to be untenable. The act in question is entitled "An act to provide for laying out, opening, extending, widening, straightening or closing up, in whole or in part, any street, square, lane, alley, court or place within municipalities and to condemn and acquire any and all land and property necessary or convenient for that purpose." St. 1889, p. 70, c. 76. The act provides for a complete scheme for carrying out the purposes stated in its title, and, among other things (alone necessary to be referred to in connection with the points made on this appeal), provides for the passage of a resolution of intention, describing the work or improvement to be carried out, the land necessary to be taken therefor, and a specification of the exterior boundaries of the district of land to be affected or benefited by said work or improvement and to be assessed to pay the damages, costs, and expenses thereof; that commissioners shall be appointed to determine the value of the land to be taken and the damages to improvements and property affected thereby; the said commissioners also to determine the amount of expenses incident to the work or improvement contemplated, and to assess the same upon the district of lands declared to be benefited thereby, in proportion to the benefits to be derived therefrom. It provides for a report of these matters by the commissioners to the municipal body, and for public notice of the making thereof, and for a hearing thereon, at which objections to said report may be made by any person interested. It empowers the commissioners after confirmation of the report to collect the assessments made, and authorizes the sale of the lands assessed for benefits after payment of the assessments becomes delinquent. It further provides that when sufficient money is in the hands of the city treasurer, in the fund devoted to the proposed improvement, to pay for the lands and improvements to be taken or damaged, the owner of said land be notified of the readiness of the municipality to make payment on tender of a conveyance by him, and, in the event of his refusal to accept, provides that the commissioners may cause proceedings, in the name of the municipality, to be taken for the condemnation of the land, as provided by law, under the right of eminent domain.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. & Am. Digs. 1907 to date, & Reporter Indexes.

Now, to a consideration of the points urged by appellants against the act. It is claimed that the act is unconstitutional, because it is not a general law, that it is not uniform in its operation, and that the subject upon which it legislates—the assessment—is not expressed in its title.

As to the first point referred to, it has been expressly decided adversely to appellant in Davies v. Los Angeles, 86 Cal. 37, 24 Pac. 771, which involved a consideration of this very act of 1889. It was there insisted that the act was not a general law within the constitutional provision. But the court held to the contrary, saying: "The only question upon which there could be any reasonable doubt is whether the statute under consideration is a general law or not, and that question has been firmly settled by several well-considered cases, above cited, and should be equally beyond controversy in the courts of this state." The constitutionality of the act was again sustained in Cohen v. County of Alameda, 124 Cal. 504, 57 Pac. 377, and in Alameda v. Cohen, 133 Cal. 6, 65 Pac. 127, both following the Davies Case.

As to the point that the act is unconstitutional because the subject of assessment is not mentioned in the title, this point was particularly discussed in the Davies Case, and expressly decided to be untenable.

It is insisted, however, that, conceding the act to be a general law, it is not uniform in its operation. But upon the face of the act, at least, there can be no merit in this claim. "If the law operates equally upon all the objects embraced within it, when they come within the circle or scope of its authority, the uniformity of operation contemplated by the Constitution is attained." People v. Henshaw, 76 Cal. 436, 18 Pac. 413. The class to which the act applies is a well-recognized class, to which general legislation of the character mentioned in the title of the act may be addressed, namely, municipalities, and the subject of that legislation, the laying out and opening of streets and other public places, is one usually committed to such municipalities, either by charter or general laws, as matter of municipal concern, and a law which provides for all municipalities a system for opening and extending streets and kindred matters, such as are embraced in the title to the act, is uniform in its operation. Hellman v. Shoulter, 114 Cal. 137, 44 Pac. 915, 45 Pac. 1057.

But it is claimed, notwithstanding these decisions, that the act is not a general law, but local and special, when compared with the provisions of the Code of Civil Procedure relative to the exercise of the right of eminent domain. The particular claim in that respect is that the provisions relative to eminent domain constitute a general law in the fullest acceptation of the term, and apply to all cases where private property may be taken or damaged for public use, including the matter of opening and extending streets, while the act in question is special and local in its application and directed, as counsel contends, to the taking of private property for public use in municipalities only. In this connection it is further insisted that by the proceedings authorized under the act a person is deprived of his property without due process of law, or the protection of equal laws in this, that the taking of private property for opening the streets in a municipality is segregated from the taking of such property outside the municipality, and of all other property, without the benefit conferred in all other cases under proceedings in eminent domain, of having a judicial determination in an action brought for that purpose of the compensation to be paid for the taking, with the right of appeal, and also subjecting the owner of property so taken to be specially taxed under the act for benefits to his property, which, it is contended under the decision in Beveridge v. Lewis, 137 Cal. 619, 67 Pac. 1040, 70 Pac. 1083, 59 L. R. A. 581, 92 Am. St. Rep. 188, could not, under proceedings in eminent domain, be allowed as an offset in determining the compensation to be paid. And, generally, it is claimed that the act is in violation of article 1 of section 14 of our Constitution against taking private property for public use without just compensation, and the legislation thereunder.

While we have set forth the main claims of counsel on this latter point, we perceive no reason why we should discuss them. They are all based upon the assumption that the act in question, as far as its provisions pertain to the assessment of the lands in the district for special benefits, are in the nature of taking the property of plaintiffs for public use, or, at least, that all the provisions of the act on that subject are referable to the exercise of the power of eminent domain. Of course, if this assumption is wrong, and the exercise of the power of eminent domain is not at all involved in proceedings under the act, the attack upon it, based on that assumption, falls. And that the proceedings authorized by the act have no relation to the exercise of this right of eminent domain at all is, under the authorities, quite clear. The act is not in any respect an eminent domain act, nor does it contain any of its features, and, as far as it provides (which as to the lands of plaintiff and others in the district is all it does) for an assessment for benefits against the lands embraced within the exterior limits of the district declared by the municipal authorities to be benefited by the contemplated street improvement, the right of eminent domain is not being exercised at all; there is no taking of the lands, assessed under the act for special benefits, in either a general or constitutional sense. Under our Constitution, private property may be taken for public use, either by the exercise of the right of eminent domain or by taxation. These are sovereign powers which are separate and distinct from each other, and the power which is conferred upon municipalities under the proceedings authorized by the act in question, as far as assessing the lands for special benefits are concerned, are referable solely to the exercise by the state of its sovereign power of taxation conferred upon municipalities as its governmental agents. As said by Dillon, in his work on Municipal Corporations ([4th Ed.] § 617): "The compulsory acquisition of property for streets or other public purposes involves the exercise of two different and high prerogative or sovereign powers, namely, that of eminent domain, so called, by which the property is taken, and that of taxation (which includes assessments upon the property specially benefited, or perhaps upon such as is legislatively deemed to be thus benefited), by which compensation is made to those whose property has been thus appropriated." Within the declaration of that authority, the power which has been conferred upon the municipality under this act, namely, to assess for special benefits, is the power of taxation, power to assess the lands within the district for those special benefits which they will receive above the benefits which may result to the community generally through such improvement; authority from the Legislature to create a district which, in the judgment of the municipal authorities, will be specially benefited by the opening or widening of a street or other public improvement contemplated by the act. The theory upon which such legislation is enacted is that the lands in the vicinity of a public improvement, and which are specially benefited by it, should pay the expenses of the making of the improvement, in proportion to the benefits received therefrom. This is all that the act contemplates and provides for. No property of those within the district created to pay for the benefits conferred is taken. Such owners are taxed in proportion to benefits to create a fund to be paid the owner for the land which is actually taken for the street and the damages and costs of the improvement. Should the owner refuse to take the amount awarded him by the commissioners, then, as the act provides, proceedings under the law relative to the exercise of the right of eminent domain must be brought against him to condemn his land. This, however, is the only occasion when the law of eminent domain has any application under the act, and does not concern the owners of land assessed for special benefits. As to them, the state, through its public agency —the municipality—is exercising the right of taxation and not eminent domain. The act in question contemplates the exercise of both powers; eminent domain as against the owner of the land to be taken for the improvement if he does not agree to take the award made by the commissioners, and taxation of the owners of land in the district, who are specially benefited by the improvement, to pay for the land taken and the expenses of making the improvement. Having pointed out the distinction in the constitutional powers provided to be exercised under the act, it is only necessary to say that it is generally agreed among the authorities, and in this state distinctly decided, that the Legislature has the right, under the power of taxation, to confer upon municipalities the authority to require local improvements, such as the laying out or widening of streets, to be borne by those owning property in the vicinity of the improvement, and who are specially benefited by reason of it; that this is a legitimate exercise of the taxing power which the Legislature may confer upon municipalities in making local improvements, and does not contravene the constitutional provision respecting the exercise of eminent domain. Emery v. S. F. Gas Co., 28 Cal. 345; Hagar v. Supervisors Yolo County, 47 Cal. 222; Hornung v. McCarthy, 126 Cal. 17, 58 Pac. 303; Duncan v. Ramish, 142 Cal. 686, 76 Pac. 661. See, also, French v. Barber Asphalt Pav. Co., 181 U. S. 324, 21 Sup. Ct. 625, 45 L. Ed. 879, and People v. Mayor of Brooklyn, 4 N. Y. 419, 55 Am. Dec. 266, where these matters are exhaustively discussed.

It is apparent, therefore, that an act which confers authority upon municipalities to tax for local improvements cannot be said to be local or special when compared with legislation providing for the exercise of the right of eminent domain, where the act has no relation to the exercise of such latter power, but applies to and is justified under the exercise of an entirely different and distinct power—that of taxation.

It would also appear from a reading of the opinion in Davies v. Los Angeles, supra, page 48 of 86 Cal. (24 Pac. 771), that the same points just considered were urged on that appeal, or, at least, objections against the validity of the act on substantially the same grounds were made, and, while not extensively discussed by the court, were considered and decided to be untenable.

Under these views and authorities cited, there can be no merit in the claim that plaintiffs by the provisions of the act are denied equal protection of the law as is guaranteed by article 14 of the federal Constitution. There is nothing in the case of Norwood v. Baker, 172 U. S. 269, 19 Sup. Ct. 187, 43 L. Ed. 443, relied on by appellants, which holds that the assessment of lands in a district for special benefits in the opening and improvement of streets by a municipality is invalid because in contravention of any provisions of the federal Constitution. That it decides nothing of the kind is pointed out in French v. Barber Asphalt Co., 181 U. S. 324, 21 Sup. Ct. 625, 45 L. Ed. 879, and Wight v. Davidson, 181 U. S. 371, 21 Sup. Ct. 616, 45 L. Ed. 900. See, also, Duncan v. Ramish, 142 Cal. 682, 76 Pac. 661.

As to the other points made by appellants: There is nothing in the claim that the act of 1889 was repealed by the subsequent act of 1903 on the same subject of opening and laying out streets. A sufficient answer to this claim is that the act of 1903 simply provides an alternative method of proceedings for opening and laying out streets, etc., and expressly provides, by section 35 thereof, that its provisions shall in no way affect the act of 1889. The point that the act in question was repealed by the enactment in 1907 of amendments to the Code of Civil Procedure relative to eminent domain requires no discussion, in view of the fact that the act, being one providing for taxation for special benefits as far as the lands within the district are concerned, has nothing to do with eminent domain.

As the demurrer was properly sustained, the application for a preliminary injunction was properly denied.

The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

We concur: MELVIN, J.; HENSHAW, J.

MOTT v. MINOR. (Civ. 660.)

(Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Nov. 16, 1909.)

1. Brokers (§ 82*)—Action for Compensation—Defenses That Must be Specially Pleaded.

In an action by a broker for compensation for having procured a purchaser for land, under a contract of employment between himself and defendant, the defense that plaintiff's authority had been rescinded before his alleged performance was admissible, though defendant did not specially plead it.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Brokers, Cent. Dig. § 103; Dec. Dig. § 82.*]

2. Appeal and Error (§ 843*)—Review—Objections to Evidence.

Though an objection by appellant to the introduction of evidence was not sufficiently specific to raise the question, but it appears to have been clearly admissible, the form of the objection is unimportant.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 3331; Dec. Dig. § 843.*]

3. Brokers (§ 82*)—Action for Compensation—Issues and Proof.

Where, in an action by a broker for compensation for having procured a purchaser for defendant's land, the complaint alleged that he procured a certain person as purchaser, and the evidence showed that such person was acting as agent for an undisclosed principal, there was a variance.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Brokers, Cent. Dig. § 103; Dec. Dig. § 82.*]

4. Brokers (§ 55*)—Compensation—Services of Broker.

Where the real party in interest is not disclosed to the vendor, the broker should not be allowed to prevail on the theory that he has produced the agent of an undisclosed principal.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Brokers, Cent. Dig. § 82; Dec. Dig. § 55.*]

5. Brokers (§ 88*)—Action for Compensation—Instruction.

In an action by a broker for compensation for finding a purchaser for defendant's land, it appeared that the broker procured one who was agent for an undisclosed principal, and that, on the meeting of such person and defendant, defendant refused to sell, and the court instructed that in order for plaintiff to recover he must show that the person procured by him made an offer to purchase. Held, that the instruction was proper.

6. Appeal and Error (§ 1068*)—Instructions—Harmless Error.

In an action by a broker for compensation for finding a purchaser for defendant's land, an instruction as to the facts which must be shown by plaintiff concerning the offer, if erroneous, was harmless, where it appeared that the broker's authority had been rescinded at the time of his alleged performance.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 4227; Dec. Dig. § 1068.*]

7. Brokers (§ 86*)—Action for Compensation—Services.

In an action by a broker for compensation for finding a purchaser for defendant's land, evidence held sufficient to justify a finding that his authority had been canceled prior to his alleged performance.

Appeal from Superior Court, Humboldt County; G. W. Hunter, Judge.

Action by Charles W. Mott against Isaac Minor. Appeal by plaintiff from an order denying a motion for a new trial. Affirmed.

Arthur H. Barendt, for appellant. F. A. Cutler, Geo. D. Murray, and McGowan, Squires & Westlake, for respondent.

BURNETT, J. The cause, involving a broker's commission for securing a purchaser for timber land, was tried before a jury, and a general verdict was rendered in favor of defendant. The appeal is from an order denying plaintiff's motion for a new trial.

The written instrument which, it is claimed, created the agency, is in the form of a letter signed by defendant, and in the following language: "San Francisco, Cal., July 27th, 1903. Chas. W. Mott, Esq., San Francisco, Calif.—Dear Sir: I own about 20,000 acres of sugar and yellow pine land (more or less) situated in Tuolumne county, California, and being located in townships 1 and 2 south, ranges 18, 19 and 20 east, M. D. M. and will sell the same for twenty dollars per acre. If you procure me a buyer for the above mentioned tract, or are instrumental in selling same, I hereby agree in consideration of such service, to allow you ten per cent commission on the above price, or any less price that I may agree to accept in the event of a sale being made under within conditions."

The complaint, after alleging the employment of plaintiff by virtue of said written agreement, continues: "That thereupon plaintiff entered upon said service and made every endeavor to procure a buyer for the said land, and his efforts in that behalf were such that on or about October 1, 1903, plaintiff procured one Thomas Friant as a buyer for the said tract of land at the said price and introduced him to the defendant and informed the defendant that the said Thomas Friant was then and there ready, able, and willing to purchase the whole of the said tract of land for the said price, and he, the said Thomas Friant, was then and there able, ready, and willing to purchase of the defendant, the whole or any part of the said tract of land at the said price of $20 per acre; that the negotiations thus initiated continued, and on or about July 13, 1904, the said Thomas Friant offered the said defendant $23 per acre for the said tract of land, and he was then and there able, ready, and willing to purchase the said tract of land and pay therefor the said sum of $23 per acre to defendant."

The defendant denied "that on the 27th day of July, 1903, or at any other time, the defendant employed the plaintiff, as a broker or otherwise, to sell for him certain or any real estate, except as hereinafter stated; that is to say, that at the time last mentioned the said plaintiff represented and asserted to the said defendant that he had secured a purchaser for the lands and premises referred to and mentioned in the said complaint, and that, if he had some instrument to show his authority to make a sale therefor to the said intending purchaser, he, the said plaintiff, would be in a better position to consummate a sale, and thereupon for the purpose of showing the authority of the said plaintiff, as aforesaid, and not otherwise, the said defendant made and executed the instrument set forth in the complaint herein." All the other allegations of the complaint are specifically denied.

The first contention of appellant is that the court erred in admitting evidence of the rescission of the plaintiff's authority as agent for defendant. It is said in the brief: "The answer does not disclose any such defense as cancellation. There is no general denial in the answer. It is, in fact, a confession and avoidance, an admission that the contract was made and a denial of its apparent intent, coupled with a denial that plaintiff performed the services so as to entitle him to the commissions for which he sues." It is urged, therefore, that the cancellation was new matter and should have been pleaded in accordance with the rule laid down in Bliss on Code Pleading (2d Ed.) p. 519, as follows: "It has been supposed by some that the defendant should still be permitted, under the Code, to prove any facts, under a denial merely, which admit it was invalid. But it has been shown that the defendant is at liberty, without having especially pleaded them, to give evidence of facts only which tend to disprove the facts alleged and denied; that is, to disprove their existence as facts, and not the liability they create. The permission goes no further. The rule has been thus stated: 'A general traverse under the Code authorizes the introduction of no evidence except such as tends directly to disprove some fact alleged in the complaint.' Whenever a defendant intends to rest his defense upon any fact which is not included in the allegations necessary to the support of the plaintiff's case, he must set it out. 'The general rule is that any fact which avoids the action, and which the plaintiff is not bound to prove in the first instance in support of it, is new matter; but a fact which merely negatives the averments of the petition is not new matter and need not be replied to.'"

Upon reflection it will appear that defendant has brought himself clearly within the rule as announced in the foregoing quotations. In order to prevail it was necessary for plaintiff to show two things: First, that he secured a purchaser for the land; and, second, that when he did so he was the duly authorized agent of the defendant for that purpose. It is clear that unless these two circumstances concurred no cause of action existed. The complaint, it is true, does not specifically allege that plaintiff's authority continued till the time when the offer was made; but this is nevertheless admittedly a material factor, and it does at least inferentially appear. Otherwise the complaint would be fatally defective. The complaint, as we have seen, alleges that on the 27th day of July, 1903, the defendant employed the plaintiff to sell the property, and thereupon plaintiff entered upon said service and procured one Thomas Friant as a buyer. While not very clearly stated, we think the complaint necessarily implies that the purchaser was secured while plaintiff was in the service as broker of defendant. At any rate, it is conceded that this is the scheme of the complaint and the evidence to the effect that plaintiff's authority had been canceled, in other words, that he was not in the service of defendant at the time mentioned, goes directly to the foundation of plaintiff's claim. The evidence tended thus to show that no cause of action ever existed in favor of plaintiff and was as clearly admissible as evidence negativing plaintiff's authority in the first instance, or any other material fact denied by the answer. There can be no controversy about the rule, concerning which the authorities are agreed. It is succinctly stated by Prof. Pomeroy (section 549, Civ. Rem. [4th Ed.]) as follows: "Any facts which tend to disprove some one of the material allegations of the complaint may be given in evidence under the denial; any fact which does not thus directly tend to disprove some one or more of these allegations cannot be given in evidence under the denial. It follows that if such fact is in itself a defense, or, in combination with others aids in establishing a defense, this defense must be based upon the assumption, that so far as it is concerned, all the material allegations made by the plaintiff are either admitted or proven to be true. The facts which constitute or aid in constituting such a defense are 'new matter.'" See, also, Landis v. Morrison, 69 Cal. 83, 10 Pac. 258; Heaten v. Arper, 145 Cal. 284, 78 Pac. 721.

The point is also made by respondent that the objection to the evidence was not sufficiently specific to raise the question which we have been considering. There is merit in the contention; but, as it seems clear to us that the evidence was admissible, the form of the objection becomes unimportant.

It is claimed that "there is not a scintilla of testimony to show that Mr. Friant was not able, ready, and willing to buy the defendant's lands at the contract price of $20 per acre." It is sufficient to say that plaintiff in his testimony did not claim that Friant was to be the purchaser of the land. Although he was so introduced, plaintiff declares that "Mr. Friant was a member of the White & Friant Lumber Company. * * * That it was the company that wanted to buy the lands. Nothing was said about his company. Mr. Friant at all times was acting for the White & Friant Lumber Company. They were the ones that wanted to purchase the lands." Considering the whole record, it is therefrom apparent that said Friant was not able and willing to buy said land, but he was acting for an undisclosed principal. There was clearly a variance in this respect between the complaint and the proof. It is no answer to say, "Qui facit per alium facit per se," as it is not a question of authority to act, but of the identity of the would-be purchaser. In Gunn v. Bank of California, 99 Cal. 352, 33 Pac. 1106, it is said: "It is, of course, well settled that when a broker employed simply to negotiate a sale of real estate has found a purchaser able, ready, and willing to purchase upon the vendor's terms, his right to the agreed commission is complete, and does not depend upon the final acceptance by the purchaser of a conveyance of the property sold. * * * But the question here is: What is finding or producing a purchaser within the meaning of the rule of law declared in this and the other cases cited? Is it sufficient for a broker to merely find a person financially able, and who verbally agrees with him to purchase upon the terms of the vendor and makes a deposit, but who neither signs a binding agreement to purchase upon such terms nor is produced before the vendor as a person ready and willing to enter into such a contract? It seems to us very clear that this question must be answered in the negative. The contract of the broker is to negotiate a sale; that is, to procure a valid contract to purchase, which can be enforced by the vendor if his title is perfect; or if, he does not procure such contract, to bring the vendor and the proposed purchaser together, that the vendor may secure such a contract, unless he is willing to trust to an oral agreement." The case of Hayden v. Grillo, 35 Mo. App. 647, is quoted to the same effect, wherein it is said: "But the necessity of a written contract of sale may be rendered unnecessary if the agent bring the vendor and vendee together, and the latter is able and willing and offers to complete the contract provided the vendor will make the conveyance." The same doctrine is declared in Mattingly v. Pennie, 105 Cal. 519, 39 Pac. 202 (45 Am. St. Rep. 87), and it is held that: "The readiness and willingness of a person to purchase the property can be shown only by an offer on his part to purchase; and unless he has actually entered into a contract binding him to purchase or has offered to the vendor and not merely to the broker to enter into such a contract he cannot be considered a purchaser."

As the question of readiness and good faith are important factors in a case of this kind, it is no more than reasonable that a plaintiff should be held to strict proof in reference to the purchaser, and where the real party in interest is not disclosed to the vendor the broker should not be allowed to prevail upon the theory that he has produced the agent of the undiscovered principal.

But, aside from the foregoing, the general verdict of the jury finds support in the evidence that plaintiff's authority had been canceled before the purchaser was found.

The finding that plaintiff was not in the service of defendant would render immaterial the other consideration as to the purchaser. A finding as to either against plaintiff would obviously support a judgment in behalf of defendant.

Complaint is made also that the court instructed the jury that in order for plaintiff to recover it was incumbent upon him, under the allegations of the complaint, to establish the fact that Thomas Friant made an offer to the defendant to purchase the land at the sum of at least $20 per acre, and that if the jury found from the evidence that Thomas Friant did not offer the defendant the sum of at least $20 per acre then they should find for the defendant, ignoring the defendant's "refusal to enter into any negotiations with the buyer by peremptorily announcing, immediately on meeting the buyer, that he would not sell at the figure named." One of these instructions given by the court was: "I charge you that the readiness or willingness of a person to purchase property can be shown only by an offer on his part to purchase, and, unless you find from the evidence that plaintiff procured a purchaser who offered to purchase all the land described in the agreement, then I charge you that there was no sufficient offer made to the defendant, and you must find a verdict for said defendant." This instruction really follows the allegations of the complaint, but it is claimed by appellant that it was not necessary to show an offer in view of defendant's peremptory refusal to sell. Many authorities are cited to the effect that the broker is entitled to the commission when he has procured a purchaser able, ready, and willing to purchase, therefore holding by implication, so it is claimed, that it is not necessary to prove an offer in order to recover.

However, there seems to be a difference between a bilateral contract binding both parties and a unilateral promise like the one here. This is pointed out in the Mattingly Case, supra, wherein it is said, on page 520 of 105 Cal., and page 202 of 39 Pac. (45 Am. St. Rep. 87), that: "Counsel for plaintiff contend that the evidence showed that Blythe unequivocally refused to perform his contract; and they claim that, under section 1512 of the Civil Code, his refusal to perform entitled plaintiff to all the benefits which he would have obtained if the contract had been performed by both parties. Such is not the law. In some cases of bilateral contracts a refusal on the part of one party to perform the contract has been held to amount to a prevention of performance by the other party. But where, as here, the contract is unilateral, the party to whom the promise is made cannot recover without proof of performance of the condition upon which the promise depends; and in such a case a mere refusal by the promisor to perform, or even an entire repudiation by him of the contract, does not of itself amount to prevention." This must be especially so where, as here, the purchaser was not introduced or made known to the defendant. If he is to be bound by the action of a third party representing an undisclosed principal, there ought at least to be a bona fide offer to purchase on the part of said representative.

But, again, the theory of the complaint is that the negotiations were initiated on October 1st, and that they continued, and on or about July 13, 1904, an offer was made of $23 per acre. According to the allegations of the complaint, therefore, the cause of action was not complete till the latter date, and defendant at any time prior thereto had a right to terminate the agency. But it is admitted that on March 30th preceding defendant addressed a letter to plaintiff, which the latter admits he received, revoking the authority of plaintiff to sell the property. Hence it would seem that, if the instruction as to the "offer" was erroneous, it was without prejudice, as the relation of agency had been terminated.

The closing brief of appellant is devoted to the contention that the evidence is insufficient to show that defendant canceled plaintiff's authority prior to October 1, 1903. In view of the foregoing allegation of the complaint as to July 13, 1904, it would seem to be immaterial whether the authority was canceled prior to said October 1st; but it may be observed that defendant and his daughter so testified, and hence it cannot be asserted that a finding to that effect would be unsupported.

We think there is no prejudicial error in the record, and the order denying the motion for a new trial is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. NEWTON. (Cr. 202.)

(Court of Appeal, First District, California. Nov. 16, 1909.)

1. Abduction (§ 15*) — Jury Question — Intent of Abduction.

In a prosecution under Pen. Code, § 267, punishing one who takes away any female under 16 years old from her father, mother, etc., without their consent, for the purpose of prostitution, the purpose and intent of the abduction is peculiarly for the jury.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Abduction, Dec. Dig. § 15.*]

2. ABDUCTION (§ 12*)—PROSECUTIONS—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE—PURPOSE OF ABDUCTION—PROSTITUTION.

In a prosecution for abducting a female under 16 years old for the purpose of prostitution, evidence held to support a finding that the girl was taken away for the purpose of prostitution.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Abduction, Cent. Dig. § 22; Dec. Dig. § 12.*]

3. ABDUCTION (§ 1*)—CRIMINAL RESPONSIBILITY—UNMARRIED FEMALE—NECESSITY OF MARRIAGE.

The female abducted need not have been unmarried in order to justify a conviction under Pen. Code, § 267, punishing one who takes away any female under 16 years old from her father, mother, etc., without their consent, for the purpose of prostitution.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Abduction, Dec. Dig. § 1.*]

4. INDICTMENT AND INFORMATION (§ 167*)—PROOF—UNNECESSARY AVERMENT.

Alleging the unnecessary fact that the female was unmarried, in a prosecution under Pen. Code, § 267, punishing one who takes away any female under 16 years old from her father, etc., without his consent for the purpose of prostitution, did not make such fact material and necessary to be proved; the name of the girl and her father being correctly alleged and she being identified.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Indictment and Information, Cent. Dig. § 531; Dec. Dig. § 167.*]

5. INDICTMENT AND INFORMATION (§ 167*)—PROOF—SUFFICIENCY—UNNECESSARY ALLEGATIONS.

Unnecessary allegations in the indictment, even if necessary to be proven, need not be proven with the strictness required of allegations essential to the crime charged.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Indictment and Information, Cent. Dig. § 531; Dec. Dig. § 167.*]

6. ABDUCTION (§ 9*)—PROSECUTIONS—ADMISSION OF EVIDENCE.

In a prosecution for abduction for the purpose of prostitution, a question to the police officer who stopped accused and the girl when accused was taking her to a house of prostitution whether, knowing accused was of bad reputation, it was not his duty to take the girl home, was properly excluded; the officer not being tried for breach of duty.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Abduction, Dec. Dig. § 9.*]

7. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 448*)—EVIDENCE—OPINION EVIDENCE.

The question also called for the officer's opinion as to his duty.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; F. B. Ogden, Judge.

Clara Newton was convicted of abduction for the purpose of prostitution, and she appeals. Affirmed.

Mervyn J. Samuels, for appellant. Attorney General Webb, for the People.

HALL, J. Defendant was charged with the crime of abduction as defined by section 267 of the Penal Code, and upon trial was convicted. Upon this her appeal, taken from the judgment rendered against her, it is claimed that the evidence is insufficient to sustain the verdict (1) because it is not shown that the abduction was for the purpose of prostitution; and (2) because there is no proof of the allegation that the person alleged to have been abducted was unmarried.

The section under which the prosecution was had requires that the abduction be "for the purpose of prostitution," and accordingly it was so charged. The purpose or intent with which the abduction was done is peculiarly a matter for the determination of the jury. In this case we think the evidence in the record amply supports the determination of the jury upon this point. It was in proof that the defendant met the girl alleged to have been abducted on the evening of June 14, 1909, and induced her to go with defendant to the home of defendant. Defendant caused the girl to comb and arrange her hair. The girl testified that while she was combing her hair defendant told her that she, defendant, had from 18 to 19 men coming to visit her, and that it was hard for her to attend to them all, and, if she could get some one to work for her, "why, I could make good money." That "she, defendant, could telephone to the Chinese to buy me a silk kimona and chemise. * * * She said we would put our heads out of the window, and she said if I was with her the night before I could have made $10 with her." Defendant sprinkled the girl with perfumery and caused her to put on a coat of defendant's, and at about 11 o'clock at night took her to a house of prostitution. On the way some police officers spoke to defendant, and asked her where she was going, and about the girl. Defendant said the girl was named O'Brien, and had been raised by defendant's mother. In fact, her name was Lizzie Wright, and she was a stranger to defendant. The defendant told the officers that she was going to collect some money of a woman known to the officers to be a prostitute. The officers allowed defendant and the girl to pass on after cautioning defendant not to take the girl into the house. Defendant, however, took the girl into the house of prostitution, entering by the rear door. When the officers applied for admission shortly afterwards, defendant told the girl not to let them see her, and she accordingly hid in the toilet. These circumstances we think ample to support the theory that the defendant abducted the girl for the purpose of prostitution.

The section under which the information was laid does not require the abducted female to be unmarried. It simply provides that: "Every person who takes away any female under the age of eighteen years from her father, mother, guardian, or other person having the legal charge of her person, without their consent, for the purpose of prostitution, is punishable," etc. Nevertheless the information describes the girl abducted as "Lizzie Wright, then and there being an unmarried female under the age of eighteen years, to wit, of the age of sixteen years." It is now claimed that, though the allegation that she was unmarried was quite unnecessary, yet, it being so alleged, the fact became a matter of essential description and must be proved. It may not always be easy to determine whether a particular fact, by being alleged, has become thereby a material fact necessary to be proved or not. In the case at bar the girl was correctly named, and the name of her father also correctly given. She was thus certainly identified. Whether she was married or not did not in any manner qualify the crime or go to its identity. The word "unmarried" could be stricken from the information without affecting the validity of the information in any respect. We think it may well be treated as surplusage. Such treatment finds ample support in the adjudicated cases. In Mobley v. State, 46 Miss. 501, it was alleged that the female upon whom it was charged a rape was committed was over the age of 10 years. It was held that this allegation, being unnecessary, need not be proved. "As rape may be committed upon a female of any age, the averment that the injured person is 'over the age of ten years' is unnecessary, and, not being a constituent of the crime, need not be contained in the indictment, or, if inserted, need not be proved, as the offense is complete without these words." This case is cited with approval in Sutton v. People, 145 Ill. 279, 34 N. E. 420, where it was held unnecessary to prove an allegation that the accused, charged with rape, was "of the age of fourteen years and upwards." In State v. Ean, 90 Iowa, 534, 58 N. W. 898, the defendant was charged with having committed the crime of adultery with a woman whose name was unknown to the grand jury, and who was over 18 years of age. It was held that the allegation as to the age of the woman with whom it was charged that the defendant committed the adultery was surplusage, and need not be proven. In State v. Perrin, 1 Tread. Const. (S. C.) 446, it was alleged that the person libeled was the only daughter of the widow Roach, and it was held that it was unnecessary to prove that she was the only daughter of such widow. In Allen v. State, 52 Ind. 486, it was held that an allegation that liquor was given to Robert McNeal, Jr., was sufficiently supported by proof that it was given to Robert McNeal without any evidence as to whether he was junior or senior. "Whenever a description or averment can be stricken out, without affecting the charge against the prisoner, and without vitiating the indictment, it may on the trial be treated as surplusage and rejected." Durham v. People, 4 Scam. (Ill.) 172, 39 Am. Dec. 407. In State v. Burt, 25 Vt. 373, upon a charge for assault "upon one Andrew Reafrew, then and there being, constable and collector for the town of Newberry aforesaid," it was held that "the allegations in regard to the character of the person assaulted are not necessary to be proved, being mere description of the person."

The case at bar comes clearly within the rule as laid down in the cases above cited. Describing the person abducted as an unmarried female is not different from writing after her name the word "spinster," which would simply be descriptive of the person, and would not go to any material element or fact of the crime. But, even if it could be held that the allegation that Lizzie Wright was an unmarried female should have been proven, it is the rule that allegations of this character are not required to be proven with the strictness insisted on as to allegations that are material and essential to the crime. 22 Cyc. 448; Murphy v. State, 28 Miss. 637. See, also, Mobley v. State, supra, where it is said that in such cases slight proof is sufficient. The evidence is that the true name of the girl is Lizzie Wright, and that she was at the time of the trial 16 years of age. The father's name was Edward Wright, and her mother's Barbara Wright, and that she had ever since her birth lived with her father and mother and in their care and custody. It is thus apparent that she still bore her maiden name, that she had always lived in the care and custody of her parents. These conditions are inconsistent with the fact that she had ever been married. Though it sometimes happens that a woman's name is not changed by marriage, it is the exception, and not the rule. She was constantly referred to both by the witnesses and by counsel for the defense as this child. There is absolutely no suggestion of evidence that she was a married woman. It is not at all clear that these circumstances are not sufficient to support the unnecessary descriptive averment that she was an unmarried female.

Some criticism is made of the ruling of the court sustaining an objection made by the district attorney to a question asked by a juror of the officer as follows: "When you met the girl along with the defendant, and you, knowing that the defendant was of bad reputation, wasn't it your duty to protect and take her home?" The objection was properly sustained. The officer was not on trial for dereliction of duty, and the question called for his opinion as well.

Under the heading of "Erroneous Instructions" counsel set forth an instruction given by the court, but fails to point out any error therein. We are unable to discover any fault in the instruction.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

VAN LOAN et al. v. GLAZE. (Civ. 692.)

(Court of Appeal, Second District, California. Nov. 13, 1909.)

1. Vendor and Purchaser (§ 3*)—Requisites of Contract—Distinguished from Contract of Agent.

Defendant executed a writing by which he agreed to sell to plaintiffs, or any one whom they might name, at any time before or including a certain date, the real estate described on the terms stated, and further agreed "to pay to the above named agents $1,000 as commission upon the above amount for their services" out of the first money received. Held, that the instrument merely authorizes plaintiff to sell the property for defendant as agent, and was not a contract to sell it to plaintiffs.

2. Vendor and Purchaser (§ 113*)—Performance.

A purchaser may refuse to take a less acreage of land than that which the vendor agreed to sell him, if the sale was made by the acre.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Vendor and Purchaser, Cent. Dig. § 201; Dec. Dig. § 113.*]

3. Vendor and Purchaser (§ 31*)—Requisites—Meeting of Minds.

If defendant offered his orchard, irrespective of its acreage, for a certain sum, and the prospective purchaser thought that he was to receive a certain number of acres, which was more than the orchard contained, the minds of the parties never met so as to constitute a binding contract.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Vendor and Purchaser, Cent. Dig. § 36; Dec. Dig. § 31.*]

4. Reformation of Instruments (§ 25*)—Defenses—Relief Ineffectual.

Where defendant agreed to sell his orchard as a whole to a purchaser procured by plaintiff, and not by the acre, in plaintiff's action for commissions, it would be idle to reform the contract by changing the description of the land therein by fractional sections, though it was incorrect, where the purchaser refused to take the land because of a shortage in the quantity.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Reformation of Instruments, Cent. Dig. § 85; Dec. Dig. § 25.*]

5. Trial (§ 397*)—Trial by Court—Findings—Failure to Find on Particular Issues.

Where defendant agreed to sell his orchard, as a whole, to a purchaser procured by plaintiff, and not by the acre, whether any mistake as to the number of acres therein was mutual did not affect plaintiff's right to recover commissions, so that the failure to find on that issue, in an action for commissions for procuring a purchaser, was not a mistrial.

Appeal from Superior Court, Tulare County; W. B. Wallace, Judge.

Action by R. A. Van Loan and another against J. M. Glaze. From a judgment for defendant and an order denying a motion for new trial, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Larkins & Feemster, for appellants. Power & McFadzean, for respondent.

TAGGART, J. Action to recover commissions for sale of real estate. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiffs appeal from judgment and order denying their motion for a new trial.

Defendant, who resided at San Jose, was the owner of an orange orchard in Tulare county. Plaintiffs, who were real estate agents doing business at Visalia in that county, having in mind a prospective purchaser for the orchard, procured from defendant the following writing: "May 28th, 1907. I agree to sell to R. A. Van Loan and R. L. Berry, or any one whom they may name at any time, and up to and including June 2nd, 1907, the following real estate: 28 acres in the northwest quarter of the northwest quarter of the southeast quarter of section twelve, township twenty south, range twenty-six east, M. D. B. & M., for the sum of $30,000.00, on the following terms, to wit: One-third cash on or before the 15th day of June, 1907, balance on or before the 1st day of January, 1908, with interest at the rate of 8 per cent. per annum. I also agree to pay to the above named agents $1,000.00 as commission upon the above amount for their services, out of the first money received, and further agree to furnish a clear title and abstract to above property as soon as required. This contract and all its provisions shall be irrevocable. J. M. Glaze."

On June 3d (June 2d being a holiday) C. H. Brampton, the purchaser mentioned, gave one of the plaintiffs a check for $50 as a deposit to bind the sale and to apply on the first payment on the property. On June 4th defendant was notified by telegraph: "Deal closed; but buyer prefers Jan. 1st, 1909, instead of Jan. 1st, 1908, as per your contract, as date of last payment. If satisfactory, deliver abstract of title to me at once. [Signed] R. A. Van Loan." Some further correspondence ensued. The change of time of payment was not agreed to by defendant, but the abstract was forwarded and the transaction was assumed by all parties to be in progress toward a transfer of the property, but no agreement to purchase was ever reduced to writing or signed by the purchaser. On June 11th defendant called at the office of Van Loan in Visalia, talked over the trade, learned that the continuation of the abstract was not completed, and prepared and mailed a deed of the property to San Jose for his wife to sign. The next day the abstract was handed to Brampton, who discovered that the orchard contained but 26.72 acres, instead of 28 acres, and declined to pay $30,000 for it, but made an offer for 26.72 acres at the rate per acre that it would have cost him if there had been 28 acres. Defendant refused to make this reduction or accept this offer, but, according to his own testimony (which is contradicted by Van Loan), he asked to see the purchaser, whom he had never met, that if possible an adjustment might be made, but Van Loan declined to bring them together, saying that he (defendant) was doing business with him (Van Loan) and had no right to see Brampton. This was on June 14th, and defendant left Visalia the day before the first payment was due and did not return.

There is apparently some confusion in the minds of appellants as to the relations between them and the defendant, growing out of the writing above mentioned. They assume to be the purchaser for some purposes, brokers for another, and Van Loan testified that he intended to sign a written contract with Brampton on behalf of defendant. But there seems to be no question that the instrument was intended to be an authorization of plaintiffs to sell the property for defendant for a commission of $1,000. No sale was ever made, because they sold Mr. Brampton 28 acres for $30,000, and he refused to take 26.72 acres as a compliance with this agreement, as he had a right to do. It is equally true that if the defendant offered his orchard as an entirety, regardless of its acreage, for the sum of $30,000, then his mind and that of Brampton never met, and defendant could not be compelled to carry out a contract which he never made.

Plaintiffs contend that defendant authorized them to sell 28 acres, and point to the writing in support of this. The court finds that while the defendant believed, and stated at the time the instrument was prepared, that the orchard contained 28 acres of land, "it was the intent and purpose of said plaintiffs and said defendant to describe in said contract and provide for the sale of said orchard of defendant without reference to the exact number of acres which it contained." There is evidence to sustain this finding. It appears that the exact description of the tract of land was unknown to either of the plaintiffs or the defendant at the time the writing was prepared. The description in it was obtained from a wall map in the office of Mr. Berry by the latter, according to the defendant, and by Berry and defendant, according to the plaintiffs. It was intended to serve the purpose of this preliminary contract, and was not assumed to be exact. The evidence of Berry, which is conceded to be true, discloses that the description was not correct even as to government fractional sections mentioned, and defendant testified that the orchard was generally known as containing 28 acres, and so known to plaintiffs. This, with other evidence as to the circumstances surrounding the preparation of the writing and the information of the parties as to the property, justified the trial court in concluding that the use of the figures 28 was as a means of identification of the particular orchard, rather than as a statement of warranty of the quantity to be sold.

The same inference answers plaintiffs' specifications of the insufficiency of the evidence to sustain the other findings attacked on this appeal. Sitting as a court of equity to reform the instrument, the superior court would have done an idle thing if it had decreed a reformation of the description in the contract by changing the designation of the fractions of the section. This was entirely immaterial after it was found that the orchard was to be sold as a whole and not by the quantity or upon a guarantee as to the area, and that the sale to Brampton failed because of a shortage in the acreage alone. It is immaterial whether this mistake was mutual or not, as it in no way affects the right of recovery of plaintiffs under the findings of the trial court in respect to the other questions. The failure to find upon this issue therefore was not a mistrial.

Judgment and order affirmed.

PEOPLE v. STOKES. (Cr. 185.)

(Court of Appeal, First District, California. Nov. 15, 1909.)

1. Criminal Law (§ 822*)—Instructions—Construction as a Whole.

In a prosecution for homicide, where the information charged the killing to have been willful and unlawful, the court instructed that if defendant, in a sudden quarrel or heat of passion, or in the commission of an unlawful act not amounting to a felony, killed decedent, as charged in the information, the jury should convict of manslaughter, and further instructed that homicide was excusable when committed by accident or misfortune in lawfully correcting a child, etc., or in doing any other lawful act by lawful means, with ordinary caution and without unlawful intent, and when committed by accident and misfortune in the heat of passion upon any sudden provocation, when no undue advantage is taken, nor any dangerous weapon is used, and if the jury believed beyond a reasonable doubt that accused unlawfully killed decedent in the commission of an unlawful act, not amounting to a felony, the killing was not excusable, and defendant should be found guilty as charged in the information. Held that, while the first sentence of the instruction did not fully state the circumstances excusing a homicide, it was sufficient when construed in connection with other charges.

Appeal from Superior Court, Monterey County; B. V. Sargent, Judge.

Alexander Stokes was convicted of manslaughter, and, from the judgment of conviction and an order denying a motion for a new trial, he appeals. Affirmed.

F. P. Feliz, for appellant. Attorney General Webb, for the People.

COOPER, P. J. Defendant was convicted of the crime of manslaughter, and sentenced to imprisonment in the state prison for a term of five years. This appeal is from the judgment and from the order denying the defendant's motion for a new trial.

The claim urged by defendant's counsel that the evidence is insufficient to support the verdict is without merit. While the evidence shows that the defendant and the deceased had prior to the homicide been friends, and had been drinking heavily during the evening and night on which the homicide occurred, and were both intoxicated, it further shows that the death was caused by the head of deceased striking the pavement or hard sidewalk as the result of a fall from a blow inflicted by defendant, and that the parties had been quarreling, and there is evidence to the effect that the deceased called defendant a name and struck or pushed him back; but considering the fact that the deceased was so intoxicated at the time that he could hardly stand, and that the question as to whether or not the blow inflicted by defendant was or was not in necessary self-defense was one peculiarly for the jury under all the evidence and circumstances of the case, we do not deem it our duty to interfere. The jury recommended defendant to the mercy of the court, and the recommendation appears to have been acted upon, as the sentence was for only one-half of the term that the court might have imposed upon him.

Counsel for appellant states that the most vital error committed by the court was the giving to the jury of the following instruction: "If you believe from the evidence beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant, upon a sudden quarrel or heat of passion, or in the commission of an unlawful act not amounting to a felony, killed the said Thomas C. Rowley as charged in the information, you should find the defendant guilty of the crime of manslaughter." The instruction refers to the killing as charged in the information; and the information charges the killing to have been willful and unlawful. It is true that the instruction standing alone does not fully state the circumstances under which a homicide is excusable, but it was immediately followed by other instructions which were as follows: "Homicide is excusable in the following cases: First. When committed by accident or misfortune in lawfully correcting a child or servant, or in doing any other lawful act by lawful means with the usual and ordinary caution and without any unlawful intent. Second. When committed by accident and misfortune in the heat of passion upon any sudden and sufficient provocation, or upon a sudden combat when no undue advantage is taken nor any dangerous weapon used, and when the killing is not done in a cruel or unusual manner. But if you believe from the evidence beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant unlawfully killed Thomas C. Rowley in the commission of an unlawful act, not amounting to a felony, then the homicide is not excusable, and you should find the defendant guilty as charged in the information." It is sufficient to say that the instruction complained of, when coupled with the instructions immediately following, correctly states the law.

There was no error in refusing to give instructions numbered 2 and 23, which were requested by defendant. In so far as they were material, they were substantially given elsewhere. We must consider the instructions as a whole; and if, when so considered, they fairly state the law as applied to the facts of the case, and as applied to any plausible claim made by defendant based upon the evidence, we cannot interfere. The defendant appears to have had a fair and impartial trial, and we find no error that would justify a reversal.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

1. PARTNERSHIP (§ 47*)—EXISTENCE OF RELATION—EVIDENCE.

Civ. 2. PARTNERSHIP (§ 53*)—EXISTENCE OF RELATION—EVIDENCE.

On an issue as to whether defendant and plaintiff were partners in the construction and operation of a boat, defendant testified that he and plaintiff worked together on the building of the boat, that the money that paid for it came from plaintiff's mother, who said she would advance it "as the boys were going in together," that the parties lived together and were supported by the proceeds of the boat, that defendant was not paid any wages, and that the operating expenses were paid from the revenues of the boat. Held to show the existence of a partnership in the construction and operation of the boat.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sonoma County; Thos. C. Denny, Judge.

Action by G. F. Niroad against F. F. Farnell and others. From a judgment in favor of defendants, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

T. J. Butts, for appellant. W. F. Cowan and W. E. McConnell, for respondents.

BURNETT, J. This is an action in claim and delivery to obtain the possession of a certain gasoline boat used for conveying passengers on Russian river between Russian River Landing and Monte Rio in Sonoma county, and the complaint is in the usual form. The answer denies the ownership of plaintiff or his right to the possession of the property, and alleges ownership in defendant Farnell and sets up as a separate defense that said defendant has a lien upon the property by virtue of services performed and materials furnished for said launch with the knowledge and consent of plaintiff. There is also an averment that, by reason of an execution issued upon a judgment in favor of one Hoag against said defendant, the sheriff of Sonoma county had levied upon and taken possession of the property; but this feature may be dismissed from further consideration, as the court found that "before the commencement of this action said process lapsed and expired and said defendant John K. Smith (the sheriff) and William Loftus (the deputy) at the time of the commencement of this action did not have possession of said property," and besides, admittedly, the process could reach only whatever interest that defendant Farnell might have in the boat.

The decisive question in the cause is involved in the findings of the court that the plaintiff was not the owner of the property, and "that about the month of April, 1905, plaintiff and defendant F. F. Farnell, as copartners, and not otherwise, purchased and constructed said boat and thereafter as such copartners operated the same for hire until about the month of April, 1906, when plaintiff left said Sonoma county, refused to contribute further to said copartnership or assist in care or management of said business thereof, and declined to be further responsible for any of the obligations thereof, and thereafter said last-named defendant continued to care for said boat and expended large sums in the repair and care thereof and operated said boat under his own management and has not been remunerated therefor by plaintiff, and that the said F. F. Farnell, with the knowledge and consent of plaintiff, agreed to pay and discharge the obligations due Mrs. Niroad for the sum of $517 moneys advanced by her to said copartnership for the purchase of the engine in said boat, on the understanding and agreement that said plaintiff had ceased to contribute to other obligations of said copartnership." In fact, the finding that there was a partnership, if there is sufficient evidence to support it, is all that need be considered, since in that event the plaintiff could not recover in an action of claim and delivery, as the defendant would have an equal right to the possession. This proposition is not disputed, but it is claimed that the evidence is insufficient to justify said finding. It may be remarked that no specific allegation of partnership is made in the answer, but no point is made as to this, and it is assumed that the proof is within the general issue. We think the court's conclusion as to the partnership is amply supported. A "partnership," as defined by section 2395 of the Civil Code, is "the association of two or more persons for the purpose of carrying on business together and dividing the profits between them." This necessarily implies that it must be with the consent of the parties, but we have in section 2397, Civ. Code, the legislative declaration that "a partnership can be formed only by the consent of all the parties thereto, and therefore no new partner can be admitted into a partnership without the consent of every existing member thereof."

It is evident, though, that this voluntary association may be shown without proving an express agreement to form a partnership, The court may well base its finding upon a rational consideration of the acts and declarations of the parties. In the case at bar, giving full credit to the testimony favorable to respondent, as we are required to do, the inference is fair and reasonable that a partnership existed in the boat and the business incident thereto. Although there are other testimony and circumstances lending aid to the court's conclusion, the following quotation from Farnell's testimony ought to set the matter at rest: "I came with my wife to Monte Rio in April, 1905, and lived with her mother and plaintiff. Niroad started to build the boat two weeks afterwards. Niroad and I worked together all the time. The money that paid for this boat came from Mrs. Niroad, plaintiff's mother. She said she would advance the money for the engine as the 'boys,' as she called it, were going in together. We all lived together as one family and were supported by the proceeds of the boat. I was not paid wages. Niroad left in April, 1906, and didn't come back till July, 1907. During all his absence I cared for the boat.

I expended $120 in 1906 and $75 in 1907 for repairs. In December, 1905, or January, 1906, he offered to sell his interest in the boat to me for $225. The operating expenses were paid from the revenue of the boat. The lumber, driving gear, countershaft, friction gear, and engine tools were paid out of the earnings of the boat. After these were paid the earnings for the first year were divided between plaintiff and myself, after taking out house fund of $1 per day. Before we started to build the boat, Niroad proposed that we build one and put it on the river, and we could make some money, and I said, 'All right.' Mrs. Niroad said she would advance the money. Niroad never offered to pay me for the care of the boat or the moneys I expended in repairing it." The foregoing carries with it the necessary inference that the parties understood they were partners, acted entirely as such, and, indeed, that they expressly agreed to build and operate the boat together.

The other portion of the finding which we have set out also finds support in the evidence, but the establishment of the partnership is controlling and renders unnecessary any further consideration of the evidence.

The argument of appellant and the authorities cited have received our careful attention, but they have not disturbed our confidence in the soundness of respondent's position.

We find no prejudicial error in the record, and the judgment is affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Mendocino County; J. Q. White, Judge.

Action by M. A. Thomas, executor of Anna H. Slingerland, against Russell W. Lamb. From an order and a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

J. E. Pemberton and Robert Duncan, for appellant. Mannon & Mannon, for respondent.

BURNETT, J. Upon the undisputed facts the judgment of the trial court seems so equitable that it should not be disturbed unless clearly required by the mandate of the law.

The statement of the case, sufficient for the purpose of the decision, is made by respondent substantially as follows: The defendant and Anna H. Slingerland, who was his sister, lived in the same house on the ranch of the latter. She had a safe in which there was a sum of money. On the 24th day of October, 1906, a short time before her death—which occurred November 10th following—Mrs. Slingerland gave to the defendant the key to the safe and told him there was money in the safe, and, when she was gone, she wanted him to take it and pay her doctor's bill and funeral expenses, buy a monument for her grave at a cost of $75, and whatever was left to send to her sister, Jane Donaldson; that at the same time she told him the safe was his. Defendant said to Mrs. Slingerland that he would carry out her wishes in the matter. The morning after the funeral defendant opened the safe and found therein the sum of $442. Out of this money he paid $152 for funeral expenses, $117.50 for the doctor's bill, he purchased a monument for which the agreed to pay $65 and sent the sister, Jane Donaldson, the sum of $160, aggregating about $53 more than he received.

The other transaction of which complaint is made relates to certain hogs sold by defendant. He and the deceased had been partners in the stock business, and about August 1, 1906, they sold some hogs for $225. Deceased proposed to defendant that, if he would allow her $125 of this amount he might have the balance of the money and what hogs were left. The proposition was accepted by defendant. Subsequently he got up six or seven head of wild hogs having the Slingerland ranch mark. He fed them, and finally sold them for about $60.

The only witness at the trial was defendant, who related what occurred between him and deceased on the night of the 24th of October, 1906. We deem it advisable to state his exact language as follows: "Mrs. Slingerland said to me, 'The key of the safe is between the carpet and the wheel,' and she says, 'Get it for me.' I went and got the key, and handed it to her. She took the old key in her right hand. 'Now,' she says, 'Russ, there is nothing to administrate on when I pass away, or am gone,' words to that effect. 'You open that safe, and you will find money enough to pay my funeral expenses and my doctor's bills, and $75 for a little monument like that put at Henry's grave, and, if there is any left, whatever is left send my sister Jane.' * * * I said to her, 'I will as long as you wish it, I will attend to that for you.' She then handed me the safe key which I have to the present time." From the foregoing testimony we think the court was justified in holding that a trust was created in said money for the purposes clearly set forth in said conversation. The "relation of personal confidence" with Mrs. Slingerland was voluntarily assumed by defendant, and he therefore became her trustee. Section 2219, Civ. Code. There is no possible doubt that a contract could have been lawfully made between the parties for the desired purpose and hence it could be the subject of a valid trust. Section 2220, Civ. Code.

By her words and acts the trustor indicated with reasonable certainty her intention to create a trust and the subject, purpose, and beneficiary of the trust, and it follows that a trust was created as to the trustor. Section 2221, Civ. Code. There is no dispute that a trust as to personal property can be created by parol, but it is contended by appellant that a mere agency was created which terminated on the death of the principal, that the defendant "is trying to carry out without probate the provisions of a simple attempted nuncupative will which was absolutely void," and that respondent's theory of the transaction cannot be maintained for the additional reason that there was no actual delivery of the money, as respondent testified that he did not take manual possession of it until after the death of his said sister.

There is no controversy, and can be none, as to the intention of Mrs. Slingerland that respondent should dispose of the funds as he has done and therefore this vital question of what was intended—often embarrassing in kindred cases—is entirely eliminated. Indeed, the whole contention of appellant rests upon the assumption that the complete title to the money remained in Mrs. Slingerland until the time of her death. This, in our opinion, is born of a misconception of the trust transaction. The only reasonable construction of what was done and said is that she surrendered to respondent complete control and dominion over the property. If she had taken the money from the safe and delivered it to him with similar instructions, her act and declaration would have had no greater significance. She gave the safe to respondent, handed him the key, told him to dispose of the money after her death according to her directions, and he accepted the trust. It is difficult to understand how the transaction would have a different coloring if she had actually handed him the money, or if he had taken it from the safe before her death. He certainly had the means of securing it but there was no reason why he should not leave it in this safe place until the occasion should arise for the disposition of it, which the evidence showed was near. Suppose she had said to defendant, "There is some money in the safe which I intrust to you. Here is the key. After my death, pay the doctor's bill, my funeral expenses, erect a $75 monument over my grave, and send the balance to our sister Jane," and he had agreed to do so—would any one contend that a valid trust was not created or that it would make a particle of difference whether he actually took possession of the money prior to her death? The fact is that in case of such a trust, where the intention is clear that the trustee shall have present dominion over the property for the purposes of the trust, it is immaterial whether he take immediate possession of the property or not. The distinction as to the element of delivery between the creation of a trust in relation to personal property and a gift of the same has probably not been given due weight by appellant and has led to a misconstruction of some of the decisions. The cases cited, we think, in view of the peculiar facts and circumstances involved, are generally harmonious.

In Bedell v. Scoggins et al., 107 Cal. xvii, 40 Pac. 954, as stated in the syllabus: "Defendant gave deceased a note for money which he owed her, by which he promised to pay $400 for her funeral expenses or to return it to her on demand. During her last illness deceased handed the note to defendant, saying, 'Here is something for you.' Held that an express trust, to expend the money, after her death, for her funeral expenses, was created." The case is criticised by appellant, but it has not been overruled, and, as far as it declares the creation of a trust, it simply gives effect to the intention of the parties, and does not contravene any principle of law. In Hellman v. McWilliams, 70 Cal. 449, 11 Pac. 659, it appears that "in September, 1879, there was due to Eli W. Hawkins from the Odd Fellows' Savings Bank the sum of $14,334.73, in evidence of which Hawkins held a passbook of said bank, issued to him by the latter, showing said amount to be due. The bank was in process of liquidation. On the 8th day of September, 1879, said Hawkins requested plaintiff to allow him, the said Hawkins, to assign to plaintiff the whole amount due from the bank, to be held by plaintiff in trust for the use and benefit of the minor children of Hawkins, reserving to himself, however, the right to draw such sums of said money from the trustee as he might deem proper for his own use. Plaintiff agreed to accept the trust, and Hawkins verbally assigned to him all of said moneys to be held by him in trust as aforesaid. Hawkins delivered his passbook to plaintiff, who has since retained it." Prior to his death Hawkins drew out at divers times various sums, leaving a balance in the hands of plaintiff and also in the Odd Fellows' Bank which the court below found to be trust funds. The judgment was affirmed by the Supreme Court, and in the course of the discussion it is said: "The subject of the trust was personal property, and it was not necessary that the transfer should be in writing. Referring to the testimony, we find there was evidence tending clearly to show the intention on the part of Hawkins to create a trust in favor of his minor children, that the subject of such trust was clearly defined, and its purpose made manifest."

In Booth v. Oakland Bank of Savings, 122 Cal. 19, 54 Pac. 370, it is held that "a trust for the benefit of two sisters of the depositor of money in a savings bank, in the residue remaining at her death, is sufficiently proved by evidence showing that in her lifetime the deposit was changed by the bank, upon her order, so as to make it payable to the individual order of either of her sisters or of herself, for the purpose orally declared to the bank of arranging the deposit so that her sisters could draw it at her death, and have the immediate benefit of it without probate of her estate, and by her addressing them a letter stating what she had done, and that upon her death they could draw the money and divide it equally between them, and directing them where they could obtain the bank book." It is said by the court: "The evidence falls far short of establishing a completed gift from Mrs. Bell to the plaintiffs; and, although there are features in the case resembling a gift causa mortis, there are other features which distinguish it from such a gift, but these need not be discussed as there was evidence offered on behalf of the plaintiffs to show that Mrs. Bell proposed to create a trust for the benefit of the plaintiffs, and that the trust was accepted by the bank. It is well settled that a trust in personal property need not be in writing, and it is equally well settled that no set form of words are necessary to create a trust." In the late case of Cahlan et al. v. Bank of Lassen County, 105 Pac. 765, this court had occasion to re-examine the question of trusts in personal property and many of the decisions were reviewed, and the doctrine reaffirmed that "any words which indicate with sufficient certainty an intention or purpose to create a trust in personal property will be effective in so doing, without the use of the word trust or trustee."

The California cases cited by appellant are very easily distinguishable from the case at bar. In Flanagan v. Brown, 70 Cal. 254, 11 Pac. 706, the question discussed was whether the admitted agency was coupled with an interest and therefore irrevocable. In Daniel v. Smith, 75 Cal. 548, 17 Pac. 683, Hart v. Ketchum, 121 Cal. 426, 53 Pac. 931, Knight v. Tripp, 121 Cal. 674, 54 Pac. 267, Collins v. Maud, 144 Cal. 289, 77 Pac. 945, and Beebe v. Coffin, 153 Cal. 174, 94 Pac. 766, it was decided that delivery is necessary to constitute a complete gift. In Pullen v. Placer County Bank, 138 Cal. 169, 66 Pac. 740, 71 Pac. 83, 94 Am. St. Rep. 19, it was held that a check delivered by the maker to the payee, but not presented to the bank for payment until after the death of said maker, neither amounted to a gift nor an assignment. In De Martini v. Alegretti, 146 Cal. 214, 79 Pac. 871, the decision depended upon the construction of a written instrument reciting that a sum of money had been placed in the hands of two persons to keep, care for, and invest the same for him in case of the death of the party executing it and providing for the disposition thereof by them in certain sums to persons named or the survivors of them after his death. It was held that it vested no present interest in such persons, but was testamentary in its character, and was void because not executed according to the statute of wills. It was said by the court: "The instrument from beginning to end is on its face clearly and entirely testamentary in character." There can be no doubt that by the instrument in question there was an attempt made to effect a disposition of the property after death, and therefore the intention could not legally be carried into effect in opposition to the plain requirement of the statute in reference to the execution of such instruments. But here we think a fair interpretation of the transaction leads to the conclusion that a trust was created with a present interest transferred to the trustee with direction to carry out the terms of the trust after the death of the testator. If the question were doubtful, it should be resolved in favor of respondent in view of his expenditure in good faith of the funds according to the declared will of deceased.

As far as the hogs are concerned, the court was justified in finding that they were sold by deceased to respondent and nothing of unfairness appears in respondent's conduct in relation thereto.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

Action by Norbert Guillon and another against George W. McNear. From a judgment for plaintiffs and from an order denying a new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

KERRIGAN, J. This is an action for breach of contract, based on the failure of the defendant to furnish cargo to a vessel belonging to the plaintiffs, called the "Jane Guillon," in 15 weather days after the discharge of the inward cargo and notice of readiness served on defendant. The appeal is by the defendant from a judgment in favor of plaintiffs and from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

Plaintiffs allege that the defendant detained and held the vessel in demurrage beyond her lay days for a period of 16 days, and that at the rate per day specified in the charter party the plaintiffs were entitled to a named sum. The defendant admits that the vessel was delayed 16 days, but averred in his answer and claims that in due time he had purchased a full cargo of barley for loading upon said vessel, but that the great demand for railroad cars and railroad service in California in the year 1906 made it impossible to bring the barley to the port of loading at the time specified in the charter, nor until 16 days later. There is a provision in the charter to the effect, stating it broadly, that, if the cause of the delay in giving the ship her cargo is a matter over which the charterer has no control, he shall not be liable for such delay; and the defendant claims that the facts of this case bring it within that provision.

The court, in part, found as follows: "That the defendant did not have on hand in warehouse or elsewhere prior to the arrival of the said vessel at the port of San Francisco, or at any time, a full or any cargo of barley intended for loading upon the said ship in fulfillment of the said charter party or at all. That the defendant did not become, and was not, unable, by reason of any blockade, impediment, or hindrance of railroad or other transportation service, to procure all or any of any intended cargo, for loading upon the said vessel, to be brought by rail or craft or otherwise to the port of loading before the 31st day of December, 1906, or at all, that the defendant was not prevented and was not unable to deliver the same to the said vessel by reason of any matter set forth in said answer."

Defendant introduced evidence showing that he had made 33 contracts for the purchase of 25,000 tons of grain, which was to be according to a certain sample, and which was to be delivered at Port Costa from points in the interior at some time in the future. There is nothing in the record to show whether the different lots of grain were to be delivered in time to be loaded on this vessel according to its charter, nor indeed when deliveries were to be made. But granting, for the sake of argument, that the defendant was the owner of the 25,000 tons of grain, and passing the fact that 22,000 tons thereof were brought to Port Costa and loaded on other vessels, the record does not sustain the contention of defendant that it was impossible to get the grain on time to the port of loading. It is true that defendant introduced evidence to show that he made every reasonable effort to get the Southern Pacific Railway Company to furnish the necessary cars and facilities for that purpose, but there was absolutely no evidence produced to show where in the interior the different lots of grain were located, or that they could not be shipped by transportation companies other than the railroad company mentioned. It is unnecessary to give the testimony in detail. To sum up the case briefly, it is sufficient to say that it entirely fails to sustain the affirmative defense.

PEOPLE v. CYTY. (Cr. 134.)

(Court of Appeal, Second District, California Nov. 12, 1909.)

1. HOMICIDE (§ 342*)—HARMLESS ERROR.

As the offense of manslaughter is necessarily included in the charge of murder, a conviction of manslaughter acquits of the charge of murder, and defendant cannot complain because the verdict is more favorable to him than the evidence warrants.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homicide, Cent. Dig. § 722; Dec. Dig. § 342.*]

2. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1169*)—RECEPTION OF EVIDENCE—STRIKING OUT—EFFECT.

In a prosecution for murder, a witness for the prosecution was asked upon direct examination whether he took certain tools found near defendant, and, on replying that he did not, was asked why he did not, to which he replied: "I was not ready to die." This answer was on defendant's motion stricken out. Held, that the error was cured.

3. Witnesses (§ 383*)—Impeachment—Contradictory Statements—Materiality.

In a prosecution for murder, after the dying declarations of deceased had been admitted, defendant sought to show on cross-examination of a witness that, when witness saw deceased after the shooting, the latter was delirious. On answering that it did not appear so to him, an attempt was made to lay the foundation to impeach by showing that witness had made contradictory statements to other persons. It did not appear that the time referred to in these questions was the time at which the dying declaration was made to another witness, who testified without contradiction that he was alone with deceased at the time the statement was made. Held, that the evidence sought to be impeached was immaterial.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Witnesses, Cent. Dig. § 1224; Dec. Dig. § 383.*]

4. Homicide (§ 338*)—Harmless Error—Reception of Evidence.

In a prosecution for murder, refusal to strike out testimony was not prejudicial, where it bore on the relation between defendant and deceased, and tended to sustain the view that defendant intended merely to protect himself and his rights rather than to provoke trouble with deceased.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homicide, Cent. Dig. § 709; Dec. Dig. § 338.*]

5. Homicide (§ 214*)—Dying Declarations—Subject-Matter.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1870, providing for the admission in evidence of the act or declaration of a dying person, made in the sense of impending death, respecting the cause of his death, the evidence so admitted should be restricted to the act of killing, and to the circumstances immediately attending it and forming a part of the res gestæ, and this embraces, not only the actual facts of the assault and the circumstances surrounding it, but the matters immediately antecedent to and having a direct causal connection with the assault, as well as acts immediately following the assault, and so closely connected with it as to form a part of the occurrence.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homicide, Cent. Dig. §§ 448–450; Dec. Dig. § 214.*]

6. Homicide (§ 214*)—Dying Declarations—Suspicions of Deceased.

Statements of deceased in his dying declaration as to his expectation of trouble with defendant are not admissible.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homicide, Cent. Dig. § 449; Dec. Dig. § 214.*]

7. Homicide (§ 325*)—Appeal—Objections in Lower Court—Evidence.

On appeal from a conviction of manslaughter, defendant cannot complain of evidence of dying declarations, where no objection was made.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homicide, Cent. Dig. § 693; Dec. Dig. § 325.*]

8. Homicide (§ 338*)—Appeal—Harmless Error—Evidence—Facts Otherwise Established.

In a prosecution for homicide, error in admitting evidence as to a dying declaration was not prejudicial, where the matter was before the jury, irrespective of the ruling of the court on the objection presented.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homicide, Cent. Dig. § 711; Dec. Dig. § 338.*]

9. Witnesses (§ 269*)—Cross-Examination—Scope.

In a prosecution for murder, the court properly refused to permit cross-examination of a witness as to blood stains on the handles of a pick and shovel, where the direct examination did not refer to such matter.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Witnesses, Cent. Dig. §§ 949, 950; Dec. Dig. § 269.*]

10. Homicide (§ 234*)—Weight of Evidence.

In a prosecution for homicide, the jury is not bound to accept as an entirety either the dying statement of deceased or the statement of defendant, but should consider all the evidence.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homicide, Cent. Dig. §§ 470, 482; Dec. Dig. § 234.*]

11. Homicide (§ 300*)—Instructions—Self-Defense.

An instruction as to the obligation of a person assailed to consider the question of retreat "while on his own property where he had a right to be" did not cover a requested instruction that where one without fault is placed under circumstances sufficient to excite the fears of a reasonable person that another designs to commit a felony, or great bodily injury upon him, and to afford grounds for a reasonable belief that there is imminent danger, he may slay his assailant, and, where the attack is sudden and the danger imminent, he may stand his ground and slay his aggressor, even though he might more easily have gained safety by flight.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homicide, Cent. Dig. §§ 616, 617; Dec. Dig. § 300.*]

12. Homicide (§ 300*)—Instructions—Self-Defense.

In a prosecution for homicide, where the court instructed as to self-defense that it must appear to accused as a reasonable man "that, to avoid such danger, it was absolutely necessary for him to take the life of the deceased," a further requested instruction should have been given that, if defendant were without fault and the suddenness of the attack put him to the wall, the absolute necessity had arisen.

Appeal from Superior Court, Inyo County; John L. Childs, Judge.

John Cyty was convicted of manslaughter, and he appeals. Reversed.

P. W. Forbes and Wm. J. Clark, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and George Beebe, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

TAGGART, J. Appellant was informed against for the crime of murder, found guilty of manslaughter, and sentenced to imprisonment in the state prison for 10 years.

It is contended in support of this appeal from the judgment and the order denying defendant a new trial that the evidence does not sustain the verdict, because the facts either establish murder or exonerate the defendant from the commission of any offense whatever; that the court erred in its rulings upon the admission and rejection of certain evidence specified; and that it also erred in giving certain instructions defining and relating to manslaughter and in relation to what acts upon the part of an assailant justify the taking of his life; also, that the court erred in refusing to give an instruction, requested by defendant, which declared the law relating to the right of a person assailed to stand his ground instead of retreating to avoid a conflict.

Appellant and the deceased, C. Kyle Smith, were miners and prospectors in Inyo county, between whom there had been disputes as to their respective rights in the mining claim upon which the defendant was working at the time of the killing, and as to the right of possession of certain miners' tools and appliances which defendant was using when he shot Smith. Smith was shot about 3 p. m. on November 21, 1908, and died at 9:30 o'clock the same night. Only Smith and defendant were present at the time of the shooting, but before Smith died he had a conversation with one Grant, who testified upon the trial to what Smith told him, and this was admitted as a dying declaration. In this statement the deceased said that "the Dago" (meaning defendant) shot him unexpectedly as he was going down the trail; that he was hit first in the back on the right hip. When told that he had hit defendant, he said he knew it, that he (Smith) was on the ground when he hit him, and that defendant ran when he was hit. This statement was supported by the testimony of the physician who made a post mortem examination of the body of deceased. The physician testified that he had found a bullet wound on the back of the right hip, and also one in the back of one of deceased's thighs. In both instances the bullet passed upward and toward the front in its course; the former passing through the abdominal cavity. This corroborated the theory of the prosecution that Smith was traveling along a trail above the defendant when he was shot; it being the theory of the people that defendant lay in wait for the deceased in a cut or excavation below where he would pass along the trail.

The defendant testified upon his own behalf to the effect that he located the mine upon which he was working in May or June, 1904, that it bore no evidence of having been previously located, and that Smith posted notices and began work on the claim in 1906. On the morning of the tragedy defendant went to work in a cut on the claim, drilling, blasting and shoveling. A trail crossed above the face of the cut six, seven, or eight, or probably ten feet higher. The first he knew of Smith's presence that morning the latter, who was on the trail four or five steps away, spoke, saying, "What are you doing here?" and something else which defendant couldn't remember. "At that time he was on top, right on the cut where I throw the tools on that trail. I was right in the face of the cut." When defendant turned around toward him, he (Smith) "is yanking gun and pointing to me." Defendant made for the east wall of the cut to climb out, when he was shot in the arm. Then he ran lengthwise of the cut to the dump (the cut was into the hillside), tumbled and fell on the dump, when Smith shot again, this time striking the defendant in the abdomen. While starting to run defendant tried to pull a magazine pistol which he carried in his pocket, but, owing to his disabled arm, had some difficulty in doing so, and when successful in this was still further delayed by the "safety," but finally succeeded in shooting, and (as described by him): "Then I begin to shoot. When I begin to shoot, the ground gave out under my feet and I fall again, I begin falling on this side and I throw myself on this because this arm was sore. When I fall, my gun fall off my hand. Of course, I had been shooting and falling my gun get away from me. Of course, I tried to catch myself, throw myself on this side like this, and the ground give out. I pick myself up and go get that gun back again. I never see Smith no more, never see him since." He further testified: "I did not know at the time I had hit him. I hurried to camp because I thought I was worse hurt than I was." The physician who dressed the defendant's wounds testified that there was a wound in the arm which was made by a bullet entering at the back and coming out at the front; also, that there was a crease across the defendant's abdomen, an abrasion of the skin.

We do not find the record entirely destitute of evidence upon which a verdict of manslaughter could be predicated, but, in the consideration of the objection that the evidence shows either that the crime of murder has been committed or that the defendant is innocent, we may, for that purpose, assume that there is some evidence tending to establish that the defendant is guilty of murder. As the offense of manslaughter is necessarily included in the charge of murder, and a conviction of the crime of manslaughter is equivalent to a verdict of not guilty of the murder (People v. Muhlner, 115 Cal. 303, 47 Pac. 128), the defendant cannot complain because the verdict is more favorable to him than the evidence warrants (People v. Coulter, 145 Cal. 66, 78 Pac. 348). Even though the verdict for the lesser offense be contrary to the instructions of the court, and for a less offense than the evidence proves—provided it be for an offense included in the charge in the information—it must be carried out, and a new trial cannot be ordered for such a reason alone. People v. Muhlner, supra, 115 Cal. 306, 47 Pac. 128, and cases cited.

One of the witnesses for the people was asked on direct examination if he took the tools which were found near where defendant was working when the trouble began, and replied that he did not. Whereupon, over the objection of defendant, the prosecuting attorney was permitted to ask him, "Why didn't you?" and to which he replied, "I wasn't ready to die." This answer was upon defendant's motion stricken out, but it is contended that this did not cure the error, and that the answer was one expected by the counsel for the people, and was elicited for the purpose of creating the impression in the minds of the jurors that the defendant was a violent and dangerous person. We find nothing in the record to justify such an inference. The circumstances are entirely unlike those in People v. Rodriguez, 134 Cal. 142, 66 Pac. 174.

After the dying declaration of the deceased had been admitted in evidence, defendant sought to show on the cross-examination of one Kelly, a witness for the people, that, when Kelly saw Smith after the shooting, the latter was delirious. Upon Kelly testifying that it did not appear so to him, an attempt was made to lay the foundation to impeach Kelly by showing that he had made contradictory statements to other persons. The court sustained an objection to this, and the ruling is assigned as error. It does not appear in any way from the evidence, or from any offer of proof made, that the time referred to in these questions propounded to Kelly was the time at which the dying declaration was made to Grant. The latter testified without contradiction that he was alone with Smith at the time the statement was made, and we are unable to see the materiality of the evidence of Kelly which it was sought to impeach.

Rulings of the court assigned as errors Nos. 3 to 7, and 9 to 14, inclusive, relate to the asking of questions by the prosecution, some of which were proper, and others which, if material at all, were not prejudicial. The refusal to grant defendant's motion to strike out certain testimony, assigned as error No. 8, was not prejudicial to the defendant. The answer desired stricken out bore upon the relations between the defendant and the deceased, and in so far as it affected the matter as to which it was material, if it were material at all, tended rather to sustain the view that the defendant intended merely to protect himself and his rights than to provoke trouble with the deceased.

Among the matters testified to in connection with the dying declaration was the following: The witness Grant was asked the question by the prosecuting attorney: "Did he [Smith] make any statement to you concerning his expectation of trouble?" This was objected to as calling for a self-serving declaration, and on the grounds that it was immaterial and irrelevant, not made in the presence of the defendant, and hearsay. The question was then withdrawn and the following propounded: "Q. Did he make any statement to you concerning whether he expected anything of that kind?" The same objections were interposed and overruled and an exception preserved by the defendant, and the witness answered: "He did." The witness was next asked: "What was that statement and in what connection was it made?" To this he replied: "He told me he didn't expect any trouble over the ground at all." No objection to this question was interposed, or motion to strike out the answer made, but when the next question was asked, to wit, "Did he make any statement to you as to how many times the defendant shot?" and this question answered, "Yes, sir," defendant asked to have the latter answer stricken out that he might interpose an objection, which motion was granted, and thereupon the objections which were made to the last question were overruled. Section 1870, Code Civ. Proc., which is the statutory provision as to dying declarations in this state, enumerates among the facts as to which evidence may be given upon a trial: "In criminal actions, the act or declaration of a dying person, made under a sense of impending death, respecting the cause of his death." The evidence to be so admitted has been construed to be restricted to the act of the killing, and to the circumstances immediately attending it and forming a part of the res gestæ. People v. Fong Ah Sing, 64 Cal. 253, 28 Pac. 233.

While it is well settled that the res gestæ embraces, not only the actual facts of the assault and the circumstances surrounding it, but the matters immediately antecedent to and having a direct causal connection with the assault, as well as acts immediately following the assault and so closely connected with it as to form a part of the occurrence (People v. Cipolla [Sup.] 100 Pac. 252), certainly it was never intended to embrace the recitals of past events or suspicions of the deceased, nor his expectations of trouble with the defendant. Accepting the rule as declared, and conceding that it was error to permit the introduction of evidence of the character here under consideration, the question which elicited the answer as to the expectations of the deceased was not objected to, and no motion made to strike the answer out. The question which was objected to was a mere preliminary one. In addition to this, the matter objected to was practically covered by a previous answer of the same witness to the effect that Smith had told him that the defendant had shot him unexpectedly. This testimony was not objected to and the matter was before the jury, irrespective of the ruling of the court upon the objection presented, and the ruling in this respect cannot be said to have been prejudicial to the defendant.

The assignments of error numbered 17 to 20 relate to the refusal of the court to permit the defendant to further cross-examine the witness Grant as to certain blood stains upon the handles of a pick and shovel which the cross-examination disclosed the witness had seen on the morning after the trouble at the scene of the tragedy. The questions were not addressed to any matters as to which the witness had testified in his direct examination, and the rulings of the court were correct. The matter might have been made a part of defendant's case, but was not cross-examination of this witness.

The instructions of the court defining manslaughter were properly given. The jury were not bound to accept as an entirety either the statement of the deceased or that of the defendant, but it was their duty to endeavor, from a consideration of all the evidence, to arrive at the true conditions of the shooting. Without reciting the testimony showing the relations of the defendant and deceased from which the inference might be drawn that a quarrel arose in which either might have been the aggressor, we need only say in justification of these instructions that there was evidence upon which a verdict of manslaughter could have been predicated.

The giving of instructions Nos. 4 and 6 at the request of the people is assigned as error. The part of No. 4 material to the question before us reads: "The law of self-defense is founded on necessity, and, in order to justify the taking of life upon this ground, it must not only appear to the slayer, as a reasonable man, that he had reason to believe, and did believe, that he was in imminent danger of his life, or of receiving great bodily harm, but it must also appear to his comprehension, as a reasonable man, that to avoid such danger it was absolutely necessary for him to take the life of the deceased." No. 6 is substantially the same as instruction 4 considered and approved in People v. Bruggy, 93 Cal. 478, 29 Pac. 27, with this difference: The words supplied by the court by construction in the Bruggy Case expressly appear in the instruction before us. Appellant contends that by the use of the words "absolutely necessary" in both of the instructions mentioned (4 and 6) the jury was impliedly instructed that the person assailed was forbidden to stand his ground if he could have found safety in flight, and that this is in contravention of the rule relative to retreat declared in People v. Maughs, 149 Cal. 253, 260, 86 Pac. 187.

Since the questions of law involved are practically the same, we may in this connection also consider the refusal of the court to give instruction No. 26, requested by the defendant. This instruction reads as follows: "Where one without fault is placed under circumstances sufficient to excite the fears of a reasonable person that another designs to commit a felony, or some great bodily injury upon him, and to afford grounds for reasonable belief that there is imminent danger of the accomplishment of this design, he may, acting under these fears alone, slay his assailant, and be justified by the appearances; and, where the attack is sudden and the danger imminent, he may stand his ground and slay his aggressor, even though it may be proved that he might more easily have gained his safety by flight." The Attorney General finds no fault with this instruction as a declaration of the law, but contends that everything contained therein material to the defendant's case was embodied in instruction 27, given by the court. With this contention we cannot agree. Instruction 27 declares the law relative to the obligation of the person assailed to consider the question of retreat "while on his own property where he had a right to be," but No. 26 is not so limited.

If, in order to justify the taking of life in self-defense, it must appear to the person assailed, as a reasonable man, that it is absolutely necessary for him to take the life of his assailant to avoid losing his own life, or receiving great bodily harm, and the rule declared in No. 26, that "he may stand his ground and slay his aggressor, even though it may be proved that he might more easily have gained his safety by flight," is also the law, then the latter should be given in every case in which the facts require it in modification or explanation of the rule of "absolute necessity" stated in Nos. 4 and 6. Instruction No. 26 is apparently taken from People v. Hecker, 109 Cal. 451, 467, 42 Pac. 307, 312, 30 L. R. A. 403, and is in the language of that opinion, except in one respect not material here. In regard to the instruction considered in People v. Bruggy, it is said in the Hecker Case: "Instruction E, which is complained of, has often been given and as often approved by this court. The cases in which it is discussed are reviewed in People v. Bruggy, 93 Cal. 476 [29 Pac. 26]. As was said by this court in People v. Herbert, 61 Cal. 544: 'To justify a homicide, there must be a necessity, actual or apparent, and this we understand to be true under our statute as well as at common law.' Those cases where the assailed is not required to look to escape as an avenue of safety arise, as has been before discussed, where the peril is swift and imminent and the necessity of action immediate. Therein the law does not weigh in too nice scales the conduct of the assailed, and say he shall not be justified because he might have resorted to other means to secure his safety. The suddenness of the attack puts him to the wall." After considering the contrariety of opinion among the authorities, the court adds: "So that while the killing must still be under an absolute necessity, actual or apparent, as a matter of law that absolute necessity is deemed to exist when an innocent person is placed in sudden jeopardy. The right to stand one's ground should form an element of the instructions upon the necessity of killing and the law of self-defense."

It is apparent, then, that upon the theory that he was without fault the defendant was entitled to have instruction No. 26 given that the jury might be informed, as a matter of law, that, if he were without fault, and the suddenness of the attack put him to the wall, the "absolute necessity" required by instructions 4 and 6 had arisen. People v. Newcomer, 118 Cal. 263, 50 Pac. 405. He was also entitled to have the jury instructed as they were in No. 27. This instruction rested upon the common-law rule, which is the same as our statute, that a person attacked in his own house need retreat no further. People v. Lewis, 117 Cal. 186, 48 Pac. 1088, 59 Am. St. Rep. 167.

We do not think the Maughs Case changes the rule as recognized above. What is said in that case upon this subject is rested upon the cases which we have cited and quoted from. The language of the instruction which was disapproved there was as follows: "Before a person can justify taking the life of a human being on the ground of self-defense he must, when attacked, employ all reasonable means within his power consistent with his safety to avoid the danger and avert the necessity for the killing." The rule quoted from People v. Hecker, supra, was recognized and is still the law of this state, and the trial court should have given instruction No. 26 requested by the defendant. On account of this error the judgment and order must be reversed.

Judgment and order appealed from reversed.

Ex parte HANSEN. (Cr. 148.)

(Court of Appeal, Second District, California. Nov. 15, 1909.)

INTOXICATING LIQUORS (§ 215*)—PROSECUTION—COMPLAINT.

An ordinance made it unlawful for any person to sell, distribute, or give away intoxicating drinks, and to furnish, accept, or obtain any intoxicating drinks, or in any manner aid or abet in a violation of the ordinance. A complaint charged defendant with aiding and abetting in the violation of the ordinance by purchasing and receiving intoxicating liquors and furnishing and giving away the same. Held, that the complaint was sufficient, though it did not charge that any misdemeanor was committed by any other person in which defendant aided and abetted others, since an offense, that of furnishing and giving away, etc., was alleged against him.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Intoxicating Liquors, Dec. Dig. § 215.*]

Application by A. J. Hansen for a writ of habeas corpus to obtain his release from custody under a commitment on a conviction of misdemeanor. Writ denied.

Conkling & Brown, for petitioner.

PER CURIAM. It appears from the application of petitioner that he is deprived of his liberty under a commitment issued upon a conviction of an alleged misdemeanor. This conviction is shown to have been based upon an affidavit filed before a magistrate which charged the defendant with willfully, unlawfully, intentionally and knowingly encouraging, aiding, and abetting in the violation of a certain ordinance, by then and there purchasing, receiving, and accepting malt and intoxicating liquor, to wit, beer, and furnishing, selling, distributing, delivering, and giving away the same to other persons unknown. The ordinance, No. 2, referred to in the affidavit, makes it unlawful for any person, firm, or corporation within the county and outside of municipalities therein contained to sell, furnish, distribute, divide, or give away intoxicating drinks in any quantity, except for certain specified purposes. By section 4 of the ordinance, it is made unlawful for any person to furnish, receive, accept, or otherwise obtain any intoxicating drinks, or in any manner to encourage, aid, abet, or assist in the violation of the ordinance.

The contention of petitioner upon this application is that it is not charged that any misdemeanor was committed by any one in the commission of which petitioner could aid, abet, or assist. As we read the affidavit of complaint, it charges the petitioner with willfully and unlawfully purchasing, receiving, and accepting a certain kind of intoxicating drink, and of furnishing, selling, and distributing the same to other persons unknown. It is true that the affidavit does allege that in doing this he was aiding, assisting, and abetting others, but inasmuch as a substantive offense, that of selling, furnishing, and giving away, etc., is alleged as against him, it would be immaterial in determining his guilt whether the act committed was individual or in the aid and assistance of others connected therewith. The selling or giving away of intoxicating drinks is made an offense under the ordinance, as well as to aid and assist others in the commission of such offense. We think a fair and reasonable construction of the language employed in the affidavit leads to the conclusion that the charge in the affidavit is sufficiently explicit to apprise the defendant of the offense charged, and to permit evidence to be received in connection therewith establishing the commission of such acts.

Writ denied.

1. INSURANCE (§ 608*)—INDEMNITY INSURANCE—PREMIUMS—ACTIONS—NATURE OF ACTION.

An action on an indemnity insurance policy stipulating for the payment of additional premium, based on the pay roll of insured for the policy term, for additional premium, is an action for a specific sum alleged to be due under a contract, and is not a suit for an accounting, and whether any sum is due depends on the amount which insured paid to employés in specified work during the term of the policy.

2. INSURANCE (§ 665*)—INDEMNITY INSURANCE—PREMIUMS—ACTIONS.

Where, in an action on an indemnity policy stipulating for additional premium, based on the amount paid by insured to classes of employés during the policy term for services rendered at places designated therein, and providing that the policy should not cover loss on account of liability for injuries unless the person injured was on duty at the time of the accident and engaged in the occupation specified and at the place designated, there was no attempt to show that the sums paid by insured were paid out for services included within the policy, the court was justified in finding that the allegations of the complaint as to the amount insured had paid were untrue.

3. Accord and Satisfaction (§ 26*)—Sufficiency—Receipt in Full—Evidence.

A receipt by insurer in an indemnity policy stipulating for additional premium based on the pay roll of insured for the policy term acknowledging payment of additional premium in full, and evidence that the payment was understood to be a full adjustment of differences as to the amount due under the policy for additional premium and that it was so received by insurer in satisfaction thereof, was sufficient to support a finding of accord and satisfaction under Civ. Code, §§ 1523, 1524, providing that acceptance by a creditor of the consideration of an accord extinguishes the obligation, etc.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Curtis D. Wilbur, Judge.

Action by the Pacific Coast Casualty Company, Cal., against the Home Telephone & Telegraph Company. From an order denying a motion for new trial after verdict for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

M. E. C. Munday, for appellant. Oscar A. Trippet, for respondent.

SHAW, J. Appeal from an order denying plaintiff's motion for a new trial.

On December 31, 1903, the parties entered into a contract whereby plaintiff, for the consideration specified in the contract, agreed, for a term of one year from and after said date, to insure defendant against loss from common law or statutory liability for damages incurred on account of bodily injury accidentally sustained by employés of defendant while in the performance of their duty at the places and while engaged in the occupations specified in said contract during the period covered by the term thereof. Plaintiff fully performed the conditions of the contract on its part.

The policy covered two classes of employés; the first consisting of those engaged in the installation of overhead and underground telephone and telegraph wires, including maintenance and extension of lines and the making of service connections, as to whom the premium was $1.20 per $100, based upon the pay roll for the policy term, which premium upon the pay roll as estimated for the year amounted to $900. The second class included the operators of the telephone and telegraph exchange and office force, as to whom the premium was 13 cents per $100, based likewise upon the pay roll for the policy year, the premium upon which estimated pay roll amounted to $101.40. The total estimated premium of $1,001.40 was paid by defendant. The contract contained a provision to the effect that, if the compensation paid employés of defendant during the year exceeded the estimated sums upon which the premium was based, the defendant should pay additional premium upon such excess over and above the estimated pay rolls, and that, if such compensation should be less, plaintiff should refund the unearned premiums so paid by defendant. Plaintiff alleges that the actual sum paid during the term of the policy to employés in the second class was $71,964.90, upon which the premium amounted to $93.55; and the actual amount paid for the same period to employés in the first class was $199,621.47, upon which the premium amounted to $2,395.45, making a total of $2,489, upon which defendant paid $1,208.42, leaving an alleged balance of $1,280.58, for which plaintiff prays judgment. In its answer defendant denied that it had made expenditures to its employés in the sum alleged in the complaint; and as a further and separate defense alleged that at the expiration of the term for which said policy was issued plaintiff and defendant had an accounting as to the unliquidated account between them, wherein it was determined and agreed that, under the terms of the policy of insurance, defendant was indebted to plaintiff on account of such additional premium in the sum of $207.02, which defendant agreed to pay and plaintiff agreed to accept in full discharge of all demands against defendant under and by virtue of the contract, which sum defendant then and there paid. The court found this separate defense as alleged to be true, and also found the allegations of the complaint touching the amount defendant had paid to its employés to be untrue. The sole contention of appellant is that these findings are not supported by the evidence.

The action is not one for an accounting, but to recover a specific sum of money alleged to be due under the terms of a written contract. As to whether this alleged sum or any sum was due depended upon the amounts of money which defendant had paid to two classes of employés while engaged in certain specified work during the period covered by the contract and for services rendered at the places designated therein. As to the employés included in the first class, the place of employment was Los Angeles and vicinity; as to those in the second class, it was the Home Telephone Building, 246 South Hill street, Los Angeles. The burden of proof was therefore upon plaintiff to show the amount paid to employés during the policy year for services rendered at the building, 246 South Hill street, in the "operation of telephone and telegraph exchange and office force," as to whom the premium rate was 13 cents per $100, and also the amount paid during the same period to employés for services rendered in the installation of defendant's "overhead and underground wires, including maintenance and extension of lines, and making of service connections" in the city of Los Angeles and its vicinity, as to whom the premium rate was $1.20 per $100. The only evidence offered by plaintiff to establish such facts was that of one witness, who testified that the total sum expended by defendant for construction and maintenance during the year 1904, as shown by the pay rolls was $163,176.22, of which sum $158,820.15 was apportioned to construction account, and $4,356.07 to maintenance account; and, further, that as shown by the office pay roll the following sums were expended, namely, $18,397.50 for construction, $18,864.30 for operating the system, $17,947.75 for maintenance, and $53,010.60 specially for operators. Under the contract, plaintiff was not entitled to any premium upon the amount paid by defendant to its employés engaged in construction work, unless such labor was performed in the city of Los Angeles and its vicinity, and in its character limited to the kind of work specified in the contract, namely: "Telephone and telegraph overhead and underground wires, including maintenance and extension of lines and making of service connections." No attempt was made to show that these several sums so expended for construction, or any part thereof, were paid out for the class of construction work specified. Indeed, for all that appears to the contrary, this entire sum might have been expended in the erection of a building, or for construction work on behalf of the company, other than that specified. Neither is there any evidence tending to show that such sum, or any part thereof, was expended for services rendered in Los Angeles, or its vicinity, nor that the amount paid the office force or telephone operators was for services rendered at 246 South Hill street, in Los Angeles. The materiality of these provisions is accentuated by the fact that the contract of insurance in express terms provides that the policy shall not cover loss on account of liability for injuries unless the person injured was on duty at the time of the accident and engaged in the occupation specified in the policy and at the place or places designated therein. The failure on the part of plaintiff to prove that the expenditures were made under the provisions of the policy justifies the finding that the same were untrue.

While according to the foregoing views the order appealed from must be affirmed, we are also of the opinion that the evidence fully supports the finding to the effect that the affirmative allegations of the answer are true in so far as they constitute a plea of accord and satisfaction. There was introduced in evidence a statement of account dated the day on which said policy expired, and by plaintiff rendered against defendant, wherein the latter was charged $207.02 for additional premium, to which was attached a receipt whereby payment in full of said account was duly acknowledged by plaintiff.

Conceding, as claimed by appellant, that this receipt standing alone is insufficient to support the finding, nevertheless, when taken in connection with the testimony of defendant's manager as to the circumstances under which it was given, it tends to show that the payment of $207.02 at the expiration of the policy was understood and intended to be a full adjustment and settlement of existing differences as to the amount due under the terms of the contract on account of additional premium, and that it was so received by plaintiff in full satisfaction thereof. Sections 1523, 1524, Civ. Code; 1 Cyc. par. 2, p. 329. The fact that the evidence is insufficient to support a finding of an account stated is immaterial. Conceding the error as claimed, the substantial rights of plaintiff could not be prejudiced thereby.

The record discloses no prejudicial error, and the order appealed from is therefore affirmed.

Action by E. Jonathan Boyce against Patrick Gordon and others. From a judgment for plaintiff against Patrick Gordon, the latter appeals. Affirmed.

Devoto & Richardson, for appellant. Maurice R. Carey, for respondent Boyce. Joseph W. Patton, for respondent Kiler.

COOPER, P. J. This action was brought to recover $487.50, being the value of certain lumber alleged to have been furnished to defendant Patrick Gordon, to be used, and which was used, in the construction of a building for said Gordon, and to recover the further sum of $129 for certain millwork alleged to have been used in the erection and construction of the same building for said Gordon. The first item was included in the first cause of action as stated in the complaint, and the second in what is denominated the second cause of action. The case was tried before the court with a jury. At the close of the evidence, after being instructed by the court, the jury returned a verdict in favor of the plaintiff and against defendant Patrick Gordon for the value of the lumber as alleged in the complaint, $487.50, and upon this verdict judgment was entered. Defendant Patrick Gordon prosecutes this appeal from the judgment and from the order denying his motion for a new trial.

It is first urged that the court erred in admitting in evidence a written assignment made by Mary J. Bates of all her right, title, and interest in and to the $487.50 due the Boyce Lumber Company for lumber furnished to Gordon. The evidence shows that the firm or copartnership known as the "Boyce Lumber Company" was at all times referred to in the complaint composed of two copartners and two only, to wit, the plaintiff and Mary J. Bates. There is no question here as to the copartnership debts, or as to any equities between the members of the firm. We then have the simple question as to two persons owning a claim as copartners, and one assigning her interest to the other. We see no reason why the partner who thus becomes the sole owner cannot maintain an action upon such claim. Baxter v. Hart, 104 Cal. 344, 37 Pac. 941.

The court did not err in sustaining the objections of plaintiff's counsel as to questions asked by appellant's counsel of plaintiff as to whether or not the copartnership had filed a certificate with the county clerk, stating the names and places of residence of the members of the copartnership, as required by the Code. The assignee of a partnership debt, even though a partner, may maintain an action to recover upon such debt, and this even though the partnership would not have been allowed to maintain such action by reason of not having complied with the law by filing its articles of copartnership. Gray v. Wells, 118 Cal. 11, 50 Pac. 23.

The appellant complains of the following instruction given to the jury: "It appears that there is no issue between the plaintiff and defendant as to both the first cause of action and the second cause of action. In the first cause of action, there is some evidence in the record to the effect that the defendant Patrick Gordon was a principal. If you find him a principal in the transaction, your verdict will be against him on the first cause of action. If you find that he was not a principal, but that the defendant Kiler was the principal, then you will not bring in a verdict against Patrick Gordon." It seems evident that the court must have intended the first part of the instruction down to the end of the sentence to apply to defendant Kiler, and that the word "Kiler" was left out after the first use of the word defendant; and this appears evident for the reason that there was no issue between the plaintiff and defendant Kiler as to either the first cause of action or the second cause of action, and it is apparent for the further reason that the court, in the latter part of the same instruction, expressly stated to the jury that, if it found appellant to be a principal as to the first cause of action, the verdict must be against him as to such cause. Even if there could be a question as to whether or not the instruction could have misled the jury, the matter was afterwards made very clear to them. It appears that after they had left the courtroom, after some conversation with counsel, the court informed counsel of its intention to recall the jury and further instruct it so as to make the said matter clear. The jury was accordingly recalled, and the court instructed them: "As I have before stated, there is no issue here between the plaintiff and the defendant Kiler. That matter is settled by the pleadings. There is no issue here as to the value of the lumber. There is no issue here as to the millwork as between the plaintiff and the defendant Patrick Gordon. Consequently your verdict is only one of two possible verdicts as follows: 'We, the jury in the above-entitled case, find a verdict in favor of plaintiff and against the defendant Patrick Gordon in the sum of $487.50,' or 'We, the jury in the above-entitled case, find a verdict in favor of Patrick Gordon.' That is all there is for you to decide." The jury therefore plainly understood that the issue for them to decide was on the first alleged cause of action and as between the plaintiff and the defendant Gordon; and not only this, but the verdict of the jury was responsive to such issue.

We find no error in the record, and no alleged error in addition to what has been discussed that is of sufficient importance to merit discussion.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

We concur: KERRIGAN, J.; HALL, J.

HOHN v. PAULY et al. (Civ. 642.)

1. HOMESTEAD (§ 3*)—EXEMPTIONS FROM FORCED SALE—CONSTITUTIONAL PROVISIONS.

Const. art. 17, § 1, providing that the Legislature shall protect by law from forced sale a certain portion of the homestead and other property of all heads of families, requires that, at least, heads of families shall be protected, and does not forbid the Legislature from extending the privilege to other persons.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homestead, Cent. Dig. § 4; Dec. Dig. § 3.*]

2. HOMESTEAD (§ 17*) — EXEMPTIONS FROM FORCED SALE—PERSONS OTHER THAN HEADS OF FAMILIES.

Under the express provision of Civ. Code, § 1260, subd. 2, a person other than a head of a family may select and claim a homestead not exceeding $1,000 in value.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homestead, Cent. Dig. §§ 18–20; Dec. Dig. § 17.*]

3. HOMESTEAD (§ 35*)—INCIDENTAL USE FOR BUSINESS PURPOSES.

Where a person actually resided upon premises claiming them as a homestead, her right was not affected by the fact that she used part of the building for hotel purposes.

4. HOMESTEAD (§ 154*) — ABANDONMENT — METHOD.

A homestead can only be abandoned by a declaration of abandonment or by a grant thereof executed and acknowledged, as expressly provided by Civ. Code, § 1243.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homestead, Cent. Dig. § 307; Dec. Dig. § 154.*]

5. HOMESTEAD (§ 103*)—LIABILITIES ENFORCEABLE AGAINST—JUDGMENT AND EXECUTION.

Civ. Code, § 1240, provides that the homestead is exempt from execution or forced sale except as provided in the title, and section 1241 thereof makes it subject to execution or forced sale in satisfaction of certain judgments. Code Civ. Proc. § 671, provides that from the time a judgment is docketed it becomes a lien upon all the real property of the judgment debtor not exempt from execution in the county. Held that, a homestead being in full force, a judgment not within the scope of section 1241 created no lien thereon under section 671, and the attempted levy of an execution thereon upon such homestead was of no effect, and the transfer by the homestead claimant of her interest a year afterward could have no effect to vitalize such a void proceeding.

6. ABATEMENT AND REVIVAL (§ 47*)—PLAINTIFF—TRANSFERROR OF HOMESTEAD.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 385, providing that in case of a transfer of interest the action may be continued in the name of the original party, or the court may allow the transferee to be substituted, an action could be continued by a homestead claimant, after she had transferred her interest, to enjoin the selling of the premises to satisfy a judgment against her, and if defendants desired the substitution of the transferee they should have applied therefor.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Abatement and Revival, Cent. Dig. §§ 239, 240; Dec. Dig. § 47.*]

7. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1051*)—HARMLESS ERROR—ADMISSION OF EVIDENCE.

In an action to enjoin the selling of a homestead in satisfaction of a judgment against the claimant, where there was no issue as to the ownership of the property, and claimant's residence thereon was uncontradictedly shown by other evidence, the admission in evidence of a United States patent conveying the land, to show claimant's residence upon it, if erroneous, was not prejudicial.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 4171; Dec. Dig. § 1051.*]

8. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 970*)—DISCRETION OF COURT—REOPENING CASE FOR ADDITIONAL EVIDENCE.

Where, after submission, the judge, after suggesting it himself, reopened the case for further evidence, it will be presumed that it was in furtherance of a desire to reach a just conclusion upon the merits, and, both parties having the same opportunity to offer additional evidence, he will be deemed to have acted within his discretion, especially where it is at least doubtful whether the additional evidence strengthens materially the successful party's case.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 3851; Dec. Dig. § 970.*]

9. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 970*)—REOPENING CASE — CHANGE OF JUDGE'S MIND AFTER FIRST SUBMISSION.

The fact that the judge changed his mind after the first submission would afford no ground of complaint, where such change was not occasioned by improper influence and did not lead to prejudicial error.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 3851; Dec. Dig. § 970.*]

10. EVIDENCE (§ 5*) — JUDICIAL NOTICE — CHARACTER OF HOUSES IN PARTICULAR COUNTY.

The court cannot take judicial notice of the manner in which buildings have been constructed and the purposes for which they have been used in any particular county.

Appeal from Superior Court, Plumas County; J. E. Raker, Judge.

Action by Ellen Hohn against N. O. Pauly and others. From a judgment for plaintiff and an order denying a new trial, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

L. N. Peter, for appellants. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., for respondent.

BURNETT, J. The plaintiff is a widow without children. At one time she was the wife of one Andrew Hersom, and after his death she married John Hohn, who died in 1898. Upon the property in controversy she filed two declarations of homestead, the first dated and recorded May 13, 1899, and the second September 23, 1901. The second differs from the first only by reason of the additional recital, "that I am now unmarried and have no children and that I am a person other than the head of a family," although the sufficiency of neither declaration is challenged. On December 30, 1901, a judgment in the superior court of Plumas county in the sum of $493.93 and costs was rendered against the said Ellen Hohn in favor of the said N. O. Pauly. This was assigned by Pauly to R. J. McKeowen and L. James, and on March 25, 1902, execution was issued thereon and placed in the hands of the sheriff, who thereupon levied upon the property and gave notice that he would sell the same on May 22, 1902. Plaintiff brought the action to enjoin the defendants and each of them "from selling, threatening to sell, or offering for sale said premises or any part thereof." The complaint was filed May 14, 1902, and a general demurrer on May 20th following, but for some reason not disclosed by the record, probably, though, because of the disqualification of the presiding judge of said superior court, the order overruling the demurrer was not made until July 31, 1905, and the answer was filed the same day. The cause was partially tried on the 6th day of December, 1905, and completed on the 16th day of November, 1906. Plaintiff prevailed, and the appeal is from the judgment and order denying the motion for a new trial.

1. It is claimed that no person other than "heads of families" is entitled to a homestead or homestead exemption. The contention is grounded upon the language of section 1 of article 17 of the Constitution, providing that "the Legislature shall protect by law, from forced sale, a certain portion of the homestead and other property of all heads of families." But, as pointed out by respondent, the Constitution does not "limit the power of the Legislature to give homestead privileges to 'heads of families' only. It leaves the entire matter of such privileges, the method of selection of the homestead, and the persons by whom the selection may be made entirely to the Legislature, demanding only that at least heads of families shall be protected." The argument of appellants might possess merit if it were addressed to a provision of the Constitution of the United States containing a grant of power to Congress; but, in view of the familiar distinction between that instrument and a state Constitution, it is apparent that the authority of the Legislature, representing the lawmaking power of the people, to extend the homestead privilege to other persons than heads of families, is not withheld nor restricted by said provision of the Constitution. It is said in Beaton v. Reid, 111 Cal. 487, 44 Pac. 167, that "the subject of homesteads is one wholly committed by the Constitution to the Legislature, with simply the general mandate that the latter shall protect it by law from forced sale. Const. art. 17. The extent of the right, therefore, and the mode of its protection, with the limitation of the rights of creditors therein, are purely matters of legislative prescription, and something with which we have nothing to do but to construe and apply."

In sections 1260 and 1266 of the Civil Code the Legislature has provided clearly and amply for the case before us. In the former the enactment is that "Homesteads may be selected and claimed: (1) Of not exceeding five thousand dollars in value by any head of a family; (2) of not exceeding one thousand dollars in value by any other person." And the latter section: "Any person other than the head of a family, in the selection of a homestead, must execute and acknowledge, in the same manner as a grant of real property is acknowledged, a 'declaration of homestead.'" And the succeeding section provides what said declaration must contain. It is admitted here that the value of the property was and is less than $1,000, and the declaration complied with the requirement of the statute. There can be, therefore, no question as to the unsoundness of the first position of appellants. Roth v. Insley, 86 Cal. 141, 24 Pac. 853.

2. We think the court did not err in denying the motion for a nonsuit. It is claimed by respondent that she might have rested upon the pleadings alone, as there is no denial in the answer of the allegations of the complaint as to her ownership of the property and her residence there, or as to the sufficiency of the declaration of homestead, and it is not denied that she "has resided upon and claims said premises as a homestead," and, furthermore, it is urged that whether or not the building within which plaintiff resided was primarily used for hotel purposes and whether her residence there was incidental to conducting such hotel business was a question of fact raised by appellants with the burden of proof devolving upon them. This need not be decided, however, as, considering the testimony in the light of the inferences most favorable to plaintiff, and keeping in view the admitted facts, it ought to be held that the motion was properly denied. That the plaintiff actually resided in the building and that it was her only home is not questioned. We must assume that the declaration of homestead was made in the utmost good faith, as there is not a particle of evidence to the contrary. It would indeed be a harsh rule that, under the circumstances disclosed here, would deprive this widow of the homestead of trifling value simply because she used it to make a precarious living. If the question is to be resolved by a determination of the comparative importance of the two, it is more reasonable to hold that the business rather than the home was the mere incident.

As we have seen, the trial took place years after the complaint was filed, and the plaintiff was not present. Her counsel therefore called a witness subpœnaed by the defense, who testified: "I know the plaintiff, Ellen Hohn; have known her about 18 years. During the time I have known her, her residence was Onion Valley, at what is commonly known as the Onion Valley House. She resided there a part of the year 1901, to my certain knowledge. During the time I knew her she did not reside anywhere else that I know of. * * * It is 15 years since I was over there. I boarded there at one time in July, 1890. At that time the general nature of the business that was being conducted there was the hotel business. * * *

When we were boarding there, the place was open to the general public. * * * After John Hohn died she continued to live there herself and conducted the place as she had formerly."

In Skinner v. Hall, 69 Cal. 198, 10 Pac. 408, it is said: "After making an actual residence upon property, one may file a homestead upon it at the end of a day as well as at the end of a month or a year. So one may file and maintain a homestead upon property which is partially rented out or used for other purposes than his residence. Ackley v. Chamberlain, 16 Cal. 181 [76 Am. Dec. 516]; Phelps v. Rooney, 9 Wis. 70 [76 Am. Dec. 244]."

In the Ackley Case, supra, it is declared, through Chief Justice Field, that: "In this case the building was intended for a dwelling house as well as a hotel. * * * The nature and extent of the business did not interfere with its general character as a dwelling house. The keeping of boarders and accommodation of lodgers and travelers were not inconsistent with the main purpose of taking up the 160 acres and the erection of the building."

Judging from the description of the building, it is quite probable that here the original purpose was to prepare for boarders and lodgers as well as for a home, but it is no different in principle from the Ackley Case.

In Heathman v. Holmes, 94 Cal. 295, 29 Pac. 405, we find this language: "It would be strange, indeed, if the occupants of a house could not use part of it for family revenue, no matter how favorable the opportunity might be to do so, without forfeiting the home itself. There is nothing in the homestead laws which prohibits such use, and it has been settled here that 'the homestead statute is a remedial measure and should be liberally construed.' Schuyler v. Broughton, 76 Cal. 524 [18 Pac. 436]; Southwick v. Davis, 78 Cal. 504 [21 Pac. 121]." The court proceeds to distinguish Laughlin v. Wright, 63 Cal. 113, upon which appellants here rely, by calling attention to the consideration that, "so far as the facts appear in that case, the family had never really made the premises their bona fide home." So in the case of Maloney v. Hefer, 75 Cal. 422, 17 Pac. 539, 7 Am. St. Rep. 180, there were two houses entirely separate and distinct from each other. The family lived in one of the houses and rented the other, and it was merely held that the homestead did not include the house in which the claimants did not live.

In re Ogburn, 105 Cal. 95, 38 Pac. 498, is in harmony with the foregoing, and holds that "the homestead character of the premises is not destroyed, either in whole or in part, by the fact that the husband and wife use part of the building for doing their work as artisans, where the work does not constitute such a pretentious business as to blot out the character of the place as a residence and home, or to make the latter merely incidental to the former."

In Estate of Levy, 141 Cal. 646, 75 Pac. 301, 99 Am. St. Rep. 92, after a review of the earlier cases, it is stated by the court, through Mr. Justice Angellotti, that "in no case has it been decided that where a portion of a building is dedicated to residence purposes, and is actually occupied by the claimant as the home of himself and his family, and such occupation is not merely incidental to the carrying on of some business in other parts of the building, the building and the land on which it is situated cannot be legally selected as a homestead."

In the case of Harlan v. Schulze, 7 Cal. App. 287, 94 Pac. 379, this court held that "where the claim of the homestead is valid on its face, and there is nothing therein to indicate that it is to be used for any other purpose than as a residence for husband and wife, the incidental use by the wife of the home for purposes of prostitution does not destroy the right to the homestead."

The facts here, we think, bring the case within the foregoing decisions.

3. In the defendants' answer it is alleged that "since the commencement of this action plaintiff has abandoned any and all claim to said premises as a homestead, by a grant thereof executed and acknowledged by her, and by ceasing to reside upon the same." There was no finding as to the latter averment, but the allegation is immaterial, as it is well settled that the homestead can be abandoned only in the manner pointed out in section 1243 of the Civil Code; that is, by the declaration of abandonment or a grant thereof. Simonson v. Burr, 121 Cal. 582, 54 Pac. 87.

It must be clear that no valid sale could be made of premises by virtue of the levy of an execution where neither the judgment nor execution creates any lien upon the property. The homestead being in full force and effect, and there being no contention that the judgment is within the purview of section 1241, Civ. Code, the docketing of the judgment created no lien (section 671, Code Civ. Proc.; Dam v. Zink, 112 Cal. 91, 44 Pac. 331); and the same thing is true of the levy of the execution. Section 1240 of the Civil Code provides that "the homestead is exempt from execution or forced sale except as in this title provided." The attempted levy of an execution upon property that is exempt must be futile to affect any interest whatever of the homestead claimant, and the transfer of her interest a year afterward can have no effect to vitalize a void and nugatory proceeding taken to subject the property to seizure and sale.

In Lubbock v. McMann, 82 Cal. 230, 22 Pac. 1147, 16 Am. St. Rep. 108, it is declared that: "A judgment creates no lien upon property thus affected, and a levy gives no right, except to inaugurate the proceedings for the admeasurement of such excess. * * * But though the sale of a homestead under execution conveys no title, it may create a cloud and involve the homestead claimant in litigation and will therefore be enjoined."

In Beaton v. Reid, supra, it is said: "The statute has provided the instances in which the homestead may be taken on forced sale, and the right to so take it will be strictly limited to those instances." Since the sale would be without authority of law, it is entirely inconsequential that the property was transferred after the bringing of the action.

4. Complaint is also made by appellants because of the finding that "said action has been continued in the name of the original party plaintiff, and no objection thereto was made by either party to this action." As a matter of fact, the finding is true beyond question. The course pursued also seems to be authorized by section 385, Code Civ. Proc., providing that, "in case of any other transfer of interest, the action or proceeding may be continued in the name of the original party, or the court may allow the person to whom the transfer is made to be substituted in the action or proceeding." If the defendants desired the substitution they should have made application therefor. They certainly have not been prejudiced because a righteous judgment has been secured against them in the name of the plaintiff rather than of her successor in interest.

5. Over the objection of defendants, the court admitted in evidence the patent of the United States government to said Andrew Hersom, conveying the land in controversy. Appellants contend that this was error since there was no issue as to ownership of the property, and it "was relied upon as evidence of respondent's residence upon the land in controversy." Respondent claims that it was introduced "merely to show that said Hersom had purchased the property under the homestead laws of the United States and was some evidence of Hersom's intent with respect to the property." But, conceding that the ruling was technically erroneous, it could not have prejudiced appellants. The fact of respondent's residence was shown without conflict by other evidence, and as to ownership no one can complain of evidence in support of an admitted fact.

6. Under the decisions it cannot be held that the court abused its discretion in reopening the case for further evidence. The delay in the trial was great, but we cannot say it was inexcusable. The court, it is true, suggested the reopening of the case. This may be rather unusual, but we must assume that it was in furtherance of a desire to reach a just conclusion upon the merits, and this certainly is not to be condemned. Appellants had the same opportunity to offer additional evidence as respondent, and an earlier judgment against them would hardly have been received with greater favor. Besides, it is at least doubtful whether the additional evidence strengthened plaintiff's case in any material respect, and if the judge changed his mind after the first submission it cannot be made the subject of just animadversion unless it should be shown that it was occasioned by some improper influence or led to prejudicial error. Nothing of the kind appears, and we conclude that the court's action was justifiable and within the spirit of the following decisions: Preston v. Sonora Lodge, 39 Cal. 116, 39 Pac. 116; Miller v. Sharp, 49 Cal. 233; Clavey v. Lord, 87 Cal. 413, 25 Pac. 493.

7. In rendering his opinion the trial judge said: "I think it is a fact the court can take judicial notice of that in these mountain counties there is hardly a home but what is built more or less in a hotel fashion, run as a hotel, stopping place for the purpose of accommodating the public; it is really a part of the history of Plumas county, so that every place you go on the road you find a hotel and farm, and the same in the other counties, where there are some with more extensive structures than others, some built like hotels, great two-story houses constructed." It is often difficult to determine what things come within the category of matters of common knowledge of which the courts can take judicial notice, but it is doubtful whether any case can be found where it has been held to include the manner in which buildings have been constructed and the purposes for which they have been used in any particular county. If the doctrine can have such an extensive application, little would be left in the average case to be established by evidence. It would seem absurd for us to hold that the courts will take judicial notice of how the houses are constructed in Plumas county when we actually have no knowledge of it nor any accessible means of ascertaining the fact.

The cases cited by respondent do not reach the point. In Mahoney v. Aurrecochea, 51 Cal. 429, the time of harvest was involved. So, also, in Haines v. Shedigar, 110 Cal. 18, 42 Pac. 462. In People v. Mayes, 113 Cal. 618, 45 Pac. 860, it was held that the court would take judicial notice of the time when the moon arose on a particular night. Ex parte Berry, 147 Cal. 523, 82 Pac. 44, 109 Am. St. Rep. 160, was in relation to the meaning of the word "automobile." These were all cases within the provisions of section 1875 of the Code of Civil Procedure. Edson v. Southern Pacific R. R. Co., 144 Cal. 189, 77 Pac. 897, is no nearer the mark, wherein it is guardedly said: "But we suppose a court may take judicial notice of facts of common knowledge, and, among others, of the fact that but a small percentage of those traveling between places of the relative situation of San Francisco and Fresno have any occasion to avail themselves of all or of any of the privileges which purchasers of limited tickets were compelled to stipulate away."

It would, of course, be unnecessary to prove, what is so obvious, that the continuous travel between two such cities would be vastly greater than the intermitted.

But notwithstanding the court's error in this regard, as we conceive it, we are of the opinion that if it had not figured in the case the conclusion would and should have been in favor of plaintiff, and that there was no prejudice to the substantial rights of the appellants.

As we think the judgment is just, it and the order denying the motion for a new trial are affirmed.

SWAMP LAND RECLAMATION DIST. NO. 341 v. BLUMENBERG et al. (Sac. 1,656.)

(Supreme Court of California. Nov. 23, 1909.)

1. Judgment (§ 948*)—Former Adjudication—Pleading—Necessity.

The defense of res judicata cannot be considered unless pleaded.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Judgment, Cent. Dig. § 1787; Dec. Dig. § 948.*]

2. Drains (§ 90*)—Assessments—Action—Defenses.

In an action to foreclose the lien of an assessment for maintaining a swamp land reclamation district, the regularity of the assessment and its amount as compared to benefits received by the work are open to investigation if the validity of the assessment has not been established under Pol. Code, § 3493½, permitting the district board of trustees, within a year after filing of the lien of assessments for maintenance, to commence an action to determine the validity of the assessment, and making the judgment therein conclusive upon its validity.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Drains, Dec. Dig. § 90.*]

3. Drains (§ 90*)—Assessments—Additional Assessments — Action — Defenses — Failure of Benefits—Wrongful Act of Districts.

Pol. Code, § 3459, provides that if swamp reclamation work is such that other work must be done after its completion to maintain it, other assessments may be made from time to time to raise funds for that purpose. Section 3462 requires the trustees to make a statement of such work and its estimated cost, which shall be assessed proportionally to the benefits from the additional work, and requires the assessments to be filed with the county treasurer. Section 3463 makes the amount assessed a lien upon the land, and section 3465 makes them delinquent after 30 days. Section 3466 authorizes a suit to foreclose the lien, if the assessments are not paid. Held, that the willful refusal of a reclamation district, without cause, to operate the pumps during the cropping season, which were used to remove the water, and prevent it from overflowing reclaimed land, whereby a landowner's crops were destroyed, was a defense in an action by the district to foreclose a lien for an assessment to operate the pump during that season; where the landowner is not barred by a judgment validating the assessment in a proceeding under section 3493½.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; C. N. Post, Judge.

Action by Swamp Land Reclamation District No. 341 against Caroline R. Blumenberg and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Reversed.

Hinckson & Elliott, for appellants. Henry Ross and J. Frank Brown, for respondent.

SHAW, J. The plaintiff moved in the court below for judgment in its favor upon the pleadings. The motion was granted, and judgment was rendered accordingly. This is an appeal from that judgment. The action was begun under the provisions of section 3466 of the Political Code, to foreclose the lien of a swamp land assessment. It is admitted that the assessment was in all respects regularly made, and that it was levied for work to be thereafter performed by the district. The only question presented is whether or not the facts set up in the answer constitute a defense to the enforcement of the assessment.

The law relating to districts for the reclamation of swamp lands is found in sections 3446 to 3493½, inclusive, of the Political Code. It is provided that, after the original works of reclamation are completed, if they are of such a nature that other work must be done continuously, or from year to year, to maintain them or to make them effective, other assessments may be made upon the lands of the district, from time to time, to obtain funds for that purpose. Section 3459. The trustees must for that purpose make a statement of the work to be done and of its estimated cost. The cost is to be assessed to the lands in proportion to the benefits which it is believed will be caused by the work. The list of assessments is to be filed with the treasurer of the county (section 3462); the several amounts assessed become liens upon the respective tracts of land upon which they are assessed (section 3463); payment thereof may be made at any time within 30 days (section 3465); and if not so paid, they become delinquent, and may be called for in installments by the board of trustees, and if any installment is not paid in 20 days after such call, a suit for the foreclosure of the lien to that amount, or to the whole amount of the assessment if the trustees so elect, may then be instituted by the district (section 3466).

The plaintiff district was organized on June 17, 1879, and ever since has been a legally organized reclamation district under the law. It does not appear when its reclamation works were originally constructed, nor definitely of what they consist, but from the admitted facts it is a necessary inference that they have long been in operation, and that the plan of reclamation is that pumps are to be operated during the cropping season of each year to lift the water collected by its ditches over the levee into the river, in order that it may be carried away and the land kept free so that it may be cultivated. The assessment in question here was made in the year 1907, some time prior to June 27th, and on that date the assessment list was filed with the county treasurer. The object of the assesssment was to raise funds to operate the pumps referred to, during the two years next ensuing after the levy of the assessment. Here again the allegations of the pleadings are somewhat uncertain, but we think it is to be presumed that these two years embraced the cropping seasons of 1907 and 1908. The amount assessed against the land of the defendant Caroline R. Blumenberg was $6,053.15. The other defendant is her husband, and he has no other interest. Three installments of this assessment were called by the board of trustees; one on August 23, 1907, for 15 per cent. thereof, one on September 19, 1907, for 10 per cent., and one on November 19, 1907, for 10 per cent., amounting in all to $2,118.60, The suit is for these installments. It was begun on January 10, 1908.

In defense it is alleged that, since the levy of the assessment, and "during the cropping season of 1907, said plaintiff, in violation of its duty in that behalf, failed, neglected, and refused to operate its pump aforesaid, and in consequence thereof the water from surrounding lands drained down upon the said land of defendant Caroline R. Blumenberg, and submerged and overflowed a large area of the same, and so thoroughly saturated about 120 acres" thereof that the crops growing thereon were destroyed, "and said lands rendered unfit for cultivation ever since"; that defendant "repeatedly called the attention of said plaintiff to the submerged and saturated condition of the said lands, and demanded of the plaintiff again and again that it operate its said pump for the purpose of pumping and removing said water from the said lands, but plaintiff at all times neglected and refused to operate its said pump, and wrongfully dammed up the ditches leading to said pump," whereby the crops of defendant were overflowed and destroyed—all to her damage in the sum of $5,000. It is further alleged that by reason of these misfeasances of the plaintiff she has not and will not derive any benefit whatever from the portion of the assessment sought to be recovered.

Another action for the remaining 65 per cent. of the assessment was begun afterward, and it is now before this court on appeal from a similar judgment, being the case designated as No. 1,727 on the Sacramento calendar. 106 Pac. 392. In that case it was alleged that a judgment in pursuance of section 3493½ of the Political Code, declaring the assessment valid, was rendered in the superior court of Sacramento county on October 11, 1907, and that it had become final when that action was begun. This proceeding and judgment are not mentioned in the pleadings or record in this action, and we cannot now consider what would be the effect of that judgment upon the defense here interposed.

The theory of the defense is that, as the assessment was made to pay the expense of pumping for the seasons of 1907 and 1908, and as the basis of the right and power to make such assessments is the benefit which it is estimated the property will receive from the work for which the assessment is raised, such benefit is the sole consideration for the money to be paid by the property owner, that the failure to do the work constitutes a failure of consideration, and that when such failure occurs before payment is made, or before judgment in a suit to foreclose the assessment lien, and when, because the time for doing the work has passed, it never can be done, the failure of consideration is total, and that it may be set up as a defense to such foreclosure.

Under the rule established in Reclamation District v. Phillips, 108 Cal. 306, 39 Pac. 630, 41 Pac. 335, if the validity of the assessment has not been established in an action as provided in section 3493½ of the Political Code, all questions involving the regularity of the assessment proceedings, the amount of the charge as compared to the benefits conferred, and the fact that the cost was apportioned in proportion to the benefits, must remain open to investigation in defense to a suit to foreclose the assessment lien. But here no attack is made upon the regularity of the assessment, nor is there any dispute that the work to be done would have benefited the land to the amount assessed, or that the cost was properly apportioned. The regularity and original validity and binding force of the assessment is admitted by the defendant. The contention is that it has become unenforceable because, by reason of subsequent events, the landowners cannot receive the benefit to secure which alone the assessment was made, and upon which alone it can be constitutionally founded.

There are authorities which give countenance to the doctrine that such an assessment, although absolutely regular and valid when imposed, may be rendered unenforceable by subsequent events of this nature. In Davidson v. New Orleans, 34 La. Ann. 171, an assessment for drainage purposes had been declared valid by the Supreme Court of the state and by the United States Supreme Court. Subsequently the work for which the assessment was levied was abandoned, and it was said to be probable that it never would be done. A suit was begun to declare it unenforceable. This action was sustained; the court saying: "Where the consideration of a judgment is prospective and has failed, the eventual debtor is, both in law and in equity, entitled to relief and the consequent exoneration." The force of the decision is weakened by the fact that the authorities cited and quoted in support of this statement go no farther than to declare that a personal judgment cannot be rendered against the property owner in an action upon such an assessment, and that payment can be enforced only against the property benefited and assessed. In Illinois the local improvement law provides for an assessment to be collected in advance of the doing of the work, and for its validation in an action for that purpose in which the property owners are to be summoned to make such objections as they may have to its validity. The courts of that state hold that, even after such judgment, if the local authorities in charge of the performance of the work allow it to be done in a substantially different manner from that proposed in the ordinance initiating the proceeding, and accept an improvement different in plan and character, and substantially less beneficial than the one proposed, such unauthorized action, if it occurs after the validating judgment is rendered, will vitiate the assessment, and may be pleaded in defense to a suit to foreclose the lien of the assessment. Church v. People, 174 Ill. 366, 51 N. E. 747; Pells v. People, 159 Ill. 587, 42 N. E. 784; Young v. People, 196 Ill. 603, 63 N. E. 1075; Gage v. People, 193 Ill. 316, 61 N. E. 1045, 56 L. R. A. 916. These doctrines are approved in 2 Cooley on Taxation (3d Ed.) p. 1280; (2d Ed.) p. 672. In equity, also, a doctrine is established to the effect that, under some circumstances, the enforcement of a judgment may be enjoined if it was rendered upon a contract, the consideration of which is an obligation to do something in the future, and subsequent events demonstrated that the thing could not be done, the complaining party being without fault and showing due diligence, as where a judgment against a surety was enjoined because, in another action, it had been subsequently adjudged that the consideration of the contract was illegal, and for that reason the principal was thereby discharged from liability. Miller v. Gaskins, Smedes & M. Ch. (Miss.) 524. See also, Scott v. Shreeve, 12 Wheat. (25 U. S.) 605, 6 L. Ed. 744; Reese v. Walton, 4 B. Mon. (43 Ky.) 507; Buchanan v. Lorman, 3 Gill (Md.) 51; Hilleary v. Crow, 1 Har. & J. (Md.) 542.

It is apparent that if a rule of this kind is to be applied to assessments such as that here involved—assessments by a going reclamation district, with its permanent works constructed and paid for, assessments levied for the annual operations of the district necessary to be carried on to make the plan of reclamation and the organization of the district of any avail, operations of no benefit whatever unless the work is done at the proper season—there may arise insuperable obstacles to the success of such districts, and the realization of the benefits to the landowners thereof and to the commonwealth, which such agencies are designed to bring about, may be prevented by the action of a few of the persons intended to be benefited. If the district must have the money to pay in advance to get the work done, and the assessment cannot be collected until the work is done, the district would as well cease to exist at once. The statute makes the assessment payable within 30 days and delinquent thereafter. It manifestly contemplates the payment of the assessment before such annual work, or any substantial part thereof has been done. A levy for such purposes, by a district which has completed its permanent system of ditches, a district which, though not a municipal corporation, is at least a public corporation performing some of the functions of government for the local territory interested, bears a close resemblance to ordinary taxes levied to defray the expenses of a city or county. It is clear from these considerations that a rule such as that here contended for, if applied at all to such districts and to assessments for such annual work, must be carefully guarded and limited so that it will not operate to defeat the very purpose for which such organizations are created.

There is no explanation in the record of the acts of the district averred in the answer as a defense. The plaintiff has followed the somewhat hazardous course of allowing its case to be stated by its adversary. We are disposed to rest our decision upon narrow grounds. The answer, in effect, avers that the district, whose duty it was to do the work contemplated, purposely and willfully refused to do it, and that without any excuse for the nonfeasance. It may be that good cause for the failure existed; as that it was caused by lack of funds arising from the failure of the defendant and others to pay the assessments, or by reason of some disaster intervening rendering it impossible, or it may be that the purposes of the assessment are not truly or fully stated in the answer, and that the amount raised was expended for some of the other purposes. The plaintiff has submitted its case without asserting any such excuses or inaccuracies, depending solely on the contention that the assessment is valid and conclusive. It is unnecessary to say what would be the effect if such facts were shown. We can only decide the case as it is presented. We are of the opinion that the willful refusal of the district to do the work for which the assessment was levied, without just cause or excuse, the effect of such failure being that the work never can be done, and that the property owners never can receive the benefit of that work for which their money was required of them, constitutes a good defense to an action by the district to foreclose the lien of the assessment, where the landowners are not barred by a judgment validating the assessment as provided in section 3493½. We do not perceive wherein this rule would operate unjustly to the district, or that it would necessarily hamper or restrict it in the performance of its lawful functions. It is in accordance with the principle of the authorities above referred to, and it seems necessary in order to secure justice to the landowners, and to prevent their property from being taken for public use without compensation.

It may be suggested that if the money due on the assessment is paid and the work is not done, or by reason of the lapse of time the precise work contemplated by this particular levy cannot be done, the money will remain in the treasury of the district, and can be devoted to future annual work of the same character, and that in this manner the landowners will receive the full benefit of the money paid on the assessment, although not the exact benefit intended. Perhaps this might be a good answer to a failure to do the work if it were prevented in some manner other than the willful and unjustifiable refusal of the district to do it. But where the failure is thus brought about, we do not think the district should be permitted to collect the assessment for a purpose thus frustrated, and that if money is needed for future work, the district, in such circumstances, should be left to raise it by means of a new assessment.

The judgment is reversed.

(Supreme Court of California. Nov. 23, 1909.)

1. STIPULATIONS (§ 17*)—PERSONS BOUND—COURT.

A stipulation that a similar judgment may be rendered on appeal in the present action to that rendered in another case pending on appeal will be disregarded, where the material facts in the two actions are substantially different.

2. EVIDENCE (§ 82*)—PERFORMANCE OF OFFICIAL DUTY.

Since it would be the court's duty, in an action to determine the validity of a swamp land maintenance assessment, to allow any valid defense to be shown, though not pleaded, if presented at any time before judgment, it must be presumed, in a subsequent action to foreclose the lien of such assessment, that the court would have allowed all such defenses in the former proceeding.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. § 104; Dec. Dig. § 82.*]

3. DRAINS (§ 81*) — ACTION—DEFENSES—FORMER ADJUDICATION.

Under Pol. Code, § 3493½, permitting the district board of trustees of a swamp reclamation district, within a year after filing of the lien of the assessment for maintenance, to commence action to determine the validity of the assessment and make the landowners parties, and requiring defendants to allege in their answer the reason why the assessment is illegal, and making the judgment therein conclusive upon the parties as to its validity, a landowner can make no defense to the enforcement of the assessment which he might have urged in the former proceeding, so that where he knew of damage to his crops because of the district's failure to pump water during the season for which an assessment was made for the expense of pumping before judgment in an action brought under section 3493½ to determine the validity of such assessment, he cannot set up such failure as a defense to the foreclosure of the assessment.

Beatty, C. J., dissenting.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; C. N. Post, Judge.

Action by Swamp Land Reclamation District No. 341 against Caroline Blumenberg and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Hinckson & Elliott, for appellants. Henry Ross, and J. Frank Brown, for respondent.

SHAW, J. This is an appeal from the judgment upon the judgment roll alone. Judgment was given for the plaintiff upon a motion for judgment on the pleadings.

The case involves the same assessment as that reviewed in the case between the same parties, which was appealed to this court, and which is designated as No. 1,656 on the Sacramento calendar, 106 Pac. 389. We refer to the opinion in that case for a fuller statement of the facts. The object of the present action is to foreclose the lien of the assessment for the remaining 65 per cent. of the amount thereof; calls for that portion having been made after the former suit for the first 35 per cent. was begun. This action was begun in May, 1908. The only additional matter to be here considered arises from the fact that in this case it is alleged and admitted that, after the assessment list was filed in the office of the county treasurer, an action, under section 3493½ of the Political Code, was begun by the district in the superior court of the county, against the defendants and others as owners of lands in the district subject to the assessment, to determine the validity of said assessment, that the defendants were duly served with summons in said action, and that on October 11, 1907, judgment was duly given therein, declaring that said assessment was legal and valid, and that it constituted a lien upon the lands of the respective owners of lands in the district, to the amounts stated in the assessment list, and upon the lands of the defendant, Caroline, to the amount of $6,053.15. This judgment had become final before this action was begun. There was no appeal therefrom. These facts were not alleged in the first action. There is a stipulation on file that whatever judgment is rendered on the appeal in No. 1,656, a like judgment may be given on this appeal. Manifestly this cannot be done unless the material facts are the same in both cases. As they are substantially different, the stipulation will be disregarded.

The last clause of section 3493½ expressly declares that every judgment declaring an assessment valid, given in such action, "shall be conclusive between the parties thereto as to the validity * * * of the assessment." This section was enacted in 1893. Prior to that time there was no proceeding authorized by which the validity of the assessment could be judicially determined in advance of a suit for the foreclosure of the lien. Because of the lack of such an opportunity to dispute its validity, it was held in Reclamation Dist. v. Phillips, 108 Cal. 306, 39 Pac. 630, 41 Pac. 335, and in prior decisions also, that the action of the assessment board in making the assessment, although in all respects regular, did not preclude a landowner from contesting its validity in defense to an action to foreclose the lien, and that in such foreclosure suit he would be allowed to show that his land was not benefited by the work to be done, or that the cost was not assessed in proportion to benefits, or any other objection to the collection of the assessment sufficient to render it invalid. That case arose before the enactment of section 3493½. The manifest purpose of that section was to provide for a judicial determination of such questions in advance of the enforcement of the assessment by suit. It declares the purpose of the action to be "to determine the validity of the assessment." It may be begun at any time within one year after the filing of the assessment list with the county treasurer, and it is provided that the parties summoned, if they defend the action, shall set forth in the answer the reasons why they contend that the assessment is illegal. It is provided that "the court shall decree the validity or invalidity of the assessment in accordance with what the court may determine the facts to be." This section was considered by this court in Reclamation Dist. v. Sels, 117 Cal. 164, 49 Pac. 131. In regard to the action authorized thereby the court there said: "It is designed as one of the processes to test the legal perfection of an assessment levied by a reclamation district. The property owner is entitled to a hearing at one time or another upon the question of benefits. Rec. Dist. v. Evans, 61 Cal. 104; Rec. Dist. v. Phillips, 108 Cal. 306, 39 Pac. 630, 41 Pac. 335; Hagar v. Rec. Dist., 111 U. S. 701, 4 Sup. Ct. 663, 28 L. Ed. 569. Before the passage of section 3493½ of the Political Code he made this showing when action was brought to enforce the assessment. But to obviate difficulties and delays which thus arose this peculiar proceeding was established. By it is provided a forum before which a property owner may go and make full proof of his objections to the assessment. The final determination of the court upon the matter may be used by or against him in any future action to collect the tax." We think it must be admitted that after such a judgment has become final against any landowner, he cannot, upon a foreclosure suit to enforce the lien, again object that the lands would not have been benefited had the work been done as contemplated, or that the assessment was not in proportion to benefits, or make any objection to the collection of the assessment which he might have urged in the statutory action to test its validity.

The facts alleged in defense are more fully stated in the opinion in the other action referred to. They are, in brief, that the assessment was for work to be done thereafter, consisting of the pumping operations for the cropping seasons of 1907 and 1908, that the district willfully refused to do the work during the season of 1907, whereby the land of the defendant was submerged and damaged and rendered unfit for cultivation then and ever since, and the defendant was thereby deprived of all benefit of the assessment. Nothing is said as to the pumping operations in the year 1908. It may be conceded that the right to make such defense, after a judgment declaring the validity of the assessment, is analogous to the right of a party to enjoin the collection of a judgment for money given upon an obligation the consideration of which was the performance of a future act, where subsequent events have made the act impossible. Cases holding that such an action will lie in equity are cited in the opinion in the other case. But the right to maintain such actions is much restricted. "A bill seeking this relief is scrutinized with great jealousy, and the grounds upon which the interference will be allowed are confessedly somewhat narrow and restricted. It will not suffice to show that injustice has been done by the judgment against which relief is sought, but it must also appear that this result was not caused by any inattention or negligence on the part of the person aggrieved; and he must show a clear case of diligence to entitle himself to an injunction." 1 High on Injunctions, § 113. And, further, that author says: "Where the person aggrieved has had an opportunity of interposing his defense at law, and has had his day in court, but has failed through carelessness or inadvertence to avail himself of the opportunity of interposing such defense at law, he cannot afterwards make it the ground for relief in equity, and is barred from enjoining proceedings under the judgment. It is not the policy of the law to permit persons to slumber upon their rights when they have an opportunity to assert them in a court of law and afterward to permit their assertion in a court of equity." Section 165. To the same effect see 1 High on Inj. §§ 178, 180; 2 Story, Eq. Jur. § 896; 4 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 1361; 2 Freem. on Judg. §§ 493, 503.

Applying this doctrine to the present case, it will be seen that the objections here interposed could have been set up in defense to the action to declare the validity of the assessment. The judgment in that action was rendered on October 11, 1907. The record does not show when it was begun, but it must be presumed that if any valid defense had been presented to the court at any time before the judgment, the party presenting it would have been allowed to make a showing thereof, although it may not have been contained in his original answer. It would have been the duty of the court to permit such defense to be interposed, and we must presume in this proceeding that it would have done so. The cause of the failure of consideration alleged was the failure to pump the water off the land during the cropping season of 1907. The assessment became payable on June 27th, and became delinquent on July 27th. The act which caused the damage, and which deprived the defendant of the benefits expected, was the failure to pump water during the cropping season of 1907. That season was substantially over before the judgment of October 11, 1907, was rendered. The defendant was fully aware of such failure while it was occurring, and before that judgment was rendered she knew of the existence of the defense which she now seeks to make. She had an opportunity to present it to the court in that action. Upon the principles stated in the foregoing authorities she is now estopped by the former judgment, and she cannot again set up the defense which she then was cognizant of and failed to present to the court.

The judgment is affirmed.

We concur: HENSHAW, J.; MELVIN, J.; LORIGAN, J.

BEATTY, C. J. I dissent. The validity of the assessment has never been questioned by defendants, but, on the contrary, expressly conceded in the former action as in this. Their defense is that the proceeds of a legal assessment were so misapplied as to do them an injury instead of conferring a benefit. The judgment in this case should follow the judgment in the other according to the stipulation.

PERMANENT COMMITTEE OF MISSIONS OF THE PACIFIC SYNOD OF THE CUMBERLAND PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH IN THE UNITED STATES v. PACIFIC SYNOD OF THE PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH, U. S. A., et al. (S. F. 5,062.)

1. Religious Societies (§ 11*)—Constitution—Powers.

Under the constitution of the Cumberland Presbyterian Church, which does not fix the church name, and which gives the General Assembly power to concert measures for promoting the prosperity of the church, and which makes the General Assembly the supreme authority of the church except as limited, and which provides that the General Assembly may, with the approval of the presbyteries, change the Confession of Faith, Catechism, Constitution, and Rules of Discipline, the General Assembly alone may change the church name without the approval of the presbyteries.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Religious Societies, Dec. Dig. § 11.*]

2. Religious Societies (§ 14*)—Decisions of Church Bodies—Conclusiveness.

A declaration of the General Assembly of the Cumberland Presbyterian Church that the entire plan of union with the Presbyterian Church in the United States had been constitutionally adopted is equivalent to a declaration that a change in the church name had been approved, or that the approval of a change in the church name was not necessary, and is conclusive on the civil courts.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Religious Societies, Cent. Dig. § 101; Dec. Dig. § 14.*]

3. Religious Societies (§ 34*)—Union of Religious Denominations.

The question of reunion and union of the Cumberland Presbyterian Church and the Presbyterian Church in the United States submitted to the presbyteries of the two churches involves the question of reunion according to the basis of union proposed, including change of church name, and the adoption of the plan of union is an adoption of the change of church name.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Religious Societies, Cent. Dig. § 211; Dec. Dig. § 34.*]

4. Religious Societies (§ 34*)—Union of Religious Denominations.

Two independent religious denominations may unite without changing the name of either and without any provision fixing the name of the united church; and, in that event, the name of the United Church is a matter for further consideration by it, to be determined in a lawful manner by the lawfully authorized bodies of the united church.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Religious Societies, Dec. Dig. § 34.*]

5. Religious Societies (§ 5*)—Constitution—Powers Conferred.

The power conferred by the constitution of the Cumberland Presbyterian Church, providing that the Confession of Faith, Catechism, Constitution, and Rules of Discipline may be amended or changed by the co-operative action of two-thirds of the members of the General Assembly voting thereon and of a majority of the presbyteries, includes the power to adopt an entirely new constitution, rules of discipline, or form of government for the church, as well as to change any other of its established institutions.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Religious Societies, Cent. Dig. § 16; Dec. Dig. § 5.*]

6. Religious Societies (§ 7*)—Membership.

One joining a church under the supervision and control of church courts thereby agrees to abide by the rules of the church government and the judgments of the church courts regularly made, and agrees that all his rights as a member shall be governed by such rules and judgments.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Religious Societies, Cent. Dig. § 24; Dec. Dig. § 7.*]

7. Religious Societies (§ 34*)—Church Government—Union Between Religious Bodies.

The question of union between the Cumberland Presbyterian Church and the Presbyterian Church in the United States need not, under the Presbyterian form of church government, be submitted to a direct vote of the members of the churches; but a submission to the presbyteries thereof is sufficient.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Religious Societies, Cent. Dig. § 209; Dec. Dig. § 34.*]

8. Religious Societies (§ 11*)—Church Government—Union Between Religious Bodies.

Under the Presbyterian form of church government, the only acts of sovereignty retained by the members are the election of deacons and ruling elders, when a particular church is organized, and when vacancies occur, and the selection of a ruling elder as a representative of the particular church in the presbytery and synod; and all other powers of a sovereign character are vested in the presbyteries and the General Assembly, and such powers, when exercised, are binding on all the members, whether satisfactory to them or not.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Religious Societies, Dec. Dig. § 11.*]

9. Religious Societies (§ 34*)—Union Between Independent Religious Bodies—Effect.

The fact that the union of the Cumberland Presbyterian Church and the Presbyterian Church in the United States is equivalent to a complete destruction of the former is immaterial on the question of the validity of the union; the power, under the constitution of the former, to change and amend, being unlimited.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Religious Societies, Dec. Dig. § 34.*]

10. Religious Societies (§ 34*)—Union Between Independent Bodies—Effect.

The United Church formed by the union of the Cumberland Presbyterian Church and the Presbyterian Church in the United States exists in continuity with and as a successor of both of the former denominations, and neither has a separate existence, but each particular church, presbytery, and synod established by the Cumberland Presbyterian Church retains its individual integrity and existence and property rights until some change is made by the regular authorities of the United Church having power to make it.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Religious Societies, Cent. Dig. § 211; Dec. Dig. § 34.*]

11. Religious Societies (§ 34*)—Union Between Independent Bodies—Effect.

The power of the General Assembly and presbyteries of the Cumberland Presbyterian Church to form a union with the Presbyterian Church in the United States is included in the absolute power vested in them by Presbyterian usage and declared by the constitution of the church.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Religious Societies, Dec. Dig. § 34.*]

12. Religious Societies (§ 34*)—Property—Trusts.

The property given generally to the church authorities of a denomination for the use of a particular church or for the whole denomination is presumptively given with full knowledge that the denomination may change its name or creed and unite with another denomination, and when that is done the property follows the United Church so long as its identity can be established, and the trust is not perverted by such change when regularly made.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Religious Societies, Cent. Dig. § 211; Dec. Dig. § 34.*]

13. Religious Societies (§ 14*)—Decisions of Church Courts—Conclusiveness.

The decisions of the authorities of a religious denomination acting regularly in ecclesiastical matters is final on the civil courts.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Religious Societies, Cent. Dig. § 101; Dec. Dig. § 14.*]

14. Religious Societies (§ 34*)—Union Between Independent Denominations—Effect.

The several synods, presbyteries, church sessions, and subordinate instruments of the Cumberland Presbyterian Church are bound by the action of the assembly and presbyteries uniting with the Presbyterian Church in the United States, and they are now connected with the United Church under the name of the "Presbyterian Church in the United States of America."

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Religious Societies, Dec. Dig. § 34.*]

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Clara County; M. H. Hyland, Judge.

Action by the Permanent Committee of Missions of the Pacific Synod of the Cumberland Presbyterian Church in the United States against the Pacific Synod of the Presbyterian Church in the United States of America, and others. From a judgment for defendants and from an order denying a new trial, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

T. E. Clark and H. L. Partridge (W. C. Caldwell, of counsel), for appellant. W. N. Rutherford and Beasley & Fry (J. M. Grant and John M. Grant, of counsel), for respondents.

SHAW, J. The plaintiff has appealed from the judgment and from an order denying its motion for a new trial.

In the year 1882 the Pacific Synod of the Cumberland Presbyterian Church formed a corporation under the corporate name of "Permanent Committee of Missions of the Pacific Synod of the Cumberland Presbyterian Church in the United States." Its main purposes, as expressed in its articles, were to handle and disburse moneys contributed for the establishment and support of church organizations of that denomination within the synod boundaries, and to acquire and hold real and personal property in trust for the use of such church organizations. Its affairs were to be carried on by seven trustees to be elected by said Pacific Synod. It has acquired and now holds various parcels of real property in trust for the use of local congregations within the synod, and also considerable personal property.

The Presbyterian Church in the United States of America has been one of the leading churches in this country for over two centuries. Certain of its ministers, being dissatisfied with parts of its creed, formed the Cumberland Presbyterian Church in 1810. From that time until May 25, 1906, the two churches continued to exist separately. It is claimed that at the last-mentioned date they reunited as one church under the name of "Presbyterian Church in the United States of America." The validity of this alleged union is the question to be decided in this case. For convenience we will herein designate the original church the "Presbyterian Church" and the other as the "Cumberland Church." The controversy in this particular case turns upon the question: Which of two rival sets of seven persons each is the lawful board of trustees of the plaintiff corporation? The persons who, assuming to act as such trustees, began this suit in its name, represent those opposed to said union, and who contend that no valid union has ever been effected. The defendants aver that certain seven persons acting under the authority of the United Church, and in its behalf as trustees of the plaintiff, constitute the lawful board. Five of the seven trustees last mentioned were duly elected by the Pacific Synod of the Cumberland Presbyterian Church prior to the alleged union. Two of them have been chosen since that union by those of the former Cumberland Church who have been acting as a Pacific Synod of the United Church. These seven are in control of the corporation and in custody of its property and records. At the session of said Cumberland Synod of 1906, the union above referred to having been, as it is claimed, then fully accomplished, a large majority of the members of that synod, after organizing, resolved to recognize the union and, in accordance with the plan of union, declared the body to be the "Pacific Synod of the Presbyterian Church, U. S. A.," and proceeded to transact business as such. Some thirteen of the persons present, only seven of whom were members of said synod, refused to recognize such union as valid or effectual, denied the authority of the majority to take a new name or act as a part of the United Church, withdrew from the meeting, and proceeded to organize and declare themselves to be the true "Pacific Synod of the Cumberland Presbyterian Church." This body assumed to decide that there were six vacancies in the board of trustees of the plaintiff corporation, one caused by change of residence and five by the fact that five of the former trustees had remained with the majority of the synod in organizing as a Pacific Synod of the Presbyterian Church, U. S. A., which conduct this protesting body construed to be a withdrawal from the Cumberland Church, and as sufficient to disqualify them from further acting as trustees. It proceeded to elect six persons to fill these alleged vacancies. The other member they believed to be in sympathy with them; in which, however, they were mistaken. These six persons, purporting to act as a board of trustees, have caused the present action to be begun in the name of said corporation, to enjoin the defendants from interfering with the use or control of any of said church property. The complaint names as defendants said Pacific Synod of the Presbyterian Church, U. S. A., the California Synod of the Presbyterian Church, U. S. A. (a synod of the original Presbyterian Church), and ten persons who, with others, it is alleged have organized and now control said Pacific Synod last named. It is averred that these ten persons, and others unknown, intend to cause all the property belonging to the plaintiff corporation as trustee, but now in control of said defendants, to be delivered over to the trustees who remained with said Pacific Synod last named, and the others afterwards elected, to be used by and for the benefit of persons and local churches affiliating with and adhering to said "California Synod of the Presbyterian Church, U. S. A.," and not by or for the benefit of congregations or members of the true Cumberland Presbyterian Church. The court below held that the union of the two churches had been regularly effected, that the trustees of plaintiff who acted with the said Pacific Synod of the Presbyterian Church, U. S. A., were rightfully in office as such trustees, and that the plaintiff had showed no injury.

The Cumberland Presbyterian Church was organized in 1810. Three ministers of the parent church were unable to believe in that part of the Westminster Confession which they understood to declare that the ultimate fate of all mankind was predetermined by Almighty God, some to free salvation after death, and others, whether dying in infancy or old age, to suffer eternal punishment because of the sin of Adam. These ministers organized their congregations into an independent presbytery, which called itself "Cumberland Presbytery." They expressly avowed a disbelief in the aforesaid fatalistic doctrines. It does not appear to have been the original design of these people to separate permanently from the Presbyterian Church, but rather to form some new relation whereby they could be allowed to retain their connection with that church, without conforming to or teaching the doctrines aforesaid. For a few years thereafter unsuccessful efforts toward forming such a relation were made. In the meantime their members increased, new church societies were formed by them, and in 1813 a synod of three presbyteries was formed, the Westminster Confession, with the objectionable doctrines eliminated, was adopted as the system of doctrine, and a new and independent church was organized, which became known as the "Cumberland Presbyterian Church." Other presbyteries and synods were added from time to time, and in 1829 a General Assembly of these presbyteries met. From and after that time the Cumberland Church was a regularly organized religious society, having a form of government and rules in all substantial particulars the same as those of the Presbyterian Church from which it sprung, and with substantially the same faith and belief, except the fatalistic doctrines above mentioned. Congregations of this church were formed in California, and were organized into presbyteries which, in accordance with Presbyterian usage, constituted the "Pacific Synod" of that church. The Presbyterian Church was also extended into California, and its churches were formed into presbyteries and a synod was organized by it called the "California Synod of the Presbyterian Church, U. S. A."

For many years there was, in the Presbyterian Church, dissatisfaction with the fatalistic doctrines above mentioned. In 1900 a movement to modify them was begun which, in 1903, culminated in an amendatory declaration of the belief of that church, in effect repudiating the offensive doctrines contained in the Westminster Confession, and declaring a belief in all substantial respects identical with that of the Cumberland Church. This change in the statement of the creed of the old church was immediately followed by overtures between the General Assemblies of the two churches for reconciliation and organic union, with the result that the measures by which it is claimed the union was accomplished were taken and carried out.

The two churches had practically the same plan of organization and form of government. Each local congregation was called a "particular church." A presbytery embraced all of these "particular churches" within a prescribed district. The "particular churches" were immediately governed by a "church session," composed of the minister in charge and "ruling elders" elected for life, or for a fixed term by the congregation. The powers of a presbytery were exercised by a body consisting of all the ordained ministers within its territorial limits and one ruling elder selected from each local church therein. The synod embraced at least three presbyteries and consisted of ministers and ruling elders from each local church. The General Assembly was the highest authority of the church. It was a representative body composed of ministers and ruling elders selected by and from each of the presbyteries. In the Cumberland Presbyterian Church these representatives were called "commissioners."

The Cumberland Church was originally formed as a single presbytery. In 1883, after that church had been in existence fully organized for many years, a written constitution was adopted, setting forth the form of government, rules of discipline, and the faith or creed of the church, and this constitution has ever since been recognized as the authorized and final statement in regard to all these matters. It was adopted in the manner then and always recognized by Presbyterians as the lawful and authorized method of fixing the form of government, rules, and creed of the whole church; that is, by a formulation thereof by the General Assembly, by an adoption thereof by that body, and by the subsequent submission to and approval thereof by a majority of all the presbyteries of which the church was then composed.

This constitution stated that the powers of the church were exercised by bodies or "courts," called, respectively, church sessions, presbyteries, synods, and the General Assembly. It declared that "the General Assembly is the highest court of this church, and represents in one body all the particular churches thereof." Its title or name was the "General Assembly of the Cumberland Presbyterian Church," and it was constituted the "bond of union, peace, correspondence and mutual confidence among all its churches and courts." It was to have jurisdiction "over such matters as concern the whole church," but limited by the express provisions of the constitution. It had power to "decide in all controversies respecting doctrine and discipline; to concert measures for promoting the prosperity and enlargement of the church; to receive under its jurisdiction other ecclesiastical bodies whose organization is conformed to the doctrine and order of this church"; and to supervise, control, amend, or annul the action of any of the subordinate bodies. The word "court" is used in this constitution, not in the restricted sense of a tribunal exercising judicial powers alone, but in the more comprehensive sense of a body possessing all the governmental powers, legislative, executive and judicial.

With respect to changes and amendments of the constitution it provided as follows: "Upon the recommendation of the General Assembly, at a stated meeting, by a two-thirds vote of the members thereof voting thereon, the Confession of Faith, Catechism, Constitution and the Rules of Discipline, may be amended or changed when a majority of the presbyteries, upon the same being transmitted for their action, shall approve thereof. The other parts of the government—that is to say, the General Regulations, the Directory for Worship, and the Rules of Order—may be amended or changed at any meeting of the General Assembly by a vote of two-thirds of the entire number of commissioners enrolled at that meeting, provided that such amendment or change shall not conflict, in letter or spirit, with the Confession of Faith, Catechism, or Constitution."

In May, 1903, the General Assemblies of the two churches being in session, each appointed a committee on fraternity and union, to act jointly with the committee of the other assembly in formulating and reporting a plan of union between the two churches. These committees, in joint session, prepared a written statement of the plan of union, which was reported to the General Assembly of each church in May, 1904, and was then regularly adopted by each General Assembly by a majority far exceeding the two-thirds required by the Cumberland Church constitution. The material parts of this plan of union are as follows:

"That the reunion of the Presbyterian Church in the United States of America and the Cumberland Presbyterian Church be accomplished as soon as the necessary steps can be taken, upon the basis hereinafter set forth.

"(1) The Presbyterian Church in the United States of America, whose General Assembly met in the Immanuel Church, Los Angeles, Cal., May 21st, 1903, and the Cumberland Presbyterian Church, whose General Assembly met in the First Cumberland Presbyterian Church, Nashville, Tenn., May 21st, 1903, shall be united as one church, under the name and style of the Presbyterian Church in the United States of America, possessing all the legal and corporate rights and powers which the separate churches now possess.

"(2) The union shall be effected on the doctrinal basis of the Confession of Faith of the Presbyterian Church in the United States of America, as revised in 1903, and of its other doctrinal and ecclesiastical standards; and the Scriptures of the Old and New Testaments shall be acknowledged as the inspired word of God, the only infallible rule of faith and practice.

"(3) Each of the assemblies shall submit the foregoing Basis of Union to its presbyteries, which shall be required to meet on or before April 30th, 1905, to express their approval or disapproval of the same by a categorical answer to this question: 'Do you approve of the reunion and union of the Presbyterian Church in the United States of America and the Cumberland Presbyterian Church on the following basis: The union shall be effected on the doctrinal basis of the Confession of Faith of the Presbyterian Church in the United States of America, as revised in 1903, and of its other doctrinal and ecclesiastical standards; and the Scriptures of the Old and New Testaments shall be acknowledged as the inspired word of God, the only infallible rule of faith and practice?' Each presbytery shall, before the 10th day of May, 1905, forward to the stated clerk of the assembly with which it is connected a statement of its vote on the said Basis of Union.

"(4) The report of the vote of the presbyteries shall be submitted by the respective stated clerks to the General Assemblies meeting in 1905, and if the General Assemblies shall then find and declare that the foregoing Basis of Union has been approved by the constitutional majority of the presbyteries connected with each branch of the church. then the same shall be of binding force, and both Assemblies shall take action accordingly. * * *

"(2) The foregoing Basis of Union and eight concurrent declarations shall be submitted to the respective General Assemblies of 1904, and the above recommendation, numbered 1, shall be submitted to the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church in the United States of America, meeting in 1904; and this entire plan of union shall be operative when said Basis of Union, Concurrent Declarations and Recommendation numbered 1, shall have been adopted in their entirety, and where necessary by presbyterial action."

The plan also contained certain "concurrent declarations," providing for the adjustment of details as to the standing, after the union, of the respective synods and presbyteries and other subordinate bodies of the two churches, together with other matters of detail not necessary here to mention. The "concurrent declarations" and "recommendation numbered 1," mentioned in the last paragraph (numbered 2) quoted above, referred to certain action to be taken by the General Assemblies alone, which was duly taken, and which is not essential to the existence or exercise of the power to unite.

The Basis of Union was, in the manner specified therein, regularly submitted to the presbyteries of the Cumberland Church by the proper officers of its General Assembly, and was approved by a majority of them. Prior to May 10, 1905, the presbyteries made returns of their action in the matter to the stated clerk of the assembly. The returns were reported to the General Assembly of that church which met in May, 1905. They were duly canvassed by that body, and it was ascertained and declared that a majority of the presbyteries had approved the proposed union. Said assembly thereupon formally declared that the said Basis of Union had been constitutionally adopted.

The Basis of Union was also adopted by the General Assembly and presbyteries of the Presbyterian Church, in the same manner and in the same year.

At the General Assembly of each church held in May, 1905, the matter of the union was passed without final action, to be taken up again by the respective General Assemblies in 1906. In May, 1906, the two General Assemblies again met in regular session. Each communicated to the other the fact of the adoption of the Basis of Union. The General Assembly of the Cumberland Church thereupon declared that the union was in operation and effect, that the effect thereof was that the former Cumberland Presbyterian Church had adopted the Confession of Faith of the "Presbyterian Church in the United States of America," as revised in 1903, and also the other "doctrinal and ecclesiastical standards" of that church, that the same were effective and operative upon all ministers, elders, deacons, officers, particular churches, judicatories, boards, committees, and all other ecclesiastical organizations, institutions, and agencies of the Cumberland Presbyterian Church, that the succeeding General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church, which was to meet on the third Thursday of May, 1907, should be composed of representatives from all the presbyteries of the reunited church, and that all presbyteries formerly of the Cumberland Church should elect representatives to said united General Assembly of 1907, of the Presbyterian Church. This declaration was made by the General Assembly of the Cumberland Church after a protest against the same had been made by a considerable minority of the members of the General Assembly, which protest included the main grounds upon which the union is now attacked. The protest was overruled, and the General Assembly then adjourned sine die as a separate General Assembly. Similar action in regard to the union was taken by the assembly of the Presbyterian Church in the United States of America. It is not contended that the action of that church in the accomplishment of the union in controversy was not in all respects valid and binding, so far as that church and its members were concerned. The plaintiff's attack is confined to the proceedings taken on behalf of the Cumberland Church.

The evidence shows that in California the union was approved or acquiesced in by almost the entire membership of the Cumberland Church, and that the local congregations, or "particular churches," instituted by that church are now avowedly affiliating with the United Church and using the respective church properties as part of that church.

It is claimed that the action by which the proposed union was attempted was wholly void and ineffectual so far as the Cumberland Church is concerned, that those of its members, elders, and ministers who have affiliated with and assumed to be members of a united or combined church are, in law and in fact, seceders and outsiders, without any authority, right, or power to act for the Cumberland Church, or to use or control the property belonging to that church at the time the so-called union took place, and that the Cumberland Church remains, as before, a separate church organization with all of its subordinate bodies intact, including those of its officers and members who repudiate the alleged union. This claim is based on two principal grounds: First, that the basis of union, as an entirety, was not submitted to the presbyteries; second, that the General Assembly and the presbyteries did not have the power to effect such union.

The first ground, specifically, is that the question proposed to the presbyteries and affirmatively answered, did not include that part of the proposition stated in the first paragraph of the Basis of Union providing that the United Church should have the "name and style of the Presbyterian Church in the United States of America," that the presbyteries have never expressly approved of the proposal so far as it involved the elimination of the word "Cumberland" from the church name, and hence that the attempt to unite was abortive. In this connection we will also notice the objection that neither the assembly alone, nor the assembly and presbyteries together, had the power to change the name of the church.

We do not find anywhere in the Cumberland Presbyterian constitution a declaration that the name of the church shall be the "Cumberland Presbyterian Church." The history of that church does not show that by any action of the membership, or of the General Assembly and presbyteries jointly, that name was adopted as the name of the church. The first presbytery, which was organized in 1810, adopted the name "Cumberland Presbytery." In the subsequent meetings of the church courts, and in the church literature, the church was always designated as the Cumberland Presbyterian Church. The constitution of 1883 describes the church by that name, and further declares that the General Assembly "bears the title of the General Assembly of the Cumberland Presbyterian Church." In the year 1850, a change of name was suggested in the General Assembly; but it did not meet with favor, and the proposition was dropped without action. There is nothing in the evidence to show that the church, either by General Assembly action, or by that body and the presbyteries combined, has ever expressly declared what its name should be. It evidently received its name originally by common consent from the fact that its first presbytery took the distinctive name "Cumberland" because it was located in the Cumberland region of Tennessee. The name therefore is not shown to be an essential part of the church structure. It constitutes no part of the church government. A change of name would seem to be within the province of the General Assembly, acting alone. It has general jurisdiction "over such matters as concern the whole church." It was expressly authorized "to concert measures for promoting the prosperity and enlargement of the church" and to superintend the affairs of the whole church. It is made the supreme authority of the church, except as "limited by the express provisions of the constitution." The provision that the assembly, with the approval of the presbyteries, may change or amend the Confession of Faith, the Catechism, the Constitution, and the Rules of Discipline, is perhaps a limitation upon the power of the assembly alone to make such changes or amendments. But this provision does not include the change of the church name. Nor is the name a part of the general regulations, Directory for Worship, or Rules of Order, which, by the second paragraph of the provision concerning amendments, can be amended or changed only by a two-thirds vote of all the enrolled members of the assembly. As observed in McBride v. Porter, 17 Iowa, 204: "It is the substance, and not the name, that the law regards." Not being expressly fixed by the constitution, the church name is not an essential part of it. The obvious conclusion is that it is within the power of the assembly to change the name, and there was no necessity for the approval thereof by the presbyteries. In confirmation of this conclusion we have the decision of the General Assembly, itself. Its formal declaration that the entire plan of union had been constitutionally adopted could be true, with respect to the change of name, only upon the theory that the question put to and affirmed by the presbyteries included an approval of the proposed change of name, or upon the theory that presbyterial approval thereof was not necessary. The declaration was therefore equivalent to a decision that one of these two theories was correct. This being a matter solely of ecclesiastical jurisprudence, the decision of the assembly, the highest authority of the church, is, as we will hereinafter show, conclusive upon all civil courts.

Moreover, the terms of the question, if the appellant's counsel are correct in their estimate of the importance of the name, imply the change proposed. The Cumberland Church was formed by members of the Presbyterian Church. The question proposed the "reunion and union" of the two churches, obviously meaning the reunion which had been proposed in the Basis of Union, including the change of name. It stated that the change was to be made upon the "ecclesiastical standards" of the Presbyterian Church. If the name was so all-important as the appellant insists that it was, so important that its omission would have been fatal to the union, then its name must have constituted one of the "standards" of the Presbyterian Church, and a reunion under those standards would have been a reunion under its name.

But if we are wrong in these propositions, it by no means follows that the mere name by which the two churches were to be known, after the union, was of such vital importance to the plan of union and to its operation and effect that the attempt to unite, although complete in all other particulars, would be ineffective if the name of the united church was not prescribed or fixed as a part of the plan, or if, although specified in the original plan, it was for any reason not included in the plan as adopted. The two churches could have united without changing the name of either and without any provision fixing the name of the new and united church, and such union would have been entirely valid and effectual. The name of the united church in that event would have been matter for further consideration by the united church, and it could have been determined in the proper and lawful manner by the lawfully authorized bodies of the new church. If the name has not been properly submitted to the presbyteries, and such submission is necessary, then a name can now be adopted by the General Assembly and presbyteries of the United Church. We are of the opinion that the omission of the specification of the name, in the question to be answered by the presbyteries, is not destructive of the union formed by the action of the assembly and presbyteries.

There was not, in fact, any fraud, deception, or concealment in the failure to include the proposed name in the question. The proposed union was first suggested in the year 1900. The committees to frame a plan of union were appointed in 1903. The plan was adopted in 1904. It was submitted to the presbyteries during the interval between May, 1904, and May 10, 1905. During all this time, in all its stages, the union was hotly opposed by an earnest and active minority of considerable numbers. The entire plan proposed was thoroughly debated by the entire church during this interval. In transmitting the question to the presbyteries, the circular letter accompanying it, and presumably authorized by the assembly, informed them that "your action thereon will mean the acceptance or rejection of the entire plan, embracing the 'Basis of Union,' 'Concurrent Declarations,' and 'Recommendations.'" There was no lack of understanding that the church name was to be that of the old church, if the reunion took place.

We are unable to discover in the proceedings for reunion any substantial departure from the established mode of procedure as established by immemorially recognized Presbyterian usage and as prescribed by the constitution of the Cumberland Presbyterian Church, itself.

Nor do we perceive any lack of power to accomplish the reunion in the manner in which the church authorities acted in the matter. The constitution provides that the Confession of Faith, Catechism, Constitution, and Rules of Discipline "may be amended or changed" by the co-operative action of two-thirds of the members of the General Assembly voting thereon and of a majority of the presbyteries, precisely in the manner here followed. The constitution and rules of discipline constitute substantially all there is in the idea of church government and organization. The power to change these includes the power to adopt an entirely new constitution, rules of discipline, or form of government for the church, as well as to change any other of its established institutions or features.

It is said that the attempt to unite was ineffectual because no vote of the individual members of the church was taken, and because it does not appear that they, or a majority of them, ever consented to such union. The argument is that the sovereign power of the church rests in the members, and that, although they may have committed to the presbyteries and the assembly power to change matters of procedure and form, or the internal organization of the church, yet they have not given power to these bodies to adopt measures so radical as the union of the church, as a body, including members and temporalities, with another church, involving as it does in this case the complete effacement of the church individuality, the destruction of its separate existence and the taking of a name hitherto recognized as descriptive of a distinct and different church organization composed of different members.

It is obvious that no formal vote of the members was necessary to the exercise of the powers actually conferred upon the assembly and presbyteries; none being prescribed by the constitution. When a person joins an organized society, such as a church or congregation associated for religious worship, under the supervision and control of higher church courts, he necessarily by that act agrees to abide by its rules of government and the judgments of its courts regularly made, and consents that all his rights, privileges, and duties as a member, or in respect of his membership, shall be governed and controlled by those rules and judgments. This agreement is always implied from the fact of membership. Watson v. Jones, 80 U. S. 729, 20 L. Ed. 666; Lamb v. Cain, 129 Ind. 513, 29 N. E. 13, 14 L. R. A. 518; White Lick, etc., v. White Lick, etc., 89 Ind. 151; Bear v. Heasley, 98 Mich. 289, 57 N. W. 270, 24 L. R. A. 615; McGinnis v. Watson, 41 Pa. 14; Mack v. Kime, 129 Ga. 17, 58 S. E. 184; 24 Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law, 338. In the Cumberland Church an express promise was exacted of persons uniting therewith "to abide by and support the rules and regulations" of the church, while a member thereof. According to Presbyterian polity, as established from time immemorial, the only acts of sovereignty, if they can be called such, retained by, or permitted to, the individual members, with respect to such matters as are here involved, are the election of deacons and ruling elders when a particular church is organized and when vacancies occur, and the selection of a ruling elder as a representative of the particular church in the presbytery and synod. This limitation upon the rights of members is also apparent from the terms of the Cumberland constitution of 1883. These powers are expressly mentioned therein as pertaining to the members, and there is nothing anywhere in it evincing any intent to depart from or change the previous church usage and polity in this particular. All other powers of a sovereign character are vested in the presbyteries and General Assembly. The powers thus vested are, when exercised, binding upon all the members whether the result is satisfactory to them or not. If a member is not willing to submit, he may withdraw from the church and cease to be a member; but, while retaining membership, he must yield to the decrees of the church authorities, made in the recognized and established mode. The members are therefore bound by and carried into this union, with all its consequences, unless the power to make it has been withheld from the assembly and presbyteries, which are admittedly vested with all other sovereign ecclesiastical authorities.

It is contended that this power is inherent in the membership, and that it is so important in its nature and consequences that nothing less than an express declaration in the constitution can be received as evidence that it has been delegated to representatives, or to the constituted authorities of the church. We are aware of no right or privilege, civil or ecclesiastical, which may be abnegated at all, which is so sacred that power to yield or part with it cannot be delegated otherwise than by express declaration, except when protected by some statute or Constitution, as, for instance, the statute of frauds. Human intentions and desires are manifested in various ways, and the manifestation may be equally authoritative and binding when evidenced by conduct as when shown by express statement. The evidence shows that in Presbyterian usage from its beginning all church power has been uniformly and universally considered and understood to be vested in the presbyteries and assembly. See Fussell v. Hail, 134 Ill. App. 634. The presbytery is the recognized church unit and has a voice in affairs of this character. The assembly consists of representatives of the several presbyteries, and, as the Cumberland Constitution states, it is the "bond of union" between them and "represents in one body all the particular churches." It declares and executes, for the whole church, the orders and judgments of the presbyteries expressed through their representatives assembled in and constituting the assembly. The highest governmental powers were always exercised and declared by their joint action in this manner, before any written constitution had purported to confer the authority upon them to do so. A striking example of this is found in the history of the Cumberland Church itself, in the adoption, by its assembly and presbyteries, of the church constitution in 1883. No vote of the members or church sessions was taken to accomplish this act. Nor was it ever considered or claimed that such vote was necessary to its validity and force. If those bodies could thus, in the absence of any express authority, determine the form of church government, the statement of its doctrine, the rights and privileges of its members, and the powers and duties of its several bodies and courts, it is clear that they must have power to do so now, since the constitution expressly confers it upon them. There is no limitation with regard to the particular form or mode of exercising this power. A formal or avowed amendment to the constitution is not made a measure of the power. It may be made in any reasonable way, and hence it may be done by a resolution declaring that henceforth the rights, privileges, and powers of the members, ministers, courts, and subordinate bodies shall be enjoyed, not separately as before, but in unison and conjunction with another church of similar faith and form of government, but having a different name. McGinnis v. Watson, 41 Pa. 25; Brundage v. Deardorf, 92 Fed. 225, 34 C. C. A. 304. We are satisfied that a vote of the members was not necessary to the exercise of this power by the General Assembly and presbyteries.

Although the members may not have given a formal assent to such changes, nor voted directly upon them, it does not follow that they have had no voice in regard thereto. The Presbyterian government is wholly representative in character. It has no characteristics of a pure democracy. The members exercise their will in such affairs, so far as they may under the Presbyterian system, in choosing the ruling elders, in selecting one of them as a representative to the presbytery, and in exerting their personal influence upon the ministers and ruling elders, by which means they doubtless frequently secure their desires. This government by representatives being the recognized rule of the church to which the members consented when they joined, it cannot be said that there has been any violation of the compact between the church and its members, or anything unfair, in the method of effecting the union.

The conclusion which we have reached on this branch of the case makes immaterial the objection that the result of the action of the church, if effectual, would not be a mere union of the two societies, but would be a merger of the Cumberland Church into the Presbyterian Church, or an absorption of the former by the latter, which, it is said, is equivalent to a complete destruction or annihilation of the former. Granting that such would be the technical effect of the proceedings, the power to change and amend is unlimited, and it was within the power of the assembly and presbyteries to carry it to that extent. But, as it may be of some importance in construing the judgment in this case, we deem it necessary to say that in our opinion no such consequences ensue. Each particular church, each presbytery, and each synod, established by the Cumberland Church, retains its individual and separate integrity and existence and its property rights after the union as fully as before, until and unless some change is made by the regular authorities of the united church having power to make it. The main difference in their condition resulting from the union is that they now belong to a larger body and have relatively less influence and power in affairs affecting the whole church. The entire church continues to exist, not separately and distinctively, indeed, but in union and association with the other church. The same is true of the Presbyterian Church. The United Church exists in continuity with, and as the successor of, both of the former churches. Neither of them has now a separate existence, one no more than the other. McGinnis v. Watson, supra, 41 Pa. 28; Gibson v. Armstrong, 46 Ky. 507; Central University v. Walters' Ex'rs, 122 Ky. 79, 90 S. W. 1066; McBride v. Porter, 17 Iowa, 204.

A further objection is made that the Basis of Union adopted and carried out does not purport to be an amendment of the constitution of the Cumberland Presbyterian Church, that the uniting of that church with another church is, in no sense, an amendment of that constitution, and hence that the power to do it is not given to the assembly and presbyteries, and that, as the power of amendment is manifestly a granted power, the mode prescribed must be followed. We are of the opinion that these objections require a construction of the powers of the church authorities, and of the terms of the declaration by which the union was accomplished, entirely too narrow and technical. That the terms of the Basis of Union are very general is conceded. An amendment or change may be as well made by a new enactment, not mentioning or referring to the one which it supersedes, as by a declaration which expressly purports to amend or change the formerly existing law or constitution. And the intention of the legislative authority is shown as clearly by the brief statement that the Confession of Faith and other doctrinal and ecclesiastical standards of the Presbyterian Church shall henceforth be those of the United Church, as by the most elaborate and detailed statement. The effect of the declaration contained in the Basis of Union is clear, although the words are few. The doctrine, form of government, everything pertaining to the old church that is included in the comprehensive phrase "ecclesiastical standards," are by that declaration made the doctrines, form of government, and standards of the Cumberland Presbyterian Church, and the two become one. Whether the process is called an amendment of the old constitution, or the formation or adoption of a new one, which, in effect, would be a "change," the intent is clearly manifested, and the church authorities concerned had the power to proceed as they did. The power to form a union is included in the absolute sovereign power vested in these church courts by Presbyterian usage, and declared by the constitution itself—a power which, as we have seen, was pre-existent to that constitution.

It is said that the property in the hands of the plaintiff corporation consists of donations made to the authorities of the Cumberland Presbyterian Church, in their capacity as such, for the purpose of aiding and supporting that church and its various institutions, that it is held in trust by that corporation for those purposes, and that it would be a violation of the trust and a perversion of the funds and properties to appropriate it to the use of the United Church, which, counsel insist, is a different and distinct denomination. Several answers may be made to this proposition. We have shown that the identity of the Cumberland Church and its respective synods, presbyteries, church sessions, particular churches, and other church institutions, including the plaintiff corporation, is not lost, but continues under the name of the United Church and in connection therewith. Hence the United Church is not a different or distinct denomination. There is no evidence that any part of the fund or property was given upon the specific trust that it was to be held by the church so long only as it retained the word "Cumberland" as a part of its distinctive name, or for the purpose of aiding in the teaching of the exact creed, or statement thereof, found in the Cumberland constitution at the time of such donation. If any property was so given and is so held, the right of the donors, or beneficiaries, to enforce the trust would not be affected by the decision and judgment in this case, since no such issue is raised, and such persons are not parties to the suit. The finding of the court below is that the property consists of houses of worship held by the plaintiff corporation for the members of the local churches, respectively, which occupy and use the same. Property thus given generally to the church authorities for the use of a particular church, or of the whole church, would not be affected with such specific trusts as are here contended for. Such property will be presumed to have been given with full knowledge that the church had power to change its name or creed and unite with another church. In such cases the property follows the church so long as its identity can be established, and the trust is not deemed to have been broken or perverted by such change, regularly made. Watson v. Jones, 80 U. S. 726, 20 L. Ed. 666; Horsman v. Allen, 129 Cal. 136, 61 Pac. 796; McGinnis v. Watson, 41 Pa. 16; Gibson v. Armstrong, 46 Ky. 500; Mack v. Kime, 129 Ga. 24, 58 S. E. 184; Brown v. Clark (Tex.) 116 S. W. 364; Wallace v. Hughes (Ky.) 115 S. W. 691.

We have preferred to decide the case on a consideration of the provisions of the constitution of the Cumberland Church, the powers of its judicatories, and the manner of the attempted exercise of those powers, without regard to the decisions of the General Assembly of that church upon these questions. We have supposed that this would be more satisfactory to the parties concerned. Lest we be understood to hold that the civil courts can disregard and overrule the decisions of the church authorities, acting regularly, in ecclesiastical matters, we expressly disavow that doctrine. We approve the principle laid down by the Supreme Court of the United States in Watson v. Jones, supra, and by the Supreme Court of this state in Horsman v. Allen, supra, relating to this subject. "Whenever the questions of discipline, or of faith, or ecclesiastical rule, custom, or law have been decided by the highest of the church judicatories to which the matter has been carried, the legal tribunals must accept such decisions as final, and as binding on them, in their application to the case before them." Watson v. Jones, supra, 80 U. S. 727, 20 L. Ed. 666. This was said with reference to the Presbyterian Church, and it is declared to be the doctrine applicable to all churches having a similar system of ecclesiastical government. The doctrine has been followed in many other cases and, although not accepted in England, it is the prevailing rule in this country. Brown v. Clark, supra; Mack v. Kime, supra; Fussell v. Hail, supra; Wallace v. Hughes, supra; Brundage v. Deardorf, supra; Trustees v. Harris, 73 Conn. 217, 47 Atl. 116, 50 L. R. A. 636; Lamb v. Cain, 129 Ind. 518, 29 N. E. 13, 14 L. R. A. 518; Kuns v. Robertson, 154 Ill. 413, 40 N. E. 343; Chase v. Cheney, 58 Ill. 509; Russie v. Brazzell, 128 Mo. 112, 30 S. W. 526, 49 Am. St. Rep. 542; Wheelock v. First Presb. Church, 119 Cal. 482, 51 Pac. 841; Gibson v. Armstrong, supra.

If this rule were followed, the decision of the General Assembly of the Cumberland Church that the creeds of the two churches were sufficiently in agreement to warrant the proposed union is final as to the objection that the creeds are different. The authorities would also support the proposition that the decision of that General Assembly, to the effect that the union of the two churches was constitutionally made and had become operative, is final and conclusive upon the civil courts. That decision was made after a protest had been regularly presented to that body, attacking the validity of the union on the same grounds which we have here considered, due deliberation was had thereon, and the final decision was in all respects regular. The regularity and validity of the union of that church with another of the same faith and form of government was essentially a question of ecclesiastical law. In view of its expressly conferred powers, as hereinbefore recited, it would seem that this decision of the General Assembly should put the matter at rest, so far as the church members and its subordinate agencies are concerned, even if we were of the opinion that the decision was erroneous.

The effect of these conclusions, as applied to the case at bar, is that the several synods, presbyteries, church sessions, and subordinate instruments and agencies of the former Cumberland Church are bound by the action of the assembly and presbyteries aforesaid; that they are now connected only with the United Church, under the name of the Presbyterian Church in the United States of America; that the action of the majority of the Pacific Synod of the Cumberland Church, in 1906, declaring that body to be the Pacific Synod of the Presbyterian Church in the United States of America, was regular and valid; that the trustees of the plaintiff who adhered to said Pacific Synod did not thereby vacate their offices as trustees; that the persons who separated from said meeting of said synod and organized to perpetuate the separate existence of the Cumberland Church were schismatics, and had and have no authority to appoint trustees for the plaintiff corporation; and that the persons they assumed to appoint as such trustees had no authority to bring or maintain this action. The conclusions of the court below to this effect were correct.

It is proper to add that the validity and effect of this union has heretofore been considered by the higher courts of other states. The courts of Illinois, Georgia, Kentucky, and Texas reached the same conclusion which we have here announced, in Fussell v. Hughes, supra, Mack v. Kime, supra, Wallace v. Hughes, supra, and Brown v. Clark, supra. In Boyles v. Roberts (decided in June, 1909) 121 S. W. 805, and Landrith v. Hudgins (decided in November 1907) 120 S. W. 783, the Supreme Courts of Missouri and Tennessee, respectively, held that the union was invalid. We are in accord with the decisions in the states first mentioned.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

LEAVITT v. LASSEN IRR. CO. (Sac. 1,642.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 24, 1909.)

1. WATERS AND WATER COURSES (§ 249*)—APPROPRIATION FOR SALE, RENTAL, OR DISTRIBUTION—AGENCY OF APPROPRIATOR.

One appropriating water under Const. 1879, for sale, rental, or distribution, is but an agent of the public for the distribution of such waters to such members of the public as may apply for them and pay him the legal charge for the service rendered by him.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Waters and Water Courses, Dec. Dig. § 249.*]

2. WATERS AND WATER COURSES (§ 249*)—APPROPRIATION—SALE OF SYSTEM—RESERVATION.

One who appropriates water for sale, rental, or distribution cannot, when he sells the system, reserve any part of the waters for irrigation of his private land, unless he had through the same canal and ditches made a private appropriation for use on such lands; in which case his reservation must be limited to such private appropriation.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Waters and Water Courses, Dec. Dig. § 249.*]

3. WATERS AND WATER COURSES (§ 143*)—APPROPRIATION FOR PRIVATE USE—MEASURE OF RIGHTS.

The rights of a private appropriator of waters is measured by the amount he has actually taken and applied to a beneficial use on his land.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Waters and Water Courses, Dec. Dig. § 143.*]

4. WATERS AND WATER COURSES (§ 249*)—WATER COMPANIES—GIVING PREFERENTIAL RIGHTS.

A water company having water appropriated under Const. 1879, art. 14, § 1, for sale, rental, or distribution the use of which is thereby declared to be a public use cannot confer any preferential right on one consumer over another to the use of any part of its water.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Waters and Water Courses, Dec. Dig. § 249.*]

5. WATERS AND WATER COURSES (§ 249*)—WATER COMPANIES—LIMITING TERRITORY TO BE SUPPLIED.

It would not be in derogation of Const. 1879, art. 14, § 1, declaring that the use of water appropriated for sale, rental or distribution is a public use for a water company in possession of a limited amount of water so appropriated to fix the limits of the territory to the irrigation of which it shall be devoted, and agree to supply the water first to the lands therein, and to supply only the surplus to outsiders.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Waters and Water Courses, Dec. Dig. § 249.*]

6. WATERS AND WATER COURSES (§ 249*)—WATER COMPANIES—PERMANENCY OF CONSUMERS' RIGHTS.

One who has once been supplied by a water company which has water appropriated for sale, rental, or distribution is entitled to a continuation of such supply, unless his quantum is diminished by a shortage for which the company is not responsible, or by an increase of demand by addition of consumers, when the supply must be fairly apportioned.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Waters and Water Courses, Dec. Dig. § 249.*]

7. WATERS AND WATER COURSES (§ 249*)—WATER COMPANIES—CONTRACTS REPUDIATED.

Where a water company tenders water to a consumer, first at the rate fixed by law, and next at the rate fixed by a contract, and the consumer refuses to pay anything, and claims the right to use it without charge, this amounts to a repudiation, by which any rights of his under the contract are ended.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Lassen County; F. A. Kelley, Judge.

Action by B. H. Leavitt against the Lassen Irrigation Company. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. Reversed and remanded.

W. F. Williamson and H. D. Burroughs, for appellant. N. J. Barry, for respondent.

HENSHAW, J. Plaintiff's complaint contained two causes of action. In the first he asserted his ownership of the Leavitt Buggytown ranch, containing 1,000 acres; alleged that he was of right entitled to take, free of charge, sufficient water from defendant's canals and ditches to thoroughly and properly irrigate all of these lands. He alleged that defendant refused to allow him so to take the water in the irrigating season of 1905, and that by reason of this refusal his crops were seriously damaged. The second cause of action sets forth a like claim to the free taking and use of water from the defendant's ditches sufficient to thoroughly and properly irrigate another piece of land of 160 acres, in the irrigating season of 1905; the defendant refused to allow plaintiff so to take the water, with the result that his crops were damaged. In both causes of action he seeks compensation for this damage, and an adjudication of his rights to water for these lands. The cause was tried without a jury, judgment passed for plaintiff, and from that judgment and from the court's order denying defendant's motion for a new trial it appeals.

1. Plaintiff's asserted right to the free use of water for his Buggytown ranch rests upon the following facts: In 1889 and the years following plaintiff constructed the Susan river irrigation system, by which he appropriated, for the purposes of sale, rental, and distribution, the surplus waters of Susan river, in Lassen county. Plaintiff testifies that he appropriated these waters for the purposes of sale, rental, and distribution, and also for private use upon his Buggytown ranch. The court finds that immediately after the construction of the system plaintiff appropriated and used from the waters of the system a sufficient quantity to irrigate this ranch. Subsequently plaintiff sold his water system, but, in selling, reserved to himself "the prior and preferred right to take from said system a sufficient quantity of water to properly irrigate during the irrigating season of each and every year all of the lands comprising said Leavitt Buggytown ranch." After further findings to the effect that defendant acquired title to the system with full notice and knowledge of plaintiff's prior and preferred right, the court gave its judgment that "plaintiff has a prior and preferred right to take from said system, free of charge, during the irrigating season of each and every year, water in sufficient quantities to thoroughly and properly irrigate all of the lands comprising the said Leavitt Buggytown ranch (describing it), and the defendant, its agents, attorneys, and employés be and they are hereby perpetually enjoined from in any manner interfering with plaintiff's right to take from said system so much of the waters thereof as may be necessary to irrigate the said 1,000 acres of land during the irrigating season of each and every year." For respondent, the most favorable view which can be taken of the evidence is that he made an appropriation of waters for the public use of sale, rental, and distribution under the Constitution of 1879; that by means of the same canal and ditches he made a private appropriation of waters for use upon his individual land; and that when he came to sell his irrigating system he withheld from the sale the waters so privately appropriated. It cannot be said that there was anything illegal in these acts. But when the rights of plaintiff come to be measured by the trial court, it is noticeable that he is given far more than the facts and the law warrant. Treating Leavitt's appropriation as being wholly and entirely for public use, he, the owner of the system, was but an instrumentality for the distribution of the waters which he gathered to such members of the public as might apply for them and pay to him the legal charge for the service that he rendered. As the agent of such a public use, he had no power whatsoever to reserve to himself for his private purposes any part of this water. If he could reserve a part, he could reserve all, and thus, by his ipse dixit, convert a public use into private ownership, or, if he could reserve a part for himself, he could with equal authority give away parts of the supply to others, and by this method destroy what the Constitution itself has declared shall forever remain a public use. Therefore the only tenable ground upon which respondent can stand is that, with his appropriation for public use, he became a private appropriator of water for use upon his Buggytown ranch. If this be so, then his rights to water would be measured as are the rights of every other private appropriator—not by the amount which he took, not by the amount which he claimed, not, as the court decrees, by an amount sufficient thoroughly and properly to irrigate a thousand acres of land; but it would be measured by the amount which he had been actually taking and applying to a beneficial use upon that land. His right to priority in the use of water would also be measured by and limited to this quantity. Senior v. Anderson, 115 Cal. 496, 47 Pac. 454; Smith v. Hawkins, 120 Cal. 86, 52 Pac. 139; Strong v. Baldwin, 137 Cal. 440, 70 Pac. 288. The findings and judgment as above quoted establish that the court adopted the erroneous view that respondent, by his so-called reservation, had been able to secure for himself an undetermined quantity of water, without regard to the amount which he had been beneficially using. The findings and judgment are silent upon the question as to this latter amount, and the judgment upon this cause of action must therefore be reversed. This discussion has been upon the assumption that Leavitt did in fact make a private appropriation of water for use upon his Buggytown ranch in connection with his appropriation of the waters of Susan river for public use. If, however, the facts should be that he did not make such private appropriation, his attempted reservation of a private right out of a public trust, as above stated, would be futile and void.

2. Respondent's second cause of action is based upon breach of contract. One Purser came into the ownership of Leavitt's irrigation system. As Purser became the owner subject to whatever force and effect attached to Leavitt's reservation of water for his Buggytown ranch, it is to be remembered that all other waters were appropriated for the public use of sale, rental, and distribution, and that Purser stood simply as the agent of the public in the execution of this use. Purser, while so the owner, made a contract with Grace Elledge, a daughter of plaintiff, who was at that time in possession of 160 acres of land. By this contract Purser agreed to supply Grace Elledge with sufficient water from the Susan river irrigation system for the annual irrigation of this land. Grace Elledge agreed to pay the sum of $1 per acre annually "for each and every acre of land which may have been previously cleared of brush or cultivated." It was further agreed that the water should be delivered by Purser at seasonable times and should be taken and used by Grace Elledge in conformity to the lawful rules and regulations which Purser might make. It was understood that Grace Elledge should have a priority of right to the use of water over and above all other consumers saving those who held contracts like her own. The contract contained many other provisions; but, as they touch matters foreign to this consideration, it is not necessary to set them forth. This contract between Purser and Grace Elledge was acknowledged upon February 15, 1896, and upon the same day there was indorsed thereon, but not acknowledged, the following: "For a valuable consideration I hereby assign the within agreement and all my rights thereunder to B. H. Leavitt. [Signed] Edward T. Purser. Grace E. Elledge." Subsequently Grace Elledge made a deed of the 160 acres of land to her father, Leavitt, granting therewith "all ditches, water and water rights used thereunto or appurtenant thereto." Upon this state of facts the court found that Leavitt was entitled to take from defendant's system, free of charge, "a sufficient quantity of water during the irrigating season of each and every year to properly and thoroughly irrigate" this 160 acres, and that this right was a permanent right and prior and preferred over all other rights, saving the rights of those who had contracts with Purser of like effect.

Against this judgment appellant advances many propositions of gravity, not a few of which we consider valid. Thus, he argues that the judgment itself is void for uncertainty, in decreeing to respondent in general terms water sufficient to "thoroughly irrigate 160 acres of land," without specifying the quantum of water, the kind of irrigation, or in any way the amount which might actually be needed. Again, he argues that the contract itself provided that Purser, the owner of the system, would supply water under the rules and regulations which he might make, while the decree entitles Leavitt to enter and take the water. He further argues and shows that the purported assignment to Leavitt was not acknowledged, so that no constructive notice came to appellant of the purported assignment, and that if, as respondent contends, Grace Elledge's rights were such as passed by her deed to her father, it could only be so upon the theory that an easement —an interest in land—had been created, and if such was the case, and as Purser had made a subsequent assignment of his rights under this very contract to a third person and it had been duly recorded, Leavitt's unrecorded assignment became void. Civ. Code, § 1214; Cady v. Purser, 131 Cal. 552, 63 Pac. 844, 82 Am. St. Rep. 391. Again, appellant argues, and with much force, that the effect of Purser's assignment of the contract to Leavitt, and of Grace Elledge's assignment of the contract to Leavitt, could not in law be the creation of a free right to water against the appellant; that Purser's assignment carried the right to collect tolls at the rate of a dollar per acre for the water supplied, but carried also the duty of supplying the water; that Grace Elledge's right was to receive water upon the payment of a dollar per acre; that the conveyance into a single person of all of both parties' rights and duties under such a contract could result in nothing but a merger of these rights and duties and an extinguishment of the contract, since no man can contract with himself and no man can be compelled to furnish water to himself and pay himself therefor a dollar per acre for so doing. These, and many other objections, are advanced against this judgment, with much force and learning. But the paramount question renders unnecessary their consideration and determination. That question may be thus stated: Waiving all minor objections, had Purser the power so to burden his public trust with this perpetual private right? Purser, it is to be remembered, held all of these waters as an appropriator for sale, rental, and distribution under the Constitution of 1879. He was but the purveyor of this public use, the agent in the execution of this public trust. If, by any method however devious, there can be carved out of this public trust such a private right, it must obviously result in the destruction of the public use itself. Nakedly stated, it amounts to this: That a corporation, which has appropriated water which the Constitution has declared shall forever be devoted to a public use, may contract with A., B., and C. to supply them in perpetuity with a given quantity of this water, and then, by assigning in turn to A., B., and C. its rights under these contracts, confer upon A., B., and C. a private right superior to and destructive of the public use. If this can be done with one, it may be done with many, and water which has thus been appropriated for public rental, distribution, and sale may, by this legerdemain of the law, be transferred into private ownership and use. This may not be done.

The fundamental and all-important proposition then is this: That a public service water company which is appropriating water under the Constitution of 1879, for purposes of rental, distribution, and sale, cannot confer upon a consumer any preferential right to the use of any part of its water. Even before the adoption of the Constitution of 1879 and its declaration therein contained (article 14, § 1), it was said by this court, in Price v. Riverside L. & I. Co., 56 Cal. 431: "Every corporation deriving its being from the act above cited has impressed upon it a public trust, the duty of furnishing water, if water it has, to all those who come within the class or community for whose alleged benefit it has been created." In McCrary v. Beaudry, 67 Cal. 120, 7 Pac. 264, is contained the first statement of this court in construction of the constitutional provision: "Whenever water is appropriated for distribution and sale, the public has a right to use it; that is, each member of the community, by paying the rate fixed for supplying it, has a right to use a reasonable quantity of it, in a reasonable manner." And in the late case of Hildreth v. Montecito Creek Water Co., 139 Cal. 22, 72 Pac. 395, it was said by Mr. Justice Shaw, speaking for the court in bank, in defining the public use declared by the Constitution: "In the case of a public use, the beneficiaries do not possess rights to the waters which are, in the ordinary sense, private property. A public use 'must be for the general public, or some portion of it, and not a use by or for particular individuals, or for the benefit of certain estates.' McQuillen v. Hatton, 42 Ohio St. 202. 'The use and benefit must be in common, not to particular individuals or estates.' Lewis on Eminent Domain, § 161; Coster v. Tide Water Co., 18 N. J. Eq. 68; Pocantico Co. v. Bird, 130 N. Y. 259 [29 N. E. 246]; Gilmer v. Lime Point, 18 Cal. 251; McFadden v. County of Los Angeles, 74 Cal. 571 [16 Pac. 397]. The right of an individual to a public use of water is in the nature of a public right possessed by reason of his status as a person of the class for whose benefit the water is appropriated or dedicated. All who enter the class may demand the use of the water, regardless of whether they have previously enjoyed it or not." The principle receives universal recognition, says the Supreme Court of Indiana, in State ex rel. Wood v. Consumers' Gas Trust Co., 157 Ind. 345, 61 N. E. 674, 55 L. R. A. 245. "No statute has been deemed necessary to aid the courts in holding that, when a person or company undertakes to supply a demand which is affected by a public interest, it must supply all alike who are like situated, and not discriminate in favor of nor against any." 45 Cent. Law J. p. 278; Haugen v. Albina L. & W. Co., 21 Or. 411, 28 Pac. 244, 14 L. R. A. 424; Olmsted v. Morris Aqueduct, 47 N. J. Law, 311; Com. v. Wilkes-Barre Gas Co., 2 Kulp (Pa.) 499; Chicago & N. W. R. Co. v. People ex rel. Hampstead, 56 Ill. 365, 8 Am. Rep. 690; Nebraska Teleph. Co. v. State ex rel. Yeiser, 55 Neb. 627, 634, 76 N. W. 171, 45 L. R. A. 113; Watauga Water Co. v. Wolfe, 99 Tenn. 429, 41 S. W. 1060, 63 Am. St. Rep. 841; State ex rel. Atwater v. Delaware, L. & W. R. Co., 48 N. J. Law, 55, 2 Atl. 803, 57 Am. Rep. 543.

All are equally entitled to share in the use of the water who pay, or offer to pay, the legal rate and to abide by the reasonable rules and regulations of the company. It does not follow that a water company may not make specific contracts with individual consumers which are within the purview of the Constitution and within valid legislative enactments regulating the public use. This is precisely as decided by Fresno Canal Company v. Park, 129 Cal. 437, 62 Pac. 87. But, as decided in Crow v. San Joaquin Irr. Co., 130 Cal. 309, 62 Pac. 562, 1058, immediately following the Park Case, such a contract, even if violated by the consumer, could not operate to deprive him of his constitutional right to the water furnished by the public service corporation upon tender to it of the legal rate. For the breach of the consumer's contract, the water company must seek other redress than that of depriving the consumer of his share of the supply. The language of this court in Stanislaus Water Co. v. Bachman, 152 Cal. 716, 93 Pac. 858, 15 L. R. A. (N. S.) 359, must be construed in the light of the facts there presented. The court was there considering the claim of a water company to the right to collect rates in excess of those fixed by a contract made with its predecessor; its claim being in part founded on the theory that by a foreclosure sale it had acquired the water and distributing system free from that contract. The opinion, in the main, goes upon the theory that the water in control of the company was not subject to a public use, and upon that theory it was held that the contract to furnish water to Bachman's land attached the water right to it as an appurtenance, with the right to receive water from the previous owner of the system and its successors at the contract rates. The company made the additional argument that the water was in fact devoted to public use, that if it could be thus attached to land as an appurtenance, the property dedicated to public use would be converted into private property, and that, as this could not be permitted, the contract was against public policy and void, so far as it attempted to create the appurtenance or fix rates. This argument is not fully stated in the opinion. In answer to the argument, the court cited the case of Fresno, etc., Co. v. Park, supra, and declared that the constitutional provision regarding water devoted to public use did not prevent a water company from making a contract giving to a particular tract of land the right to receive water for permanent and continuous use for irrigation, subject to the condition that the public authorities could regulate and control the use. Such a contract disposing of water devoted to public use, of course, would not technically attach it to the land as an appurtenance. It would do nothing more than bring the land within the territory to which the public use extended, and establish its status as land permanently entitled to share in the public use. It did not appear in that case that any public regulation had been made, and the contract controlled the rights of the parties. It was therefore immaterial, so far as the right to collect the rates in controversy in that case was concerned, whether the water right was appurtenant to the land as private property, or whether the land was entitled to a part of the water as a sharer in the public use, where public rates had not been fixed and private contracts controlled. This is the essence of the decision, and it does not conflict with Hildreth v. Montecito, supra, or any other cases on the subject of public use.

The foregoing statement that a water company, or person in charge of water devoted to public use, cannot confer a preferential right upon one consumer over another, is not to be understood as denying the right of such company or person in possession of a limited amount of water to devote that amount to the irrigation of a given area of land. We are not to be understood as saying that the company may not fix the limits of this territory, and lawfully agree to supply its waters, first, to the lands within that territory, and to supply to outsiders only such surplus as there may be after the needs of the original territory for which the water was procured are satisfied. This would not be in derogation of the public trust, but would be a mere regulation of use in the performance of the trust.

Hunt v. Jones, 149 Cal. 297, 86 Pac. 686, is not in conflict with the principle enunciated. A land company had acquired water for use upon its lands. It was in its nature a private appropriation. In selling the lands it sold with them, as appurtenant to them, a proportionate share of water as a private water right. It was in effect the sale by a private landowner of land with water rights appurtenant thereto, and his subsequent attempt to withhold the water. It involved no question of the rights of consumers in waters appropriated to public use.

It is, of course, a truism of the law that an act of the Legislature conflicting with constitutional provision must fall. All of the acts of the Legislature regulating or attempting to regulate the public use of waters so appropriated are subordinate to the provisions of the Constitution and, to be valid, must be in harmony therewith. We have said, and undertaken to show, that a water company organized under the Constitution of 1879, which has appropriated waters of the state for public rental, distribution, and sale, cannot give a preferential right to one consumer over another. Permanent rights, in a limited sense, such consumers may acquire. That is to say, having once been supplied by the company, they are entitled to a continuation of such supply, unless their quantum shall be diminished by a shortage for which the water company is not responsible, or a shortage by reason of the increased demand of added consumers. In such cases the duty of the water company is to supply such water as it has, fairly apportioned between its consumers. If it be conceived that section 552, Civ. Code, is designed to confer upon any particular consumer any special, permanent, and preferential right above what is here stated, that effort, being plainly violative of the Constitution, would be held void. The same declaration applies to the provision of the act entitled "An act to regulate and control the sale, rental and distribution of appropriated waters in this state other than in any city, city and county, or town therein, and to secure the rights of way for the conveyance of such water to the place of use," approved March 12, 1889, and of the amendment to that act by the act approved March 2, 1897 (Stat. 1897, p. 49, c. 54).

In Fresno Canal Co. v. Park, supra, it was held that, in the absence of a rate fixed by the supervisors, a rate agreed upon between the parties could be enforced. In Crow v. San Joaquin, etc., Canal Co., supra, it was held that a consumer did not deprive himself of the right to take water under the rate established by law by reason of his refusal to pay under and in accordance with the terms of his contract. In this case there was no refusal upon the part of the appellant company to furnish water. Respondent was tendered the water—first, at the rate fixed by law, and, second, at the rate fixed by the Grace Elledge contract. But he refused to pay anything for the water, and insisted upon his right to take it and use it without charge. This right he did not have. The utmost for which he could contend was the right to the use of water (in consonance with the foregoing principles) upon tender o' payment of the contract rate. The contract was continuous, its obligations concurrent. Respondent's conduct amounted to more than a default. It was an intentional breach and repudiation by which, whatever it may have been conceived they were, his rights under the contract came to an end. Page on Contracts, §§ 1447, 1461; South Boulder R. C. Ditch Co. v. Marfell, 15 Colo. 302, 25 Pac. 504; Green v. Covillaud, 10 Cal. 317, 70 Am. Dec. 725.

For the foregoing reasons, the judgment and order are reversed, and the cause remanded.

LASSEN IRR. CO. v. LONG. (Sac. 1,643.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 24, 1909.)

WATERS AND WATER COURSES (§ 257*)—FURNISHING WATER FOR IRRIGATION—REFUSAL TO PAY—SUING FOR REASONABLE VALUE.

Continued refusal of one, to whom an irrigation company furnished water under a contract, to pay therefor, is a breach of the contract, justifying the company in treating it at an end, and suing in the absence of a legally established rate, for the reasonable value of the services rendered.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Waters and Water Courses, Dec. Dig. § 257.*]

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Lassen County; F. A. Kelley, Judge.

Action by the Lassen Irrigation Company against John T. Long. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiff appeals. Reversed and remanded.

W. F. Williamson and H. D. Burroughs, for appellant. N. J. Barry, for respondent.

HENSHAW, J. Plaintiff sued to recover from defendant the reasonable value of its services in furnishing water for the irrigation of defendant's land, which value was alleged to be $2 per acre. The services were rendered during the irrigation seasons of 1902, 1903, 1904, and 1905. Defendant answered, asserting that the value of the services did not exceed $1 per acre, and denied that there was anything due from him to plaintiff. By cross-complaint he set up a contract made with the predecessor in interest of plaintiff, under which he contended that he had a permanent preferential right to water sufficient to thoroughly irrigate 320 acres of land, and averred a failure and refusal upon the part of plaintiff to furnish sufficient water during the irrigation season of 1905, to his damage in the sum of $2,800. The court decreed defendant the permanent and preferential right under the contract for which he contended, found that he owed $616.20 for water furnished, at the rate of $1 per acre, held him to have been damaged by the failure and refusal of plaintiff to furnish water for the season of 1905, and gave defendant judgment for $933.80.

The contract in this case is in form precisely that considered in the case of Leavitt v. Lassen Irrigation Co. (No. 1,642, this day decided) 106 Pac. 404. The decree upholding the validity of the contract is in terms precisely the same as the decree in that case. For the reasons there given, this defendant could not acquire any permanent preferential right to the use of the water over any other member of the public entitled to draw his water supply from the same public service corporation. For this reason alone, the judgment must be reversed. But, in addition, it is made plainly to appear that defendant was in default, and after demand had refused to pay for the services rendered him by plaintiff and its predecessors for the years above mentioned. He does not pretend to have paid anything other than "a little on account." This continued refusal to pay was a distinct breach of the contract, justifying the water company in doing as it did—treating it as violated and at an end, and suing thereafter (in the absence of a legally established rate) for the reasonable value of the services which it rendered. Leavitt v. Lassen Irrigation Co., supra; De Prosse v. Royal Eagle Distilleries, 135 Cal. 411, 67 Pac. 502; Page on Contracts, § 1477; South Boulder & R. C. Ditch Co. v. Marfell, 15 Colo. 302, 25 Pac. 504. The judgment must therefore be reversed, and the cause, if tried again, tried upon the correct theory, and not upon the one here adopted by the trial court—that defendant had a preferential right to the use of water, for the failure to supply which plaintiff became responsible in damages. Plaintiff could be responsible only if it unwarrantedly refused to supply water, or if, through the failure to exercise ordinary care in a matter which it could control, it suffered its supply to run short.

PERRY v. CITY OF LOS ANGELES et al.

(L. A. 2,408.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 27, 1909. Rehearing Denied Jan. 26, 1910.)

1. Municipal Corporations (§ 330*)—Improvement Without Letting Contract.

St. 1901, p. 30, c. 32, § 9, as amended by St. 1907, p. 611, c. 330, § 4, provides for bonds for certain improvements, and that all contracts for public improvement, or for furnishing labor or materials therefor, shall be let to the lowest responsible bidder, but that the municipality itself may construct such improvements and employ labor necessary therefor, and that in cities operating under a charter under Const. art. 11, § 8, the provisions of such charter as to the manner of letting contracts shall control. Los Angeles charter, framed under such Constitution, nowhere expressly prescribes that a contract must be let for the doing of any such work, but section 148 provides that all contracts for labor or material for any improvement of which the board of public works has charge shall be let in a certain manner, and that the city need not let to one bidder under a single contract the whole of any public improvement. Held, that the work of constructing any public improvement can be divided into as many sections as is deemed advisable, making a separate contract for each section of the work, or for the labor or any portion of the labor required; and, under sections 148, 207, excepting a contract involving an expenditure of not exceeding $500 from the requirements of being in writing, and being let only after notice inviting bids, the city could itself do public work by day's labor.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Municipal Corporations, Cent. Dig. §§ 854, 855; Dec. Dig. § 330.*]

2. Words and Phrases—"Doing Work by Contract."

According to the ordinary acceptation of the term "doing work by contract," it means the letting of the work, or some portion thereof, to some one who agrees to deliver it completed for a specified price, and does not include the case of one who himself constructs an improvement by means of materials purchased directly by him and artisans and laborers directly employed and paid wages by him.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Walter Bordwell, Judge.

Action by A. St. C. Perry against the City of Los Angeles and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Oscar A. Trippet, for appellant. W. B. Mathews, Leslie R. Hewitt, City Atty., Lewis R. Works, Asst. City Atty., for respondents.

ANGELLOTTI, J. This is an appeal from a judgment in favor of defendants, entered upon sustaining demurrers to plaintiff's amended complaint. The action was one to obtain an injunction preventing the officers of the city of Los Angeles from proceeding with the construction or completion of public works or improvements of any kind involving an aggregate expenditure of more than $500, in any other way than by letting the same by contract to the lowest bidder in the manner prescribed by the charter of the city for the letting of contracts, and from paying any moneys on account of such work, except where the work was done under such contracts. The real question as to which a determination is sought is whether the city may itself do such work without letting any contract therefor; in other words, by day's labor, under the authority and control of the city by its board of public works, purchasing such material as it may require therefor.

The work or improvement specifically described in the complaint with which it was alleged the city officers were thus proceeding was an outfall sewer. Counsel for defendants state in their brief that this work was fully completed and paid for prior to the giving of judgment in this case in the court below, and this statement does not appear to be seriously disputed by counsel for plaintiff. The case made by the complaint would therefor appear to be a moot case so far as the outfall sewer was concerned. There are, however, general allegations to the effect that defendants are proceeding in the same manner with the construction of other work and improvements, both those for which bonds have been voted under the bond act of February 25, 1901 (St. 1901, p. 27, c. 32), as amended March 19, 1907 (St. 1907, p. 609, c. 330), and those for which no bonded indebtedness has been incurred. We shall assume, purely for the purposes of this decision, that these allegations sufficiently present the question we have stated, and, disregarding other points made by defendants in support of the ruling of the lower court, determine that question.

At the outset it should be stated that there is nothing in the bond act hereinbefore referred to that militates against the position of defendants. Section 9 of that act provides that "All contracts for the construction or completion of any public work or improvement or for furnishing labor or materials therefor, as herein provided, shall be let to the lowest responsible bidder," and prescribes a method of obtaining such bids. The same section provides, however, "that nothing herein contained shall be construed as prohibiting the municipality itself from constructing or completing such works or improvements, and employing the labor necessary therefor," and also that in cities operating under a charter framed under section 8, art. 11, of the Constitution, of which Los Angeles is one, the provisions of such charter as to the manner of letting contracts, etc., shall control. The proviso last above quoted was not, it is true, a grant of power to a municipality to itself do the work without letting a contract therefor. This was definitely decided in Matthews v. Town of Livermore, 104 Pac. 303, 319. But it is a distinct recognition of the proposition that a municipality may have the power under its charter, or what practically constitutes its charter as in the case of towns operating under the municipal corporation act, to construct a certain public work or improvement itself without letting any contract therefor, and a positive declaration that where it has such power as to the work or improvement for which bonds have been issued, nothing in the bond act is to be construed as depriving it thereof. The question whether it has such power is to be determined solely by the provisions of its charter, regardless of the provisions of the bond act. In Matthews v. Livermore, supra, the court was perhaps not entirely correct in saying that the opening clause of section 9, taken alone, forbids any work except by contract duly let to bidders; that clause simply providing that: "All contracts * * * shall be let to the lowest responsible bidder." The court was not there called upon to carefully consider or to determine the exact meaning of this particular provision, but simply to determine whether the proviso relating to the doing of the work by the municipality itself was a grant of power to a municipality prohibited by its charter from so doing, and it was substantially held that, as is apparent from the language of the section, the sole object of the proviso was to make it clear that in constructing a work or improvement with the proceeds of bonds voted therefor under the act, a municipality might do the work itself without the medium of a contractor, if its organic law permitted the doing of such work in such manner. The sole question, then, is whether the city of Los Angeles has this power under its charter.

It is not disputed that the charter of Los Angeles in terms confers upon the city the power to construct the public improvements and do the public work referred to by the allegations of the complaint. By express provision of the charter the board of public works is given charge, superintendence, and control of such public work as is here involved; the provision including the design and construction of all sewers, and the design, construction, alteration, repair, etc., of all public works and improvements, with the power to engage such employés therefor as may be authorized by the city council. These general powers would seem to necessarily imply the power to have such work done by its own employés, unless that method be expressly or by necessary implication prohibited by other provisions of the charter.

The Los Angeles charter nowhere expressly prescribes that a contract must be let for the doing of any of this work. We find such express provisions in the organic acts of other municipalities, and the acts considered in cases relied on by plaintiff. For instance, the municipal corporation act, in so far as it is applicable to cities of the sixth class, being the act involved in Matthews v. Livermore, supra, provided that "in all street and sewer work," as well as other work described therein, "when the expenditure required for the same exceeds the sum of one hundred dollars, the same shall be done by contract, and shall be let to the lowest responsible bidder," etc. Section 874, Mun. Corp. Act (Deering's Gen. Laws 1906, p. 906). A similar provision is to be found in that portion of the same act applicable to cities of the fifth class. Section 777, Mun. Corp. Act. Provisions expressly requiring certain kinds of public work to be done "under contract" awarded after notice to the lowest responsible bidder are to be found in the San Francisco charter, as adopted in 1899, and in many other freeholders' charters. In the case of Chicago v. Hanreddy, 211 Ill. 24, 71 N. E. 834, a case much relied on by plaintiff, the statute in terms provided that "any work or other public improvement, when the cost exceeds $500, shall be let to the lowest responsible bidder in the manner prescribed by ordinance." Where such provisions as those instanced exist, as they do in very many statutes, it is necessarily clear, as was said in the Illinois case cited, that "no discretion is thereby conferred upon the city or any of its officers as to whether the work or improvement shall be constructed under contract, or by day labor." When we come to the Los Angeles charter we find that the only provisions under which it is sought to require the enforcement of a similar rule are provisions requiring "all contracts" to be let and entered into in a certain manner, and providing that the city shall not be bound by "any contract" not let and entered into in the manner prescribed. Sections 148, 207, Los Angeles Charter.

The language particularly relied on is the first paragraph of section 148 of the charter, which, so far as material, is as follows: "All contracts for the performance or furnishing of labor, materials or supplies, required for the execution of any service of which the board of public works has charge, superintendence, or control, or for the construction or completion of any work or improvement of the construction or completion of which the said board has charge, superintendence or control, * * * shall be let and entered into in behalf of the city by the board in the following manner." Then follow elaborate provisions as to notice, bids, and written contract. Plaintiff's counsel reads this as requiring, not only that the construction of any work of which said board has charge shall be done by written contract, let in the manner prescribed, but also that the whole of any particular work or public improvement shall be let to one bidder, and done under a single contract. In other words, he contends that a work like the outfall sewer or the Owens river aqueduct must, under this provision, be let as one job to one contractor. Manifestly there is no foundation for any such construction. The provision above quoted is to be read as if the word "required" had been again inserted before the words "for the construction or completion of any work or improvement," etc., where they first occur therein, so that what the provisions really mean is that "all contracts" for labor, materials, or supplies "required" for the execution of any service of which such board has charge, or "required" for the construction or completion of any work or improvement of which such board has charge, shall be let and entered into, etc. This is very clear in view of other language subsequently used in the same section. So there is absolutely no foundation for any claim that the board may not divide the work of constructing a single public improvement into as many sections as may be deemed advisable, making a separate contract for each section. Nor can we see anything in this language that prohibits the letting of separate contracts for materials or supplies, or any portion of the materials or supplies, that may be required in constructing any section of the work, or for the labor or any portion of the labor that may be required in any section.

By other provisions of sections 148 and 207 of the charter, a "contract" involving an expenditure of not exceeding $500 is excepted from the requirements of being in writing, and being let only after notice inviting bids. The charter provisions taken together undoubtedly require that wherever it is proposed to make an agreement for the purchase of certain materials or supplies for a sum exceeding $500, or to make an agreement with another by which he is to furnish such labor for a sum of money exceeding $500, a written contract must be let and entered into in the manner prescribed. But do they require anything else? We are of the opinion that they do not, and are satisfied that they should not be construed as prohibiting the doing of public work by the city itself by day's labor.

Provisions of the character of those contained in the Los Angeles charter are manifestly different from provisions requiring work to be done by contract, or to be let to the lowest bidder. According to the ordinary acceptation of the term "doing work by contract," it means the letting of the work, or some portion thereof, to some one who agrees to deliver the same completed for a specified price, and does not include the case of one who himself constructs an improvement by means of materials purchased directly by him and artisans and laborers directly employed and paid wages by him. Although the latter is doing the work by contract in the sense that he sustains a contractual relation to every artisan and laborer employed, and to every materialman from whom he purchases materials, he is not doing the work by contract in the sense in which that term is commonly accepted either by laymen or lawyers. The general legislative recognition that this meaning is to be given to the term is shown by numerous acts, to some of which we have referred, and many freeholders' charters clearly show the same recognition. Of course, where a statute or charter declares that any work must be let to the lowest bidder, there is no possible basis for any other construction than one making bids and contracts imperative. The omission from the Los Angeles charter of any such provision as either of those discussed is most significant. If it had been intended to require that whenever a proposed improvement would cost more than $500, the work must be done "by contract" let to the lowest responsible bidder, it would have been the simplest matter in the world to say so in plain terms, as has been said over and over again in other acts and charters. The failure to do so indicates that the framers of these charter provisions were guarding solely against the method of letting contracts for public work otherwise than to the lowest responsible bidder, after public notice of the work to be done thereunder; the object being to prevent favoritism in the matter of letting contracts and the payment of a greater price than the work was reasonably worth. There is nothing in the language used to indicate that it was designed to prevent the doing of the work by the city itself through the officers having such work in charge. The doing of the work being expressly authorized, and the board of public works being expressly given charge of the construction thereof, the power to construct otherwise than "by contract" exists, unless the necessary implication of sections 148 and 207 of the charter is such as to prohibit such method. We are of the opinion that we would not be warranted in holding that these sections do imply any such prohibition. The street cases cited by plaintiff were cases where the street improvement act gave the power only to do the work in the way prescribed by the act, and the other cases cited are clearly distinguishable from this by reason of the particular language used. The case of Home Building, etc., Co. v. Roanoke, 91 Va. 52, 20 S. E. 895, 27 L. R. A. 551, is squarely in point for defendants. See, also, Yarnold v. City of Lawrence, 15 Kan. 126.

In view of what we have said, the demurrers were properly sustained.

The judgment is affirmed.

FOX v. HUBBARD et al. (L. A. 2,394.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 27, 1909.)

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Walter Bordwell, Judge.

Action by E. R. Fox against A. A. Hubbard and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Edwin R. Fox, in pro. per. Leslie H. Hewitt, City Atty., and Lewis R. Works, Asst. City Atty. (W. B. Mathews, of counsel), for respondents.

PER CURIAM. The real question sought to be presented by this appeal is the same as that presented in the case of Perry v. City of Los Angeles et al (L. A. No. 2,408, this day decided) 106 Pac. 410. For the reasons given in the opinion filed in that case the ruling sustaining the demurrers to plaintiff's complaint was correct. The judgment is affirmed.

12 Cal. App. 37

LACY MFG. CO. v. LOS ANGELES GAS & ELECTRIC CO. (Civ. 722.)

(Court of Appeal, Second District, California. Nov. 22, 1909.)

1. WORK AND LABOR (§ 22*)—IMPLIED PROMISE.

A complaint, in an action for labor and material, which alleges that certain generators were erected at the request of defendant under a written contract, requiring the completion of the work within a specified time, that the work was not completed within that time, but that plaintiff continued the work thereafter under the supervision of defendant, and that when the work was completed defendant accepted it, and has ever since used the generators, states a cause of action in indebitatus assumpsit, notwithstanding other allegations, excusing delay in completing the work, to support a recovery on the theory that defendant waived the time limit.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Work and Labor, Cent. Dig. § 41; Dec. Dig. § 22.*]

2. PLEADING (§ 208*)—SPECIAL DEMURRER.

A special demurrer on the ground of uncertainty, addressed generally to a complaint stating a cause of action in indebitatus assumpsit, and containing allegations seeking to support a recovery on a contract on the theory that defendant had waived the time limit therein for the completion of the work, is properly overruled.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Pleading, Cent. Dig. §§ 513–519; Dec. Dig. § 208.*]

3. WORK AND LABOR (§ 24*)—ISSUES AND PROOF.

In indebitatus assumpsit for labor and materials furnished under a written contract therefor, it is immaterial whether the work which plaintiff did for defendant was under the contract, or a modification of it, on it appearing that defendant accepted the work.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Work and Labor, Cent. Dig. § 43; Dec. Dig. § 24.*]

4. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 204*)—OBJECTIONS TO EVIDENCE—WAIVER.

Failure to call the attention of the court to an objection to improper evidence waives the objection.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 1258–1280; Dec. Dig. § 204.*]

5. CONTRACTS (§ 300*)—DELAY IN PERFORMANCE—EXCUSE.

One contracting to erect gas generators for another within a specified time is not liable for delay caused by the acts of the latter.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Contracts, Cent. Dig. § 1374; Dec. Dig. § 300.*]

6. WORK AND LABOR (§ 27*)—EVIDENCE—ADMISSIBILITY.

In an action on a quantum meruit for work done under a special contract, the price fixed in the contract is evidence of the value of the services rendered.

7. DAMAGES (§ 22*)—BREACH OF CONTRACT.

Damages for breach of contract will be given only for such detriment to the aggrieved party as is proximately caused by the breach, or which, in the ordinary course of things, will be likely to result therefrom; and the mere fact that an injury and a breach are contemporaneous, or that the former is subsequent to the latter, does not establish that the injury is the result of the breach.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Damages, Cent. Dig. §§ 59–61, 63; Dec. Dig. § 22.*]

8. WORK AND LABOR (§ 10*)—DEFENSES.

The fact that a written contract for the erection of gas generators was not recorded, as provided by Code Civ. Proc. § 1183, does not prevent the contractor from recovering on a quantum meruit.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Work and Labor, Dec. Dig. § 10.*]

9. WORK AND LABOR (§ 2*)—SERVICES—RECOVERY.

Where one has derived any benefit from the labor of another, the law implies a promise on his part to pay such remuneration as the benefit conferred is really worth; and an action in indebitatus assumpsit is maintainable therefor.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Work and Labor, Cent. Dig. §§ 1, 2; Dec. Dig. § 2.*]

10. SET-OFF AND COUNTERCLAIM (§ 29*)—BREACH OF CONTRACT.

A defendant in indebitatus assumpsit for labor and material furnished under a special contract may counterclaim for injuries sustained because of plaintiff's failure to comply with the obligations imposed on him by his contract.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Set-Off and Counterclaim, Cent. Dig. §§ 49–51; Dec. Dig. § 29.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; George H. Hutton, Judge.

Action by the Lacy Manufacturing Company against the Los Angeles Gas & Electric Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, and from an order denying a new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Wm. A. Cheney, Frank C. Vaughn, Herbert J. Goudge, and Le Roy M. Edwards, for appellant. Oscar A. Trippet and Shankland & Chandler, for respondent.

TAGGART, J. This is an action to recover the sum of $10,992.50 for labor and material furnished by plaintiff in the erection of a set of gas generators for the defendant. Judgment was for plaintiff, and defendant appeals from the judgment and from an order denying its motion for a new trial.

The matters presented as error are based upon the assumption that the action is on the contract under which the work was begun, but we do not think this is the only form of action stated in the complaint. It is alleged that the generators were erected at the request of defendant under a written contract requiring the work to be done within 30 days from date, that they were not completed within that time, but that plaintiff continued the work of constructing them after the expiration of the time with the knowledge and under the supervision of the defendant, and when they were completed, 15 days after the time limit of the contract, defendant accepted them, took possession thereof, and has ever since used them for the purpose for which erected. These allegations, together with the further allegation of the reasonable value of the labor and material furnished contained in the complaint, state a cause of action in indebitatus assumpsit. When the generators were completed and delivered by the plaintiff, whether in time or not, whether in accordance with the contract or not, and the defendant accepted them, the law implied that the work and material furnished in their construction would be paid for by the defendant. The trial court properly instructed the jury upon this theory of plaintiff's cause of action. While there are also allegations in the complaint relating to the acts of defendant, upon which plaintiff relied in excuse for the delay in completing the generators within the agreed time, these do not detract from the statement of a cause of action on the common count. They were no doubt intended to support a recovery upon the theory that defendant had waived the time limit in the contract, and was estopped to take advantage of the delay because due to defendant's own acts, but plaintiff's right of recovery was not limited to this cause of action.

There was no demurrer on the ground that these causes of action were improperly united, or that they were not separately stated, and no motion was made to strike out either as surplusage or redundant matter. There was a special demurrer to the complaint on the ground of uncertainty, which was overruled, but this ruling is not urged as error here. It was addressed to the complaint generally, and was properly overruled. Jones v. Iverson, 131 Cal. 104, 63 Pac. 135. The answer of defendant denies all the allegations of the complaint, except that which alleges the execution of the contract, and sets up a counterclaim of damages for injury sustained by defendant because the work was not completed in the time specified in the contract. The right of plaintiff to recover the value of the generators is recognized in the pleading filed by defendant by crediting it upon the damages claimed.

All the issues presented in the complaint by the allegations relating to the excuses for delay, and those setting forth the changes and modifications of the contract in connection therewith, are raised by defendant's counterclaim and the denials which the statute interposes to the affirmative allegations therein contained. Twenty-seven special issues or interrogatories were submitted to the jury covering these matters and the injuries alleged to have been sustained by the defendant, and the findings upon all were in favor of plaintiff, in whose favor a general verdict for $11,826.09 was also rendered.

The view of the complaint so taken renders it immaterial whether the evidence of the work which the plaintiff did for defendant was under the contract, or in modification of it. The defendant accepted the work, and must pay for it. Evidence showing what work was done in the completion of the generators which defendant accepted was admissible. This renders it unnecessary to distinguish the authorities cited to support appellant's contention that there was a variance. It also disposes of the objection that evidence showing the reasonable value of the work done was improperly admitted, and the error predicated upon refusing to give instruction No. 15, requested by defendant, which is based upon the same theory of the action as the other objections mentioned.

There was, however, no objection to the introduction of the evidence which appellant complains of as an attempt to modify the original contract by parol. The references in the opening brief of appellant are to matters elicited upon the cross-examination of plaintiff's witness Wm. Lacy, by defendant's counsel, and to the direct examination of Richard H. Lacy, and in neither instance was there objection, exception, or motion to strike out. The same matter is testified to by Wm. Lacy elsewhere in the record without objection. If we were considering this matter upon the same theory as appellant, the variance would not be a ground for reversal. By its failure to call the trial court's attention to the matter by proper objection it was waived. Cushing v. Pires, 124 Cal. 665, 57 Pac. 572.

Instructions 8, 9, and 10, requested by plaintiff, were properly given. They deal with the right of defendant to a judgment on its counterclaim, upon the theory that if the changes in the plans and the delay in the completion of the generators were the acts of defendant, it cannot recover. These instructions correctly declare the law. Neither was the refusal of the trial court to give instruction 6, requested by defendant, error. The proposed instruction assumes that a provision in the contract for the adjustment of the contract price, according to whether or not the labor and material furnished in erecting the generators exceeded or fell below that necessary to construct certain other generators named in the contract, justified the court in saying as a matter of law that the changes made and the causes of delay, occurring either before or after the expiration of the contract time, were presumed not to extend the time within which the contract was to be completed, unless there was an express stipulation to that effect.

Instruction 11, given at request of plaintiff, finds support in Adams v. Burbank, 103 Cal. 646, 37 Pac. 640, that in an action on a quantum meruit for work done under a special contract the price agreed upon in the contract is evidence of the value of material furnished and services rendered. Instructions 15 and 22 correctly declare the rule of damages as stated in section 3300 of the Civil Code. Damages for the breach of an obligation arising from contract will be given only for such detriment to the aggrieved party as is proximately caused by the breach, or which, in the ordinary course of things, would be likely to result therefrom. This would not necessarily include injury caused by the overloading of its plant by defendant during the time of delay in waiting for the completion of the work done by plaintiff. It was not error to instruct the jury that the mere fact that the injury and the breach were contemporaneous, or the former subsequent to the latter, did not establish that the injury was the result of the breach.

The contention that the contract was void because not recorded as provided by section 1183 of the Code of Civil Procedure could not be sustained as between the parties to the contract, if it were necessary to decide this question (L. A. Pressed Brick Co. v. Higgins, 8 Cal. App. 514, 97 Pac. 414, 420); but, as the plaintiff did not recover on the contract, a decision of the question is not required upon this appeal. The general demurrer was properly overruled because a cause of action based upon a quantum meruit was properly pleaded.

The action before us comes within the rule so clearly laid down in Dermott v. Jones, 23 How. 220, 16 L. Ed. 442, by Justice Wayne: The general rule of law is that, while a special contract remains open—that is, unperformed—the party whose part of it has not been done cannot sue in indebitatus assumpsit to recover compensation for what he has done until the whole is completed. But the exceptions from that rule are in cases in which something has been done under a special contract, but not in strict accordance with that contract. In such a case the party cannot recover the remuneration stipulated for in the contract, because he has not done that which was to be the consideration of it. Still, if the other party has derived any benefit from the labor done, it would be unjust to allow him to retain that without paying anything. The law, therefore, implies a promise on his part to pay such remuneration as the benefit conferred is really worth; and, to recover it, an action in indebitatus assumpsit is maintainable. In such an action, the defendant may be allowed, by way of counterclaim or set-off, to recoup himself in damages for injuries or detriment sustained by him because of plaintiff's failure to comply with the obligations imposed upon him by the contract.

In this view of the action, there is no reversible error in the record, and the judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

We concur: ALLEN, P. J.; SHAW, J.

In re WASHBURN'S ESTATE.

HIGGINS v. WASHBURN et al. (Civ. 630.)

(Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Nov. 13, 1910. Rehearing Denied by Supreme Court Jan. 10, 1910.)

1. WILLS (§ 634*) — REMAINDERS — "CONTINGENT REMAINDER"—"VESTED REMAINDER."

To constitute a "vested remainder," there must be some known person in being who, by the instrument, is to take and enjoy the estate upon the expiration of the particular estate, and whose right to do so cannot be defeated by any contingency, while a "contingent remainder" is contingent if it depends upon the happening of a contingent event, which may not happen until the particular estate has terminated; the existence of a contingency, irrespective of the duration of the remainder, being the criterion.

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, vol. 8, pp. 7305–7307, 7828, 7829; vol. 2, pp. 1503–1506; vol. 8, p. 7615.]

2. WILLS (§ 629*)—CONSTRUCTION—INTENT OF TESTATOR.

While the law favors vested estates, testator's intent will be carried out even though it requires an estate devised to be construed as a contingent remainder.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Wills, Cent. Dig. § 1462; Dec. Dig. § 629.*]

3. WILLS (§ 634*) — ESTATES DIVIDED — REMAINDERS—CONTINGENT REMAINDERS.

Testator devised the remainder of his estate in trust to manage, control, and invest it, and to pay one half the income to his wife for her life and the remaining half to his daughter, each half to go to the survivor until her death, upon the death of the other, and the trust to cease upon the death of such survivor, and the trust property vest in the two children named of testator's daughter, and such other children as may be born to her, or in such of them as shall then be living, share and share alike. Civ. Code, § 694, makes a future interest vested when there is a person in being who would have a right, defeasible or indefeasible, to the immediate possession of the property upon the ceasing of the intermediate estate, and section 696 makes a future interest contingent while the person to whom, or the event upon which, it is limited to take effect remains uncertain. Held, that the remainder to the children of testator's daughter was contingent, and would go to only such of the children as were living at her death.

4. REMAINDERS (§ 9*)—MERGER—MERGER WITH LIFE ESTATE—CONTINGENT REMAINDERS.

To constitute a merger of a greater and lesser estate, the whole title, both legal and equitable, must unite in the same person, so that there could be no merger of a life interest in the income of personalty held by trustees, and a contingent remainder in fee after termination of the trust.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Remainders, Cent. Dig. § 6; Dec. Dig. § 9.*]

5. ESTATES (§ 10*)—MERGER—IN EQUITY.

The doctrine of merger of estates is not favored in equity, and the estates will be kept separate, though they meet in one person, where it would work injustice or defeat the intention of the parties to merge them.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Estates, Cent. Dig. §§ 9–13; Dec. Dig. § 10.*]

6. TRUSTS (§ 61*)—TERMINATION.

A trust in realty cannot be extinguished except by union of the legal and equitable estates; the equitable estate being merged in the legal estate in such case.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trusts, Cent. Dig. §§ 83–87; Dec. Dig. § 61.*]

7. WILLS (§ 686*) — TESTAMENTARY TRUST — TERMINATION—TRANSFER OF LIFE ESTATE.

Testator devised the remainder of his estate, consisting of shares of stock, to trustees to invest it and pay one half the income to his wife for life and the remaining half to his daughter for life, each half to go to the survivor till her death, and that the trust should cease upon the survivor's death, and the property vest in two children named of testator's daughter, and such other children as may be born to her, or in such of them as shall then be living. Held, that the daughter's transfer of her life estate to her then living children during their minority, without any showing of mismanagement by the trustees, did not discharge the trust; such a result being contrary to testator's intention, as shown by the will, which contemplated that the trust should continue during the life of the survivor of the life tenants.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Wills, Dec. Dig. § 686.*]

8. WILLS (§ 439*)—Construction — TESTATOR'S INTENTION.

A court's first duty in construing a will is to effectuate testator's intention.

Appeal from Superior Court, Mariposa County; J. J. Trabucco, Judge.

Petition by Jeanie W. Higgins, guardian of the persons and estates of Henrietta Higgins and Charles Higgins, minors, against E. P. Washburn and others, trustees under the will of Albert Henry Washburn, deceased, for final distribution of the estate. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Everett Ball and John M. Corcoran, for appellant. Wilson & Wilson, for respondents.

CHIPMAN, P. J. Petition for final distribution of the estate of deceased. After making certain bequests of money, which have been paid, the will of deceased provides as follows:

"II.

"All the rest, residue and remainder of my estate, of every kind and character, and wheresoever situated, of which I may die seized and possessed, I give, devise, and bequeath to my brothers, Edward P. Washburn and John H. Washburn, of Wawona, and to Jay B. Cook of Yosemite Valley; in trust, however, to hold, manage and control and to invest and reinvest the same in such manner as in their judgment may seem best, and to pay over to my beloved wife Jean Bruce Washburn for and during the term of her natural life one half of the entire net income arising therefrom, in monthly installments; and to pay over the other one-half of said net income in monthly installments to my daughter Jeanne Washburn Higgins, wife of C. C. Higgins for and during the term of her natural life.

"Upon the death of either my said wife or my said daughter the one-half of the income to which the one so dying was entitled shall be paid to the survivor until her death.

"Upon the death of such survivor, this trust shall cease and determine and all of said property so held in trust, together with all accumulations thereon and thereof, shall vest in and belong to Henrietta Higgins and Charles Higgins, the children of my said daughter, and such other children as may be born to her, or in such of them as shall then be living, share and share alike, the children of any deceased child, if such there be, to take by right of representation.

"III.

"I hereby appoint my said brothers Edward P. Washburn and John S. Washburn and my friend Jay B. Cook, to be the executors of this my last will and testament, and I direct that no bond or other security be required of them or either of them at any time for the faithful performance of their duties as such executors or as such trustees.

"I hereby authorize and empower my said executors to lease or sell any of the property of my estate at public or private sale and with or without notice, and without the previous or any order of any court."

It appears from the findings of the court: That the estate is in condition to be closed. All the property was community property, to one-half of which Jean B. Washburn became entitled on the death of deceased. Since his death his wife died, but prior thereto she conveyed all her interest in the estate to her daughter, Jeanie W. Higgins, and, except as to her interest in certain shares of the capital stock of the Yosemite Stage & Turnpike Company (2,662½ shares), the one-half of said property to which the widow was entitled has been distributed as required by law. Henrietta and Charles Higgins, mentioned in said will, are minors, and children of the said Jeanie, but their age does not appear, and she has been appointed and is the duly qualified and acting guardian of their estates, and they are her only children. Prior to filing the petition herein the said Jeanie conveyed and relinquished to her said children, Henrietta and Charles, "all the rights and interests to which she was entitled under the will of said decedent by an instrument in writing" (which is set forth in the findings). The residue of said estate of decedent consists of 5,325 shares of the Yosemite Stage & Turnpike Company, and 25,000 shares of the Wawona Hotel Company. Jeanie W. Higgins is the wife of C. C. Higgins, now living. In its conclusions of law the court found: That the said Jeanie W. Higgins, as grantee of her mother, is entitled to have distributed to her one-half of the stage company stock (2,662½ shares), and that the trustees under the will are entitled to have distributed to them, in trust, all the remaining property of decedent, "to hold, manage and control the same in such manner as in their judgment may seem best, and to pay over to the said Henrietta W. Higgins and Charles Higgins, for and during the term of the natural life of said Jeanie W. Higgins, and until her death, the entire net income arising from said property, in monthly installments," and upon the death of the said Jeanie the said trust shall cease, and all of said property so held in trust, and its accumulations, shall vest in and belong to said Henrietta and Charles Higgins, children of said Jeanie, "and such other children as may be born to the said Jeanie W. Higgins, or in such of them as shall then be living, share and share alike, the children of any deceased child, if such there be, to take by right of representation." Decree was entered accordingly.

The appeal is by the plaintiff from that portion of said decree of final distribution as distributes to the trustees the property described and refusing to distribute said property as prayed for in said petition, namely, that all the property except one-half of the stage company stock be distributed to Henrietta and Charles Higgins. Briefly stated, the position of appellant is: That the widow of deceased being dead, Mrs. Higgins, as sole survivor of the life estate, became the sole beneficiary of the trust, and that when she conveyed that interest to Henrietta and Charles, her only children in esse, they became vested with the entire fee; that the object of the trust was solely to collect and pay over to Mrs. Higgins the net income of the property during her life and, as she had conveyed this interest to her two children, she had no further interest in the estate, and the object of the trust ceased; that when the vested interest in remainder and the intermediate and precedent estate of their mother was centered in the children, the precedent estate was merged in the greater vested estate in remainder in fee, and the children became vested with the entire title in fee, and hence there is nothing to which the trust can attach; that thereupon it became the duty of the court to distribute the estate to the persons entitled by law, namely, to the two children, Henrietta and Charles, subject to open and let in any after-born children, if any.

1. It is important, in some aspects of the case, to discover what interest these children, born and unborn, take under the will, and when it vests. Future interests are vested or contingent. Civ. Code, § 693. "A future interest is vested when there is a person in being who would have a right, defeasible or indefeasible, to the immediate possession of the property, upon the ceasing of the intermediate or precedent estate." Civ. Code, § 694. "A future interest is contingent, whilst the person in whom, or the event upon which, it is limited to take effect remains uncertain." Civ. Code, § 695. There is no subject of the law more abstruse, or in which greater refinement of learning has been displayed, than that of remainders. No definitions ever have been, or ever will be, given which will relieve all cases from doubt. Mr. Kent commends Mr. Blackstone's treatment as far surpassing all others for its "perspicuity, simplicity, comprehension, compactness, exactness, accuracy, and admirable precision." And yet he adds: "I have read the chapter frequently, but never without a mixture of delight and despair." 4 Kent's Com. 208, note (14th Ed., by Mr. Gould).

Unquestionably, the interest of the unborn children is contingent because it is uncertain whether they will ever come into existence, and should this happen, there is the still further contingency upon which the taking by them of any interest would depend, namely, that the life tenant be then living. The interest of Henrietta and Charles is not so plainly apparent. The broad distinction between vested and contingent remainders is this: In the first, there is some person in esse, known and ascertained, who, by the will or deed creating the estate, is to take and enjoy the estate upon the expiration of the existing particular estate, and whose right to such remainder no contingency can defeat. In the second, it depends upon the happening of a contingent event whether the estate limited as a remainder shall ever take effect at all. It may never happen, or it may not happen until after the particular estate upon which it depends shall have been terminated, so that the estate in remainder will never take effect. 2 Wash. Real Property, § 1332.

Speaking of the New York statute, which is the same as ours, it was held in the case In re Hoadley (D. C.) 101 Fed. 233, that if there are words of present gift to a class of persons in existence, the remainder is vested, though it cannot be ascertained until the determination of the particular estate which, if any, members of the class will ultimately take; but if futurity attaches to the gift so that it is not intended to take effect until the determination of the particular estate, the remainder is contingent. The existence of a contingency, irrespective of the duration of the remainder, on which contingency possession or enjoyment depends, is the fundamental characteristic of a contingent remainder, and forms a true, tangible, and practical criterion by which the contingent character of a remainder is limited on an uncertain event; that is, an event which may never happen, or on an event which may not happen till after the determination of the particular estate, though it is certain to happen at some time, or when the remainder is limited to a person not in being or not ascertained. 24 Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law, p. 400.

The law prefers to consider future estates as vested, but the law also seeks to effectuate the wishes of the testator, and when his desire is clearly expressed, as we think it is here, it should be carried out, regardless of the conventional distinctions made between vested and contingent remainders, for this is the paramount duty of the court. "The will may disclose an intent not to give a vested interest. This is effected by words of contingency as to the persons who shall take, e. g., a devise to A., remainder to his children living at the time of his death." 24 Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law (2d Ed.) p. 383. In all cases it is the intention, expressed in the instrument creating the expectant estate, that is to govern, and, therefore, if the language employed shows an intention to postpone the vesting until the happening of a certain event it is contingent. Id. 392, and cases noted. The present capacity to take in possession is not a universal test. Thus, if land be given to A. for life, and in case B. survives A., then to B. in fee simple, the remainder to B. is contingent, because it depends upon an uncertain event, namely, the death of A. in the lifetime of B.; but all the while that A. and B. are both alive, B.'s remainder has a present capacity to take effect in possession should the possession become vacant by the death of A. 24 Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law, 388. Numerous instances of contingent remainders of this sort are cited in the notes. The true criterion of a vested remainder is the existence in an ascertained person of a present, fixed right of future enjoyment of the estate limited in remainder, which right will take effect in possession immediately on the determination of the precedent estate, irrespective of any collateral event, provided the estate in remainder does not determine before the precedent estate. Id. 389.

The will here provides that: "Upon the death of such survivor this trust shall cease and determine, and all of said property * * * shall vest in and belong to Henrietta Higgins and Charles Higgins the children of my said daughter, and such other children as may be born to her, or in such of them as shall then be living." This latter clause refers to all of the class—Henrietta and Charles and any other children born to their mother—and the property is to vest "in such of them as shall then be living," i. e., "upon the death of such survivor." By express terms the trust was to continue until the death of Mrs. Higgins, and that was the precise event upon the happening of which the title was to vest in the children living at the death of the testator, or "such other children as may be born to her," Mrs. Higgins. It seems to us that nothing is lacking to make entirely clear the intention that the children living at the death of the life tenant, or "the children of any deceased child" then living, were to take, and this could be known only when the contingent event happened. It is the uncertainty of the right of enjoyment, and not the uncertainty of its actual enjoyment, that renders the remainder contingent. 4 Kent, 202–206. The uncertainty of any of the children of the class surviving Mrs. Higgins renders the interest of any such contingent.

A few cases may be cited as illustrative of the principles we have endeavored to point out.

In Haward v. Peavey, 128 Ill. 430, 21 N. E. 503, 15 Am. St. Rep. 120, the will devised the estate to the testator's executors to be held in trust for his widow during widowhood, and upon the death or remarriage of the widow the executors were to proceed to divide the remainder among his children specially named, "as may then be alive, or the lawful issue of such of them as may be dead leaving lawful issue." The interest of one of the sons was sold under execution, and it was conceded that if this interest was merely contingent the purchaser took nothing, but otherwise if vested. The court said: "A remainder is said to be vested when a present interest passes to a party, to be enjoyed in the future, so that the estate is invariably fixed in a determinate person after the particular estate terminates, while a contingent remainder is one limited to take effect, either to a dubious and uncertain person, or upon a dubious and uncertain event. 2 Bl. Com. 168. * * * But it does not necessarily follow that every estate in remainder which is subject to a contingency or condition is a contingent remainder. The condition may be precedent or subsequent. If the former, the remainder cannot vest until that which is contingent has happened, and thereby become certain. If the latter, the estate vests immediately, subject to be defeated by the happening of the condition (citing cases). It is plain that, in the present case the estate devised, so far as Robert Haward was concerned (the son above referred to), was subject to a contingency, viz., his being alive at the time the particular estate should be determined by the death or remarriage of the widow. Whether this contingency constituted a condition precedent or subsequent must be determined by the language of the will. It seems to be clear, though not wholly free from doubt, that the intention was not to devise to his son Robert a present estate subject to be defeated in case of his death before the termination of the particular estate, but to make the estate itself conditional upon his being alive at that time." In support of the opinion the following cases were cited as instances where the remainder was contingent: Olney v. Hull, 21 Pick. (Mass.) 311, where the words were: "* * * The land shall then be equally divided among my sons." Nash v. Nash, 12 Allen (Mass.) 345, the language was "* * * At her death to such of his children as might then be living." In Thomson v. Ludington, 104 Mass. 193, the provision was: To the widow during life or widowhood, and directed that at her death or marriage the estate should be divided "equally to and among such of my children as shall then be living." The distinction made between a remainder subject to a condition precedent and a condition subsequent is well shown in Blanchard v. Blanchard, 1 Allen (Mass.) 223, and in that case the court said: "There being in that portion of the devise no words of contingency, such as 'if they shall be living at her death,' or 'to such of them as shall be living,' the usual and proper phrases to constitute a condition precedent, a vested remainder in fee was created."

In the recent case of Golladay v. Knock, 235 Ill. 412, 85 N. E. 649, 126 Am. St. Rep. 224, the will devised the testator's property to his wife, Nancy Golladay, "and to her children after her death; * * * and if the said Nancy Golladay does not have children that will live to inherit said real estate, that the said real estate, at the death of Nancy Golladay and her children, fall to Moses Golladay and his heirs of said county." The court held, as in Haward v. Peavey, supra, that the devise over to Moses Golladay could not be construed as vesting a present interest in fee, subject to be divested upon the death of the life tenant leaving children surviving her. Said the court: "The clearly expressed intention of the testator was to give his wife a life estate in the premises, with remainder in fee to such of her children as might be living at the time of her death; then, to meet the possibility that his wife might die leaving no children surviving her, he made the devise over to Moses Golladay and his heirs. Here the devise depended upon a dubious and uncertain contingency; that is, the death of the life tenant without leaving children surviving her."

In U. S. Trust Co. v. Roche, 116 N. Y. 120, 22 N. E. 265, by a trust deed a life estate was given to Anna S. Stagg, remainder to her children living at the time of her death. In an action to foreclose a mortgage during the life of Anna it was held that her children were not necessary parties. The court said: "No legal estate in remainder, vested or contingent, was created by the deed of trust, but the entire legal estate was vested in the trustee, where it now remains, and James C. Foster (child of Anna) has no legal estate of any kind to protect. * * * James C. Foster has not a vested interest in the subject of the trust, nor its avails. His interest is contingent upon his surviving his mother."

In Smith v. Edwards, 88 N. Y. 103, certain property was to be distributed at the time of the marriage or majority of the youngest grandchild who "may then be living." The court discussed at some length the question as to the time the interest vested. The court said: "The condition of survival attached to the gift itself; who the legatees would in fact prove to be depended upon a future contingency. Those who were to take in the prescribed event were uncertain until it happened; might not be any of those in esse at testator's death, and might prove to be a grandchild born 20 years later."

In Everitt v. Everitt, 29 N. Y. 75, the court said: "The leading inquiry upon which the question of vesting or not vesting turns is whether the gift is immediate, and the time of payment, or of enjoyment only postponed, or is future and contingent, depending upon the beneficiary arriving of age or surviving some other person, or the like. If futurity is annexed to the substance of the gift, the vesting is suspended; but if it appear to relate to the time of payment only, the legacy vests instanter."

For the rule in England, see chapter 2, 2 Redfield on Wills (2d Ed.) 213. This author says: "Where a gift over is made to take effect in favor of a class, it is in general held that the gift in remainder is contingent as to the individual devisees, since the persons composing the class are not to be ascertained until the period of the determination of the intervening estate, and, there could be no vesting until the devisees are ascertained." Id. p. 239. While in many cases this, as all other rules, is made to bend to circumstances, it is everywhere held that it is competent for the testator in terms to direct whether the estate shall vest or not, and where this is done all construction is excluded. Id. p. 244.

Giving a fair construction to the will and yielding to the apparent intention of the testator, we reach the conclusion that the remainder is contingent, and will go to such of the class only as may be living at the death of Mrs. Higgins.

We might, perhaps, have rested the question with the decision in the case of In re Winter, 114 Cal. 186, 45 Pac. 1063, had we not thought it best to again examine the matter. In that case the will bequeathed to the testator's wife all of his estate except a certain ranch, which latter he bequeathed to her "for the remainder of her life; then it is to be sold and the proceeds divided between my surviving brothers and sisters." It was held that "it was reasonably clear the intention of the testator was to bequeath the money proceeds of the ranch to those brothers and sisters living at the time appointed in the will for the distribution of the money."

2. Appellant's further contention is that the children named not only took a vested remainder, but that when the lesser estate, i. e., the life estate, was conveyed to them, it became merged in the greater estate, i. e., the remainder; that the trust was thus terminated and immediately they were entitled to the fee absolute. Considered as a contingent remainder, however, there could be no merger, for the fee is in the trustees. The definition of a merger precludes the possibility of its happening where a life estate and a contingent estate only are united. The whole title, legal as well as equitable, must unite in one and the same person. Where the two thus meet, without any intermediate estate, the less is immediately annihilated, or, in law phrase, "merged." Anderson's Dictionary; 2 Bl. Com. 397; 1 Kent, 265. The merger here claimed is of interests in personal property, and, if the doctrine of merger may apply in such case, which is certainly unusual, the same principles would apply as in cases of real estate, we should think. Where a trust has once been created in respect of real estate, it attaches to and binds itself upon the estate, and can never be detached from it, or extinguished, except by a union of the legal and equitable estates in one person; the equitable, in such case, being merged in the legal estate. 2 Wash. Real Property, § 1469. To have the union operate a merger, the estates must unite in one and the same person, having a commensurate and coextensive interest in each, with no intervening interest in another. A legal estate in fee in one who has only a partial equitable interest, or vice versa, would not merge. Id. § 1484. Wherever it would work injustice, or defeat the intention of the donor to work a merger, the two estates will be kept alive although they come together in one person. Id. § 1486. While merger at law follows immediately upon the union of a greater and lesser estate in the same ownership, it does not so follow in equity. There the doctrine is not favored, and the estates will be kept separate where the intention of the parties and justice require it. Smith v. Roberts, 91 N. Y. 475. The court said, in Pryor v. Winter, 147 Cal. 554, 82 Pac. 202, 109 Am. St. Rep. 162: "Section 741 of the Civil Code expressly declares—what was always the law—that 'no future interest can be defeated or barred by any alienation or other act of the owner of the intermediate or particular interest.'"

3. But if we are wrong in holding the remainder to be contingent, we find insuperable objections to the scheme worked out by appellant. The object of the transfer doubtless was to discharge the trust, the benefits of which the mother was willing to forego that she might, at least during their minority, manage and control the property for her children, freed from any restraints by the trustees. Is this allowable by the simple expedient of a transfer of the life estate, and in the absence of any pretense of mismanagement or fraud of the trustees? Aside from the question, raised in the briefs, that this may not be done, except by bill in equity (a question we do not find it necessary to decide), it seems to us that to carry out appellant's plan we must fly in the face of the testator's express directions, and this would be violative of the first duty of the court, namely, to effectuate his intention. The will bears the earmarks of skilled professional workmanship. That it was drawn with a view to have its provisions faithfully, and at least substantially, followed cannot be doubted. The testator selected near of kin as his trustees and devised the property to them in trust with power to manage and control the property and pay over the incomes to his widow and daughter for their support and maintenance and to the successor of either of them. He expressly provided that the trust should continue during the life of the survivor, whichever one it might be, and he expressly declared that the property was to vest in the children of his daughter then living, or who might thereafter be born to her, at the death of the survivor, who might happen to be his widow, and not sooner. The character of the property suggests a necessity for wise and prudent management, for it consists of shares in a stage company and in a hotel property. If the testator had thought it unnecessary to place the management in the hands of his chosen trustees, and for the period named by him, an entirely different method would have been adopted. But his desire was not only to provide support for his widow and daughter and the survivor of either, but to preserve the corpus of the estate for his daughter's children, and the duties of the trustees were to cease "upon the death of such survivor," the property and the accumulation to then vest in the children. It must not be overlooked that the will devises the property to the trustees, and it is only the incomes which are to be paid to the widow and daughter. The remaindermen come into their own at the termination of the trust, the period of which is definitely fixed. The trustees were given power to lease or sell any of the property at public or private sale with or without notice, and without the previous order of any court, and the testator's confidence in his trustees was such that he directed that no bond or other security be required of them, or either of them, at any time for the faithful performance of their duties. All these important powers and duties are to be no longer imposed upon any one, and the control and management of the property is to pass to these two minor children, with absolutely no provision for the protection of unborn children, except upon the principle that should any appear hereafter the estate will open and let them in. The property involved is all personal property—shares in corporations—and may pass by indorsement. The decree prayed for places no restrictions upon these children in the disposition of the property, and it would be extremely difficult to so frame a decree as would protect unborn heirs, as might readily be done if the property were real estate. These children could vote the stock only through their guardian (Civ. Code, § 313); and, if an action in court should become necessary, it must be conducted by a guardian (Civ. Code, § 42).

Counsel for appellant was asked by my associate, Judge HART, at the argument, how he would frame a decree that would place the entire trust fund in the hands of two minors and their guardian, and at the same time adequately protect the unborn children, and no satisfactory answer was forthcoming. The difficulties of accomplishing such a task are many. For myself I can see no way, if the estate is to be distributed to these children, except to establish by the decree some sort of a substituted trust for that created by the testator, and how can these minors act as trustees during minority? But why struggle to set aside the careful, well-considered and entirely sufficient means of effecting the testator's object which he provided?

It is altogether too narrow a view of the trust to say that the testator's widow and her daughter were the only beneficiaries of the will, or that they were the principal or only objects of testator's bounty. They were to receive only the incomes, rents, and profits; the corpus of the estate was to be husbanded, managed, and controlled for the benefit of two children then living and others who might come after; the latter a probable event for Mrs. Higgins' husband is living. The control and management of the estate was a large consideration with the testator. and, that the property might be protected and safely transmitted to the remaindermen was doubtless also of much concern to the testator in selecting his trustees. It is inconceivable that he ever thought it possible, or ever intended, that the scheme he had so carefully devised for the benefit of all concerned should be disregarded, and one wholly inadequate to accomplish his object substituted. What say the courts upon this question?

In Walker v. Sharpe, 68 N. C. 363, a life estate was given the widow, remainder to her children at her death. The children were all of age, and the widow joined with them for a dissolution of the trust. There was no possibility of other issue, and the trustees did not object. It was held that the children's interest vested at the death of their mother, and her surrender of the life estate was without a valuable consideration, and was not entitled to the approval of the equity court. In Brady v. Walters, 55 Ga. 25, the land was conveyed to B., the wife of C., for her sole and separate use, and the use of her children born and to be born. Held, that a trust estate was created in B., and for the use of her children, and that the trust was not executed until all probability of the birth of any more children had become extinct. In Brandenberg v. Thorndike, 139 Mass. 102, 28 N. E. 575, a life estate was given to the widow, remainder to be paid three years after her death to certain named nieces and nephews then surviving. The widow waived her life estate and took her dower instead. The court said: "We must construe the bequest in favor of the nieces and nephews in the same manner as if the widow had accepted the provisions of the will. Recurring to his bequest, it is clear that it cannot now be determined who will take under it. It is a bequest to the nieces and nephews 'then surviving' and to the issue of each niece or nephew 'the deceased leaving issue them surviving.' It cannot be known that any of the nieces and nephews now living will take anything under this bequest. This furnishes a conclusive reason why the trust cannot now be terminated." The doctrine is stated in 28 Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law (2d Ed.) p. 946: "Where a trust is in favor of the children now living, or that may hereafter be born of certain parents, the trustees will retain the title as long as there is a possibility of issue, which in the eye of the law continues as long as the woman lives, or coverture exists." Godfrey v. Roberts, 65 N. J. Eq. 323, 55 Atl. 353; Bearden v. White (Tenn.) 42 S. W. 476. Cases where all the interested parties, or parties who may be interested in the future, are in esse and acting, or capable of acting, suo jure, are not in point here, and do not apply to a trust where the persons who are to take can only be determined at the termination of the life estate or death of the life tenant.

We think the trial court reached a correct conclusion, and the judgment is therefore affirmed.

NEVIN v. GARY et al. (Civ. 708.)

(Court of Appeal, Second District, California. Nov. 20, 1909. Rehearing Denied by Supreme Court Jan. 19, 1910.)

1. CONSPIRACY (§ 18*)—FRAUD—SUFFICIENCY OF COMPLAINT.

The complaint alleged that defendants conspired to defraud plaintiff, and, in furtherance thereof, caused her to make a contract with part of defendants, by which she subscribed a certain sum for the purchase of land, no subscription to be payable until a certain amount had been subscribed, and that one of such conspirators falsely represented that that sum had been subscribed, and plaintiff, acting upon such information, paid her subscription to such conspirator, and thereafter two other defendants represented to her that her subscription had not been paid over to the corporation which was to purchase the land and that she would forfeit her interest unless she paid a further sum, and, upon such representation, instead of paying the amount demanded, plaintiff executed a note to the corporation, which was one of the conspirators, and delivered it to be held as security for the payment of such sum until a settlement was had as to the original subscription, and the note was subsequently indorsed to another who sued plaintiff thereon, that no land was ever purchased by the corporation, its option to purchase having expired before plaintiff paid the amount of her subscription or executed the note, all of which defendants knew. Held, that the complaint sufficiently alleged that the wrongful acts were done with the knowledge and procurement of each and all the defendants.

2. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 934*) — REVIEW — PRESUMPTIONS.

Though the allegation of conspiracy was immaterial and not admitted by default, it will be presumed on appeal that the court heard and determined the facts establishing a joint liability.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 3778; Dec. Dig. § 934.*]

3. PLEADING (§ 433*)—SUFFICIENCY OF ALLEGATIONS—RELIANCE ON FRAUDULENT REPRESENTATIONS—AIDER BY JUDGMENT.

A complaint alleging by fair inference that plaintiff relied on representations made to her by defendants and was induced to act thereby was sufficient after judgment.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Pleading, Cent. Dig. § 1456; Dec. Dig. § 433.*]

4. JUDGMENT (§ 239*)—AGAINST PART OF DEFENDANTS.

Where the complaint in an action against several defendants alleges a cause of action for deceit by the procurement of the defendants, plaintiff can recover from such of defendants as are shown to have co-operated in injuring her, though a conspiracy of all the defendants is alleged, conspiracy not being the gist of the action.

5. PLEADING (§ 34*)—COMPLAINT—CONSTRUCTION—CONSTRUING WHOLE PLEADING.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Frank F. Oster, Judge.

Action by W. G. Nevin against C. N. Gary and others. From a default judgment for plaintiff, three of defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Joseph W. Callahan, for appellants. S. S. Sanders, for respondent.

ALLEN, P. J. It is averred in the verified complaint filed by plaintiff that all of the defendants named entered into a conspiracy to cheat and defraud plaintiff and others out of money and property, and, in furtherance thereof, caused a certain contract to be entered into between plaintiff and the defendants other than the Palms Land, Light & Water Company, by which it was agreed by the subscribers, respectively, to pay certain sums of money in order to raise a fund for the purchase of certain real property, no part of which fund was payable until $90,000 had been subscribed, and, in that event, 25 per cent. of the amount subscribed was made payable and the remainder when necessary to complete the purchase. It is averred: That said $90,000 was never subscribed and no land was in fact ever purchased, or intended to be purchased, facts well known at all times by the defendants. That C. D. Pollock, one of the said conspirators, represented to plaintiff that said $90,000 had been subscribed for the purchase of said land, and plaintiff, acting upon this information, paid him the sum of $700 upon her subscription. That thereafter F. B. Clarke, Jr., and C. N. Gary, two of said defendants, represented to plaintiff that such full subscription had been raised, and that Pollock, to whom plaintiff had paid $700, had not paid to the syndicate the money paid by plaintiff, and that, unless plaintiff paid the further sum of $250, she would forfeit her interest in said syndicate and said contract. That upon said representation, in lieu of paying said $250 demanded, plaintiff executed a promissory note payable to the Palms Land, Light & Water Company (a corporation), which corporation is alleged to have been one of the conspirators, and delivered the same to F. B. Clarke, Jr., one of defendants, as her agent, to be by such agent held as security for the payment of the $250 so demanded until a settlement could be effected as to the original payment of $700, and no other or further consideration was ever received by plaintiff for said note. That said corporation assigned said note, before maturity, to its president, C. N. Gary, who, in turn, indorsed and transferred the same to a bank. That two of the conspirators, one of whom was the president of the corporation and the other the party to whom the $700 was paid, subsequently paid $350 to said bank as part payment of said note, and the bank instituted suit against plaintiff to recover the sum of $350 and interest, the balance of said note. It is averred that no land was ever purchased, or intended to be purchased, by said syndicate; that, while said syndicate had an option for the purchase of land, the same had expired before the $700 was collected from plaintiff, or the note executed, all of which was well known by those receiving the money and the note, and that such false representations were made for the purpose of cheating and defrauding plaintiff. Plaintiff prays judgment for the money paid and the sum of $350 and interest, for which she is liable to said bank. Summons was regularly served upon all of defendants and they all suffered default, and judgment was rendered for the amount claimed in the complaint on November 11, 1908. Thereafter, on March 29, 1909, notice of appeal from said judgment was given by three of the defendants, Ward, Clarke, and the corporation.

Appellants contend that the complaint does not state a cause of action against the corporation, or James P. Ward, nor against the defendants jointly, and that several causes of action ex contractu and ex delicto are united. It may be observed that no cause of action is based upon the contract, but the same is disaffirmed, and plaintiff, if a cause of action is stated, is entitled to relief for the injury from such of the defendants as she can show have united or co-operated in doing her a wrong. More v. Finger, 128 Cal. 319, 60 Pac. 933. The action is one to recover money obtained from plaintiff by fraud and deceit. Section 585, Code Civ. Proc., provides that in actions other than those arising from contract, if no answer is filed within the time specified in the summons, the plaintiff may apply to the court for the relief demanded in the complaint. The judgment shows an application for such relief and the granting of the same by the court. The complaint alleging a conspiracy to do the things complained of while not the gist of the action is the equivalent of an allegation that the things done were with the knowledge and procurement of each and all so engaged; and were we to acquiesce in appellants' proposition that the allegation of conspiracy was not a necessary or material one, and the default therefore did not admit the same, yet in support of the judgment it must be presumed that the court, on the application of plaintiff for the relief, heard and determined the facts establishing the joint wrongdoing.

It is insisted, further, that the complaint is defective, in that it is not averred that the false and fraudulent representations were the inducements to enter into the transaction. The complaint is most unhappily worded, and can only be said to state a cause of action through the application of the rule that, where a fact is stated only inferentially and no demurrer is interposed, the pleading will be held good after judgment. Estate of Behrens, 130 Cal. 418, 62 Pac. 603; Hill v. Haskin, 51 Cal. 175. And, as said by Mr. Justice Henshaw in Alexander v. McDow, 108 Cal. 29, 41 Pac. 25: "While a judgment will not relieve from the entire absence of a necessary averment, it will cure defects in all such averments as may by fair and reasonable intendment be found to have been pleaded, although defectively" —and in which last case it was held that a defective averment might be aided by subsequent statements. The necessity for this is obvious. That one may determine from inference the meaning and force of a word or expression, a consideration of the circumstances under which it is used and the end apparently sought to be obtained is the surest and safest guide.

We have before us a complaint charging dishonesty and bad faith upon the part of defendants, and the procurement of money through a well-matured and effective scheme to defraud, through the operation of which, without any consideration, money was obtained from the plaintiff. Considering plaintiff's statements with reference to the frauds practiced and that she acted thereon, we feel able to say that by fair intendment she sought to charge, and by fair inference it may be said she alleged, although defectively, that she relied upon such statements and that they were inducements for her to act. If her statement that she acted upon the representations is the equivalent of reliance, it follows that "a reliance upon the representations of another person in respect of any fact necessarily implies a belief in the truth of the statement thus made." Mabry v. Randolph, 7 Cal. App. 426, 94 Pac. 406. We recognize that in this construction of the pleadings we have gone to the fullest extent possible under the rule, but we feel that the statement in Cushing v. Pires, 124 Cal. 665, 57 Pac. 572, that appellate courts will not be overzealous in finding defects in the complaint after trial or judgment has peculiar application to the pleading under consideration, especially in view of the gravity of the charges and the admission of their truth occasioned by the default.

We do not appreciate the force of appellants' contention that it does not appear that the relation of defendants to plaintiff by virtue of the agreement was any other or different from that of any of the other parties to said agreement, and that plaintiff's opportunities for information were not equal to those of the other defendants. This objection, we think, is fully answered by the allegations of the complaint with reference to the scheme to defraud this particular plaintiff and others not implicated in such scheme. We are of opinion, therefore, that, applying the rules of construction above stated, the complaint does state a cause of action against said defendants jointly sufficient to sustain the judgment by default. The judgment was within the demand of the complaint.

There is no merit in respondent's contention that the right of appeal is subordinate to an application for relief under section 473, Code Civ. Proc.

Judgment affirmed.

GAVIN v. PHILLIPS et al. (Civ. 698.)

(Court of Appeal, First District, California. Nov. 22, 1909.)

1. Appeal and Error (§ 544*) — Review — Scope.

On appeal from a judgment on the judgment roll without the bill of exceptions, the only question presented is whether the judgment is supported by the findings, which must be regarded as conclusive.

2. Judgment (§ 668*) — Conclusiveness — Homestead—Rights of Surviving Children.

Where a husband's homestead was sold to his wife under judgments against him from which no appeal was taken, one being a judgment given by divorce decree, and the other being a judgment for use and occupation after the first sale, his surviving son, who was also a party to the latter judgment, was estopped by the judgments from maintaining ejectment against the wife's devisee.

3. Adverse Possession (§ 74*)—Effect.

Adverse possession under a probate decree distributing land purchased at a sheriff's sale, the land being inclosed as provided by Code Civ. Proc. § 323, will bar ejectment by the debtor's heir, where such possession has been held for the period prescribed by section 318.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; James M. Troutt, Judge.

Ejectment by Charles J. Gavin against John Sullivan Phillips and others. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Louis Hirsch and T. M. O'Connor, for appellant. Platt & Bayne, for respondents.

COOPER, P. J. This was an action in ejectment to recover the possession of the premises described in the complaint. The defendants had judgment, and this appeal is from the judgment on the judgment roll without a bill of exceptions. The only question before us is as to whether or not the judgment is supported by the findings. We are not at liberty to investigate any question of fact, and must regard the findings as conclusive.

It appears from the findings that in December, 1875, one Patrick Gavin, a widower, whose family consisted of himself and three sons, including the plaintiff, was the owner, as his separate property, of the premises described, and at that time he duly executed and recorded a declaration of homestead upon said premises for the benefit of himself and family. Subsequently to the filing of the declaration of homestead the said Patrick Gavin again married; but afterwards, to wit, in April, 1889, a decree of divorce was granted to his second wife Mary Jane Gavin. In the said action for divorce the said Patrick Gavin appeared and contested the same, with the result that the decree of divorce was granted to the plaintiff therein against Patrick Gavin, and by the decree a judgment was given in favor of the plaintiff in said action for the sum of $2,600, which was, by the terms of said decree, made a lien upon the property described in the complaint, and the court directed that unless the said sum of $2,600 was paid within ninety days of the entry of the judgment, the said property should be sold, and the proceeds applied to the payment and satisfaction of said lien. From this judgment no appeal was taken, and it became final. The $2,600 was not paid, and such proceedings were had that in September, 1892, the said property was sold by the sheriff under said judgment, and a deed was duly executed and delivered to the said Mary Jane Gavin conveying the property to her in satisfaction of said lien.

After this decree said Mary Jane Gavin married one Holmes, and in April, 1893, she began an action in the superior court of the county of San Francisco against the said Patrick Gavin and his sons who were then living, to wit, this plaintiff, Charles J. Gavin, and James Gavin, the other brother, to recover the sum of $300 as rent for the use and occupation of the said premises during the time the defendants in said last-named action had occupied the same since they had become the property of plaintiff in said action by reason of said sale. The result of said last-named action was that plaintiff recovered judgment for the sum of $300 against the Gavins therein named, including this plaintiff, and under and by virtue of said judgment a writ of execution and order of sale were issued, which were duly levied upon the said premises. The sheriff levied upon the premises, and under and by virtue of said execution and order of sale he afterwards sold the same to the plaintiff in said action, Mary J. Holmes, and a certificate of sale was issued to her, followed in due time by a sheriff's deed. No appeal was taken in the said action by this plaintiff from the judgment so made in favor of Mary J. Holmes, and none of the parties to the said action appealed. The judgment therefore became final. Afterwards the said Mary J. Holmes died, leaving a last will and testament, which was duly admitted to probate. Subsequently, in the matter of the estate of said Mary J. Holmes, a decree of distribution was duly given and made, distributing the said property described in this action to the defendant herein John S. Phillips, under the terms of the will of said Mary J. Holmes. The said Phillips immediately went into the possession of said property, and the court expressly finds: "That said defendant John S. Phillips since the said 5th day of October, 1897, and said decree of distribution above mentioned, has been in possession of and occupied said property openly, notoriously, continuously, and adversely to plaintiff and to all the world; that during all of said times said property has been protected by a substantial inclosure. Said defendant John S. Phillips has paid all taxes, state, county, and municipal, which have been levied or assessed upon said property since the said 5th day of October in the year 1897." The court further states in its conclusions of law, in pusuance of the last finding herein quoted. that the action is barred by the provisions of sections 318 and 323 of the Code of Civil Procedure; and further finds that the said defendant "ever since has been and now is the owner of, seised in fee and in possession of, said property." At the time this action was commenced the said Patrick Gavin and his sons other than this plaintiff had died, and plaintiff was the only surviving son and heir of the said Patrick Gavin. It therefore appears from the findings of fact that the plaintiff is estopped by virtue of the said judgments referred to in said findings as herein stated, and further that the action is barred by the statute of limitations.

WIRRINGER et al. v. MORGAN. (Civ. 225.)

(Court of Appeal, First District, California. Nov. 22, 1909.)

1. TAXATION (§ 875*)—INHERITANCE TAXES—"COLLATERAL HEIRS."

Illegitimate children acknowledged by their father in accordance with Civ. Code, § 1387, are not "collateral heirs," and any inheritance passing to such a child from its father is not a collateral inheritance subject to a collateral inheritance tax.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; James M. Troutt, Judge.

Action by Josef Wirringer and Katharina Moosmuller against F. E. Morgan. Plaintiffs had judgment, from which, and an order denying a new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Carl E. Lindsay, for appellant. Loewy & Gutsch, for respondents.

HALL, J. This is an appeal from a judgment in favor of plaintiffs and the order denying defendant's motion for a new trial. The action was brought to recover a sum of money under a decree of distribution entered in the superior court of Santa Cruz county in the estate of one Sebastian Holzfurtner, deceased. The order settling the final account and decree of distribution are contained in one order or decree, which is attached to and made a part of the complaint; and the solution of the controversy in this case depends upon the effect to be given to this decree.

It appears from the decree that said decedent died intestate on the 28th day of April, 1899, a resident of Santa Cruz county; that he was never married, but left surviving two children of him born out of wedlock, the plaintiffs herein. That before his death he in writing, signed in the presence of at least two competent witnesses, acknowledged himself to be the father of said plaintiffs herein. That he left no other children surviving him, and that the plaintiffs herein were his only heirs at law. The court accordingly distributed the residue of said estate in equal shares to the plaintiffs herein. In that part of the decree settling the final account, the court, after making an allowance for attorney's fees, reporter's fee, and estimated expenses of closing the estate, found the residue of money in the hands of the administrator (defendant herein) to be "$5,927.22, less the amount of the inheritance tax as required by law, which is hereby ordered paid to the county treasurer of Santa Cruz county." Again, in describing the residue of the estate ordered distributed, the court described two promissory notes, and cash in a given sum of money "less inheritance tax." Nowhere is the amount of any inheritance tax fixed, nor any reference thereto made other than as above set forth. Defendant paid to the plaintiffs out of the sum of $5,927.22 the sum of $5,034.65, and this action was brought to recover the difference between said sums, to wit, $892.57. Unless defendant was entitled to retain something for the payment of an inheritance tax, it is conceded that plaintiffs are entitled to the said sum of $892.57. Plaintiffs' contention is that, as the law existed when said decedent died, no inheritance tax was required by law from children of a decedent, whether legitimate or illegitimate, and that as the decree of distribution nowhere fixed the amount of the inheritance tax to be retained out of the residue found to be in the hands of the administrator, but simply referred to it as "the inheritance tax as required by law," the decree does not in fact authorize any deduction for an inheritance tax.

The first question to be determined is: Did the law as it existed in 1899 require payment of any inheritance tax of illegitimate children acknowledged by their father in accordance with section 1387, Civ. Code? The inheritance tax law passed in 1893 (St. 1893, p. 193, c. 168) is entitled "An act to establish a tax on collateral inheritances, bequests, and devises, to provide for its collection, and to direct the disposition of the proceeds." The act was amended in 1895 (St. 1895, p. 33, c. 28) and in 1899 (St. 1899, p. 101, c. 85), but not in respect to its title. The body of the act provides for a tax on inheritances to all persons other than to certain enumerated persons. Among the persons expressly excepted from the payment of the tax are "lawful issue" and "any child or children adopted as such in conformity with the laws of the state of California." But whether illegitimate children acknowledged in accordance with section 1387 are expressly excepted or not, they are not collateral heirs, and any inheritance passing to such a child from its father is not a collateral inheritance.

In speaking of this same statute, the court, in Estate of Winchester, 140 Cal. 468, 74 Pac. 10, said: "Again, the act under which the taxes were imposed by the court below, in its title relates to 'collateral inheritances, bequests and devises' only, and under the provisions of the Constitution its effects must be limited to the subjects thus described. This would exclude successions or bequests to children and grandchildren, whether adopted or natural, for clearly they are not collateral, but in a direct line." See, also, Estate of Campbell, 143 Cal. 623, 77 Pac. 674, as to meaning of the word "collateral."

By the title of the act in question the scope of the act, so far as taxing inheritances is concerned, is limited to collateral inheritances. So far as the act attempts to require a tax to be paid on an inheritance not collateral but in the direct line, it is void. Const. Cal. art. 4, § 24; Estate of Winchester, supra.

It thus being clear that the distributees under the decree were not required by law to pay any tax on their inheritances from decedent, their father, it only remains to determine whether or not a proper reading of the decree of distribution exacts such payment. If these distributees were "lawful issue" of the decedent, and were so found to be in the decree of distribution, we hardly think it would be contended that they would be liable to a deduction from the residue of the estate distributed to them by force of the words "less the amount of the inheritance tax as required by law, which is hereby ordered paid to the county treasurer." It being expressly written in the statute that "lawful issue" should pay no inheritance tax, the vague and uncertain language of the decree would not be read as adjudging such payment to be made. The exemption of these illegitimate children from the payment of the tax in question is just as certain as a matter of law as is the exemption of "lawful issue."

By the terms of the decree the only deduction from the residue of money found to be in the administrators' hands is "the amount of the inheritance tax as required by law." The decree does not fix the amount of such tax, nor expressly adjudicate that any tax should be deducted, but leaves the matter dependent upon whether or not the law requires any inheritance tax. As it does not, the distributee (plaintiffs herein) were entitled to the entire residue of the estate in the hands of the defendant.

In thus holding the trial court did not, as contended by appellant, ignore the decree of distribution, but gave effect to such decree in accord with its terms.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

2. MORTGAGES (§ 113*) — TRUST DEED — CONSTRUCTION—TRUSTEES—PERSONS APPOINTED.

A trust deed was executed to secure a loan from H. S. B. by the owners as parties of the first part to "F. W. B., A. F. B., parties of the second part and H. S. B., trustee, party of the third part," and provided for reconveyance by the parties of the second part if the debt was paid, and authorized them or the survivor of them, on demand by the third party, to sell the property if the debt was not paid and execute a deed to the purchaser and prescribed the things to be done by the parties of the second part in case of sale, and further provided that the party of the third part could from time to time appoint other trustees to execute the trust, who, upon conveyance to them by the parties of the second part, their successors, etc., should be vested with all the powers hereby vested in the parties of the second part. Held, that the parties of the second part named in the trust deed were the trustees appointed; the word "trustee" being used by mistake after the name of H. Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; J. D. Murphy, Judge.

Action by Frances Hall against Daniel Crowley. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

James H. Boyer, for appellant. Johnson & Shaw, for respondent.

COOPER, P. J. Plaintiff recovered judgment in ejectment for possession of the lot and premises described in the complaint. This appeal is from the judgment on the judgment roll with a bill of exceptions.

Plaintiff's title was derived as follows: In April, 1904, Daniel Crowley and his son, Jeremiah Crowley, being the owners of said lot, executed, acknowledged, and delivered a deed of trust to F. W. Bridge and A. F. Bridge, as parties of the second part, and one H. S. Bridge, as party of the third part, to secure the payment of a promissory note made by the Crowleys to said H. S. Bridge. The note was not paid, and the parties of the second part named in the deed of trust, after default in the payment, and under and in pursuance of the power of sale contained in the deed, and upon due and proper notice, sold the lot to one Carrie E. Bridge, and executed and delivered to her a deed to the said premises. Carrie E. Bridge afterwards sold and conveyed to plaintiff. It is therefore evident that the plaintiff was the owner and entitled to the possession of the lot, unless there was some fatal defect in some of the proceedings through which the title passed from the Crowleys to him. We will briefly examine the alleged assignments of error made by appellant's counsel.

He attacks the following finding: "That thereafter, after proceeding had and taken, and as stipulated by counsel in the trial of said case, whatever title was conveyed by said deed of trust became duly vested in plaintiff by the trustee's deed, duly delivered in accordance with the said deed of trust." The quoted finding is only a detached sentence taken from the findings, which cover some 10 folios, and it is discussed without any regard to its context. It is stated that there is no evidence that counsel ever entered into the stipulation referred to in the finding; but, conceding no such stipulation was made, the reference to the stipulation may be regarded as surplusage if the other findings and the remaining portion of the finding quoted show that the title conveyed by the deed of trust passed, through intermediate conveyances, to and finally vested in the plaintiff. It is, however, contended (and this seems to be the appellant's main contention) that the sale was void for the reason that it was made by F. W. Bridge and A. F. Bridge instead of "H. S. Bridge, Trustee."

In determining this question we must take the entire instrument, and read it in connection with the object and purpose for which it was made. It was made by the Crowleys for the purpose of obtaining the loan which was made to them by H. S. Bridge. It was taken by H. S. Bridge for the purpose of securing the loan made to the Crowleys. The object was to secure the loan, and to empower the party from whom it was obtained to sell the lot in a lawful manner in case the loan was not repaid. The deed was made by the Crowleys as parties of the first part, and to "F. W. Bridge, A. F. Bridge, parties of the second part, and H. S. Bridge, trustee, party of the third part." It then recites the loan and the purpose for which the deed was made, and follows with a particular description of the lot. Then follows a provision that, in case the parties of the first part shall repay the loan and all the interest and moneys secured thereby, then the parties of the second part shall reconvey the lot to the parties of the first part. Then follows an express power to the parties of the second part as follows: "If default shall be made in the payment of any of said sums of principal and interest when due in the manner stipulated in said promissory note, or in the reimbursement of any of the amounts herein provided to be paid, or of any interest thereon, then the said parties of the second part or the survivor of them, their successors and assigns, on demand by the party of the third part or his assigns, shall sell the above granted premises, or such part thereof as in their discretion they find it necessary to sell, in order to accomplish the objects of these trusts, in the manner, following, viz.: * * *" The deed then proceeds to state certain things that shall be done by the parties of the second part in advertising the time and place of sale and so forth, and concludes as follows: "And upon such sale, they shall make, execute, and after due payment made shall execute to the purchaser or purchasers, his or their heirs and assigns, a deed or deeds of the premises so sold, and out of the proceeds thereof shall pay. * * *" Then follow the usual provisions as to paying costs, attorneys' fees, and the amounts due upon the note, and the "balance or surplusage of such proceeds, if any, to party of the first part or assigns." In the concluding part of the deed is the following: "It is expressly covenanted that the party of the third part may from time to time appoint other trustee or trustees to execute the trusts hereby created; and upon such appointment and a conveyance to them by the parties of the second part, the survivor of them, their successors or assigns, the new trustees shall be vested with all the title, interests and powers, duties and trusts in the premises hereby vested in or conferred upon the parties of the second part."

It is thus too plain to require further discussion that the parties of the second part were the trustees named and authorized to make the same under the instrument. It is evident that the word "trustee" was inadvertently used in the first part of the deed when naming H. S. Bridge as party of the third part. It is with regret that the court examines page upon page of a brief, and finds, as in this case, that the point presented does not even have the merit of being plausible. Numerous authorities are cited and discussed by appellants' counsel to the point that "a sale under a deed of trust by a person not authorized to act is void"—a proposition so elementary that it should be known to every student before he is admitted to practice.

The court did not err in admitting the record copy of the trust deed in evidence. It was proven that the original deed had been destroyed in the great fire of April 18, 1906, and in fact appellants admit that such deed was destroyed. It was further proven that the deed was executed by both the Crowleys, and there was evidence sufficient to justify the court in finding that it was delivered. The appellant could not write his name, but the notary Austin testified that both the Crowleys signed and acknowledged the deed, and that Daniel Crowley signed by making his mark. The deed on its face is signed "Daniel Crowley $\underset{\text{mark}}{\overset{\text{his}}{X}}$," and at the end is the following: "Daniel Crowley being unable to write made his mark, and I, at his request, in his presence, wrote his name for him. George W. Austin."

There is no merit in this appeal. In view of the fact that it is stated that the property is worth much more than the amount for which it was sold, we have not assessed damages for a frivolous appeal, although we might well have done so. The remedy of appellant was plain. He could, in case the property is of the value contended for by his counsel, have paid the debt or borrowed the money elsewhere before his property was sold. He did not do so, and the law cannot now interfere.

The judgment is affirmed.

We concur: KERRIGAN, J.; HALL, J.

PEOPLE v. ROWLAND. (Cr. 102.)

(Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Nov. 20, 1909.)

1. CRIMINAL LAW (§§ 409, 538*)—CONFESSIONS—ADMISSIONS—EFFECT AS EVIDENCE.

The confession or extrajudicial admissions of a defendant charged with crime cannot be considered for the purpose of showing the corpus delicti, or of proving the elements necessary to constitute the crime with which he is charged.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 918, 919, 1229; Dec. Dig. §§ 409, 538.*]

2. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 535*)—CONFESSIONS—ADMISSIBILITY—SUFFICIENCY OF FOUNDATON FOR CONFESSION.

Evidence, in a prosecution for embezzlement by a bank cashier, held to establish the corpus delicti, independent of defendant's confession, so as to render such confession admissible.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 1226; Dec. Dig. § 535.*]

3. EMBEZZLEMENT (§ 11*)—ACTS OF CORPORATE OFFICER—TIME OF APPROPRIATION.

Where defendant, as bank cashier, on receiving a check in payment of a depositor's note, caused the proper entry to be made on the depositor's account showing the withdrawal of such amount, but retained the money himself, and made no entry on the loan account of the bank as having received that amount he is guilty of embezzlement, under Pen. Code, § 504, making it embezzlement for the officer, servant, or agent of any association or corporation to fraudulently appropriate to any purpose, not in the due execution of his trust, any property under his control by virtue of his trust, or secrete it with fraudulent intent to appropriate it to such purpose; and it is immaterial when, before the finding of the indictment, the money was actually used, except as affected by the statute of limitations.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Embezzlement, Cent. Dig. §§ 9, 10; Dec. Dig. § 11.*]

4. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 369*)—EVIDENCE—OTHER OFFENSES.

In a prosecution of a bank cashier for embezzlement of a specified amount, evidence of a general shortage in defendant's accounts is admissible; such evidence not being within the rule excluding proof of a crime distinct from the one charged.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 822–824; Dec. Dig. § 369.*]

5. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 434*)—EVIDENCE—BOOKS OF ACCOUNT.

In a prosecution of a bank cashier for embezzlement, evidence of entries on books of the bank is admissible, though not made by defendant, but by subordinate officers or clerks under defendant's directions; defendant having knowledge of the contents of the books and the general condition of the affairs of the bank.

6. EMBEZZLEMENT (§ 42*)—EVIDENCE.

In a prosecution of a bank cashier for embezzlement, evidence that defendant, during the period within which occurred the transactions leading to the general shortage in his accounts, engaged in stock gambling on an extensive scale, and that he had comparatively little property in his own name, is admissible as tending to show that defendant used the bank's money for private speculation.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Embezzlement, Cent. Dig. § 64; Dec. Dig. § 42.*]

7. EMBEZZLEMENT (§ 48*) — TRIAL — INSTRUCTIONS.

In a prosecution of a bank cashier for embezzlement, in the absence of evidence that defendant borrowed the money alleged to have been embezzled, and in view of his confession admitting his responsibility for the losses of the bank by his wrongful acts, an instruction to acquit defendant if he was authorized to borrow money from the bank, and that he did borrow the money involved in the indictment, was properly refused, though he afterward returned to the bank the amount of his shortage.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sonoma County; Emmett Seawell, Judge.

E. S. Rowland was convicted of embezzlement, and he appeals. Affirmed.

T. J. Geary, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Chas. Jones, for the People.

HART, J. Under an indictment charging him with the crime of embezzlement, in the alleged felonious and fraudulent appropriation to his own use of the sum of $1,036.15, the money of the bank of Healdsburg, the defendant was convicted by a jury, and by the court sentenced therefor to a term of six years in the state prison. This appeal is from the judgment of conviction, and from the order of the court declining to grant defendant's motion for a new trial.

The defendant had been for many years secretary and cashier of the bank of Healdsburg, Sonoma county. On the 3d day of December, 1908, W. C. Watson, State Bank Commissioner, having in his official capacity investigated the affairs of the bank, discovered a large shortage in the cash accounts, and thereupon ordered the institution closed to business, pending further investigation. The amount which it is claimed that the shortage represented exceeded the sum of $100,000. The charge in the indictment, however, relates to a transaction involving the sum of $1,000, and occurring on the 7th day of May, 1908, so it is alleged. It appears that on that date one Robert G. Cook paid to the bank a note calling for the sum of $1,000, together with interest accruing thereon, amounting to $36.15. This money had been borrowed from the bank by the firm of Cook & Passalacqua in the year 1907, and the payment of the sum due on said note was made in the form of a check on said bank; Cook & Passalacqua then having sufficient funds in the bank to satisfy the note. The check was placed on the "file" used by the bank for such purpose by the party or official of the institution to whom it was delivered, and later an entry in the proper book made of the receipt thereof.

Appellant first claims and declares that there was introduced at the trial absolutely no evidence, either direct or circumstantial, showing that he embezzled any money from the bank of Healdsburg on the day alleged in the indictment; that, secondly, the court made erroneous rulings in the admission of evidence, and that said rulings were prejudicial to his substantial rights; and, lastly, that in its charge to the jury the court, in several instances, committed vital errors, and thus misdirected, to his prejudice, the jury upon questions of law. The record on this appeal contains an extended synopsis of the testimony given at the trial, but we do not feel called upon to present here anything like a detailed statement of the evidence; it being sufficient, in our opinion, to refer in a general way only to the facts.

1. The contention of the appellant is that there is no evidence of any nature whatsoever, except that of a general shortage, which proves, or tends to prove, to the required degree, that the specific offense charged was committed by the defendant, or, in fact, that there is no evidence showing that said offense, or any other crime, was committed by the defendant, or at all, except the alleged confession of the accused of the existence of a general shortage at the time the Bank Commissioner investigated the affairs of the bank and discovered that something was wrong in the cash accounts thereof. This contention involves, obviously, the claim that the corpus delicti was not shown by evidence independent of that of the confession.

It is, of course, a well-established rule of law that the confession or extrajudicial admissions of a party accused of crime cannot be considered for the purpose of proving the corpus delicti, or, in other words, of proving the elements necessary to constitute the crime with which he is charged. See People v. Tapia, 131 Cal. 651, 63 Pac. 1001; People v. Jones, 123 Cal. 65, 55 Pac. 698; People v. Eldridge, 3 Cal. App. 648, 86 Pac. 832. But this rule has never been so far extended in its scope or application as to require the elements or the body of the crime to be proved beyond a reasonable doubt before the admissions or confessions may be received and considered as evidence. As is said in People v. Jones, 123 Cal. 68, 55 Pac. 700: "As to the degree of evidence required to show criminal agency [that is, the cause of the facts constituting the corpus delicti], a distinction must be taken between the evidence which upon the whole case would justify a conviction and that degree of proof of criminal agency in the burning of the buildings, for the purpose of letting in evidence of the confessions or admissions of the defendant. To justify a conviction, the jury must be satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt of the existence of every fact necessary to constitute the offense and to identify the defendant as the perpetrator; but it is not necessary that the evidence should be of that conclusive character in order to justify the admission of the defendant's confessions." (Italics ours.)

In People v. Ward, 134 Cal. 306, 66 Pac. 374, the rule as thus expounded is reaffirmed, the court saying: "Nor is the other objection—'that the corpus delicti had not been proven'—of any validity. Proof of the corpus delicti does not necessarily involve or require proof that the crime was committed by the defendant, or person charged with having committed it. The general rule is that it must first be shown; but, except in those cases where it is sought to put in evidence the confession or admission of the defendant, the order of proof is in the discretion of the court, and, even in those cases, plenary proof of the corpus delicti is not always required." See People v. Simonsen, 107 Cal. 346, 40 Pac. 440. The present question here, then, is, Does the evidence in the case at bar disclose sufficient proof of the corpus delicti, or the specific crime charged, to have warranted the admission of the confession in evidence?

The question may be answered by a brief examination of the evidence. The record shows that these facts were proved by the evidence, presumably to the satisfaction of the jury: That, as before stated, the defendant was, for many years prior to the date of the discovery of the defalcations, the secretary and cashier of the Bank of Healdsburg; that, in that capacity, the administration of the affairs of the bank was, practically, under his direct and almost exclusive control; that the books of account were kept by clerks under his immediate direction; that he had the usual power vested in bank cashiers in the matter of making loans and in the performance of the numerous other duties involved in a general banking business. It may here be remarked that John Favour, the president of the bank, whose principal duties were to look after securities for loans and examining real estate upon which loans were sought from the bank, occasionally assisted the defendant in counting the cash. Further than this he had little, if anything, to do with the inside operations of the bank. But, as suggested, the evidence very clearly shows that the books of the bank, though actually kept by clerks employed therein, were under the exclusive control and supervision of the defendant, and it further appears very clearly that, under the system upon which the defendant conducted the business of the bank, the mere counting of the cash on hand by any person other than the defendant did not necessarily open up an opportunity to such person to learn or to know whether there was in fact any shortage in the cash accounts or not. The system in vogue in the bank for the daily transaction of its business was, according to the evidence, as thus described: Whenever one of the attachés of the institution waited on a customer a tag was prepared—generally by the clerk, but sometimes by the customer himself—whereby the exact nature of the transaction was shown. If, for illustration, money was paid into the bank, either as a deposit or for the purpose of fully liquidating or making a payment on a loan, the transaction would be noted on a tag in such manner as to clearly indicate all the necessary information with regard thereto. This tag would, if properly disposed of, be placed on a file at the "window" at which all the transactions of the bank were customarily carried on. The tag would subsequently be taken by the bookkeeper, and the transaction evidenced thereby be entered in the proper book. The accounts of the bank were balanced, and the cash counted and compared with the balances as disclosed by the books, at the end of each day. To facilitate the balancing of the books, a machine list of all the transactions of the day was prepared each day. The items on this machine list were compared or checked with the tags, and the balances thus reached. Thereupon, the day's transactions were accordingly entered in the books. The evidence further shows that it was the custom of the defendant to daily examine the tags representing the transactions occurring each day, and to compare and check the same with the machine list.

According to the testimony of the president of the bank, the defendant himself always kept the book known as the "Loan Register," and he, and no other person, invariably made a record therein of any loans that came in, "or where there was anything to be credited upon the loan register." It further appears from the evidence that the transaction forming the basis of the charge in the indictment was conducted in person by the defendant himself. Cook, as heretofore stated, delivered to the defendant a check on the bank for a sum sufficient to satisfy the note previously executed in favor of the bank by Cook & Passalacqua. It also appears that the defendant thereupon personally canceled and delivered to Cook said note. The defendant then placed the check on file at the window, and from said check the bookkeeper later in the day made an entry thereof in the personal account of Cook & Passalacqua, thus indicating the withdrawal from the bank of the sum represented by the check on account of said Cook & Passalacqua. The evidence shows that the defendant himself personally entered in the interest account the receipt of the sum of $36.15 on account of the interest due on the note of said firm of Cook & Passalacqua. The defendant, however, failed to prepare a tag, or to make any other record from which the bookkeeper could learn that the note of Cook & Passalacqua had been paid. Nor did he otherwise give out any information tc the clerks with respect to the payment of said note. It is therefore plainly manifest that, when the books of the bank were balanced as to that day's transactions, the note of Cook & Passalacqua, although paid, and no longer an asset of the bank, remained such in the loan account of the bank. In other words, the evidence discloses that the books showed that on the 7th day of May, 1908, the sum of $1,000 had been withdrawn from the bank, but failed to show that said sum was in fact paid into the bank to liquidate the loan to Cook & Passalacqua. Of course, when the cash was counted on that day it was found to balance with the books, because the $1,000 note referred to was still an ostensible asset of the bank, although fictitious and false, it having been paid. And, according to the testimony of Mr. Watson, the Bank Commissioner, who, after the discovery that there was a shortage, made a detailed examination into the affairs of the bank and the methods of their administration by the defendant, the method by which the accused handled the transaction of which the charge in the indictment is predicated was the same as that which enabled him to use over $100,000 of the bank's funds without the knowledge of the other officers of the institution.

There are some other minor circumstances disclosed by the evidence tending to show that the transaction relating to the Cook & Passalacqua note was, so far as the defendant's part in it was concerned, dishonest, and carried out with a design on his part to misuse or misapply the sum represented thereby; but we think we have given a sufficient résumé of the facts as proved to clearly demonstrate that the corpus delicti was sufficiently established by evidence aliunde the confession.

In addition to the evidence specifically directed to the transaction to which the charge in the indictment relates, there was, apart from the confession, evidence of a general shortage (as to which a point is sought to be made, and to which we shall later refer) which, assuming it to have been properly admitted, tends to prove the commission of the crime charged, or at least is corroborative of the immediate circumstances pointing to the commission of the crime of which the accused was convicted. And, the jury having passed upon all the facts, it is too late to now say or to claim that the failure of the defendant to prepare a tag from which the exact nature of the transaction could have been ascertained by the bookkeeper might have been a mistake or an oversight, for the proposition now under consideration stands sustained by these salient and uncontradicted facts: That on the 7th day of May, 1908, the firm of Cook & Passalacqua was indebted to the bank in the sum of $1,000 and accrued interest; that the bank held the firm's note for that sum; that Cook & Passalacqua had sufficient funds on deposit in the bank with which to pay the note and interest, and that said firm did in fact pay said note on that day in the form of a check drawn on said bank; that there was cash in the vaults of the bank on said day approximating in amount the sum of $20,000; that the defendant personally conducted the transaction, receiving the check and filing it in the customary place and manner, and surrendering the note to Cook, and entering the interest paid thereon in the interest account; that, although he was himself the immediate custodian or keeper of the loan register, in which the record of all loans paid and of credits on loans was kept, he failed to make an entry in said register of the payment of said note, thus allowing it to remain on the books as an apparent asset of the bank.

It is very true, as counsel for the appellant suggests, that none of the officers and clerks of the bank called as witnesses for the state testified directly that there was any money of the bank misappropriated or converted to a wrongful use by the defendant, or any other person, on the 7th day of May, 1908. Under the system by which the defendant conducted his dishonest operations it was manifestly impossible to disclose, except through evidence of circumstances, a specific defalcation, and therefore it is not to be wondered that no witness could be produced who could give direct testimony of the fact at issue here. The further claim of counsel for the appellant that there is no testimony showing that the defendant omitted to make a tag indicating the payment of the note of Cook & Passalacqua is not sustained by the record. As seen, there is evidence showing that the system by which the inside business of the bank was conducted called for a tag, placed on a particular file, revealing the exact nature of every daily transaction, and from which tag the bookkeeper made the proper entry in the proper book. There is no evidence that a tag disclosing the fact of the payment of the Cook & Passalacqua note was made by the defendant and placed on the customary file, while, on the other hand, there was introduced in evidence the book containing the loan account of the bank, in which a record was kept of all loans paid and in which, from and including the 7th day of May, 1908, to and including the day the bank was closed by the Bank Commissioner—December 3, 1908—there was no record of the payment of said note. Thus it must readily be observed that the circumstances disclosed by the evidence very strongly tend to show that the defendant made no tag of the transaction, and that the money represented by the check delivered to him in payment of the note was diverted from subserving its legitimate purpose by him, and thus misappropriated.

Unavailing is the argument that, if this particular money was embezzled at all by the defendant, it might have been thus taken at a time prior to, and remote from, the 7th day of May, 1908, for the important and the undisputed fact, obviously inconsistent with that view, is that there was in the bank on that day sufficient money with which to meet the demands of the check of the firm of Cook & Passalacqua, and that the final act in the consummation of the misappropriation of that particular money occurred on that day. We know from common knowledge that the moneys ordinarily paid into a bank are not kept separate and apart in distinct packages as such moneys are paid in, but are intermingled together with all the other moneys of the bank, and thus go into the common mass of the money kept for all the purposes of the business. Therefore the check of Cook & Passalacqua on the bank, in which they had on deposit sufficient funds to satisfy said check, and in which there was on hand a large amount of ready cash, available for all the purposes of the bank, was, in our opinion, no different from cash itself, and payment of the note in that form, under the circumstances indicated, constituted in reality a cash transaction. And it is manifestly immaterial what might have been the specific purpose of the defendant in misappropriating the money thus received from Cook & Passalacqua—whether it was to use that particular money on that very day to further some individual scheme or transaction, or to use it in covering up or partially concealing evidence of prior defalcations, in the hope of postponing discovery of the general deficiency in his cash accounts. By this we mean to be understood as saying that, even if he actually took no money from the bank on the day of the Cook transaction, but merely used it to juggle the books as to some other account in order to make it balance or appear straight, he nevertheless thereby misappropriated that particular money, and in substantial effect wrongfully converted it to his own use; the fraud of the transaction being indubitably shown, as we have seen, by the fact that he allowed the canceled note of Cook & Passalacqua to remain as though a living asset of the bank. If this is not embezzlement within the meaning of the law (section 504, Pen. Code), then we confess that we are at a loss to know what acts will constitute that offense.

Section 504 of the Penal Code provides, among other things: "* * * Every officer, director, trustee, clerk, servant or agent of any association, society or corporation (public or private), who fraudulently appropriates to any use or purpose not in the due and lawful execution of his trust, any property which he has in his possession or under his control by virtue of his trust, or secretes it with a fraudulent intent to appropriate it to such use or purpose is guilty of embezzlement." The indictment charges, among other things, that the defendant "did willfully, unlawfully, fraudulently, and feloniously secrete, with a fraudulent intent to appropriate to his own use, and to a use and purpose not in the due or lawful, or due and lawful, execution of his trust," the money referred to therein. Thus it will be observed that, under section 504 of the Penal Code and the allegations of the indictment, it is immaterial when, before the filing of the indictment, the money was actually used, except in so far as the matter of time might be affected by the statute of limitations, if it be proved that the defendant secreted the money or property for the unlawful purpose. The statute seems to have been enacted with the object of meeting the exigencies of just such circumstances as appear in the case at bar. We do not suppose that the proposition will be challenged that, under the terms of the quoted section of the Penal Code, the act of secreting property of another by his agent, into whose hands such property has come for his employer, with the intent to convert it or to appropriate it to a use or purpose not within the scope of the objects of the fiduciary relation, amounts to a misappropriation of such property, and therefore embezzlement. So, as stated, if, in the case here, the money was either secreted within the meaning of the statute, or used to cover up some other shortage, or actually taken from the vaults of the bank and used in some transaction with which the bank had no connection, the crime is, in either event, proved. The elements which must be shown in order to establish the crime of embezzlement as alleged in the indictment here are these: (1) That defendant was an agent of the party from whom the money or property is alleged to have been embezzled at the time of such wrongful conversion; (2) that the property charged to have been embezzled must have come into the hands of the defendant as the property of his employer; (3) that defendant received it in the course of his employment; (4) that he appropriated such property to his own use with intent to steal it. Sections 504, 506, 509, Pen. Code; People v. Hemple, 4 Cal. App. 125, 87 Pac. 227, and cases therein cited.

The general rule is that the mere proof of defendant's connection with the crime is not sufficient to establish the corpus delicti. Nor is it necessary, in order to establish the essential elements of the crime, to prove the defendant's connection with it. The rule, however, does not go so far as to exclude, in showing the corpus delicti, proof of the defendant's connection with the crime, where the circumstances of the case are such that proof of the crime of necessity involves proof of defendant's guilt. In the case at bar it is manifest that the evidence directed to the proof of the corpus delicti necessarily involved defendant's connection with the crime, for he is inseparably connected with every important circumstance introduced for the sole purpose of proving the corpus delicti. We have therefore necessarily considered, in connection with the question whether the elements of the crime charged have been well enough proved to open the way for the proof of the defendant's confession, the proposition whether, upon the whole record, the jury were justified in returning a verdict of guilty. Hence we feel no hesitation in declaring that all the elements of the embezzlement charged in the indictment are brought home to the defendant by the proofs. That the accused was the agent of the bank on the 7th day of May, 1908, and that the money alleged to have been embezzled by him came into his hands as such agent as the property of and for his employer, are uncontroverted and incontrovertible propositions in this case. That, on the 7th day of May, 1908, he either secreted the money mentioned in the indictment with the fraudulent intent to convert it to his own use, or did actually use it with the fraudulent intent to appropriate it to his own use, or to a "use and purpose not in the due and lawful execution of his trust," we think, as before suggested, the circumstances thus far considered clearly tend to show; and that his guilt was sufficiently established to justify the verdict by those circumstances and other evidence, to which we shall later refer, we do not entertain the slightest doubt.

2. It is urged that the court seriously erred, to the detriment of the defendant, in its rulings admitting certain evidence. It is first claimed that evidence of a general shortage was not admissible for the purpose of proving the specific crime of which the defendant was accused and convicted. The theory of the argument upon this point is that such evidence comes within the rule excluding proof of another and distinct crime from the one charged. But we fail to perceive any merit in the contention. There can be assigned no sound reason on principle why evidence of a general shortage, brought about through the criminal act of a party, is not competent proof tending to support a specific charge of embezzlement where, as here, the particular transaction on which the charge is based is included in, or a part of, such general shortage. Such testimony is not, of course, conclusive of the truth of the charge, but furnishes only an important circumstance tending to prove it. It is admissible for the purpose of negativing the idea that the particular transaction giving birth to the specific charge was due to a mistake, and to show guilty knowledge or the fraudulent intent.

Counsel for appellant refers to the case of the People v. Walker, 142 Cal. 94, 75 Pac. 659, where it is held by a divided court that evidence of a general indebtedness is not admissible as proof of the specific crime of embezzlement charged in the information. But that case does not sustain the position of counsel here, for the reason that the facts there are decidedly different from those here. The court says: "In the case at bar the said testimony objected to was not of any other embezzlement; it was simply of a general indebtedness, and it appears affirmatively that the $80.35 charged to have been embezzled was not included in the general balance which the books showed." As already observed, the charge in the case here grows out of one of a number of fraudulent transactions culminating in the general shortage of over $100,000, and, as is said by Henshaw, J., in People v. Sanders, 114 Cal. 216, 46 Pac. 153: "If the evidence of another crime is necessary or pertinent to the proof of the one charged, the law will not thwart justice by excluding that evidence, simply because it involves the commission of another crime"—citing People v. Tucker, 104 Cal. 440, 38 Pac. 195. See, also, People v. Ebanks, 117 Cal. 663, 49 Pac. 1049, 40 L. R. A. 269, and People v. Walters, 98 Cal. 138, 32 Pac. 864. The distinction between the Walker Case, supra, and this case, so far as is concerned the point under present discussion, may thus be stated: In the former there was apparently no relation between the specific crime charged and the general shortage or "general indebtedness" as the court declares the general deficiency in that case to have been. Here there is a direct relation existing between the crime charged and the general shortage, because the former is shown to be one of the several transactions from which the general shortage arose, and the latter has therefore a tendency to establish the offense charged. In People v. Walters, supra, Chief Justice Beatty states the rule, allowing, in exceptional cases, proof of another offense than the one charged, in clear and concise language.

Nor did the court err in admitting in evidence certain entries in the books of the bank and certain tags made, not by the defendant personally, but by subordinate officers of the bank. The rule is that evidence of entries in books made by persons other than the defendant himself is inadmissible against the accused, unless there is proof connecting the defendant in some way with the making or knowledge of such entries. The theory upon which the court allowed the proof of the tags and entries in the several books of the bank in the case at bar was that said tags and entries, where not made by the defendant himself, were made by his clerks under his direction. The entries and the tags were offered and received in connection with the testimony of the bookkeeper himself, and herein lies the distinction between this case and that of People v. Blackman, 127 Cal. 248, 59 Pac. 573, so confidently relied on by appellant, where the Supreme Court held that evidence of entries in the books of the corporation of which the defendant was secretary was, under the circumstances of that case, inadmissible to prove the charge of embezzling the funds of said corporation. There, at the time of the trial, the bookkeeper, who made the entries, was dead, and the books or their contents were allowed to go into the record as evidence of the defendant's guilt, without proof having been made that he ever examined the books, or that he knew anything of their contents. The court said: "If there was evidence that the entries were made by the defendant or under his direction, or with his knowledge, they would most undoubtedly be competent and important evidence against him." Nor is either the case of People v. Whalen, 154 Cal. 472, 98 Pac. 194, or the case of S. F. Teaming Co. v. H. N. Gray et al., 104 Pac. 999, cited by appellant, in point here. In the first-mentioned case it was held that the mere written copy of the report of an assayer showing the value of certain gold ore was not admissible as evidence, where the assayer was not produced as a witness, nor where the assay was made in the office of the assayer, who was a witness, but who did not himself personally make or supervise the assay. In the latter case it was held that "where, in an action to recover a balance due for the use of teams and teamsters, the only testimony to support the introduction in evidence of a work book, showing the account against the defendants, is that of the bookkeeper of the plaintiff, who merely made the entries from a memorandum paper made by him from the oral statements of the various teamsters, and who had no personal knowledge of the work, such book is inadmissible." In both cases it is plainly to be seen the evidence offered was secondary or hearsay, pure and simple.

The evidence here indisputably shows, as we have before stated, that the full management and domination of the inside business operations of the bank were vested in and exercised at all times by the defendant. He alone directed and supervised the details of the administration of the affairs of the institution. He, as a rule, counted the cash on hand at the close of each day's business, and often examined the books, as it was his duty to do. The clerks and bookkeepers discharged their respective duties in obedience to the requirements of the system in vogue in the bank for many years, if not always from its organization, and all this under the immediate direction and control of the defendant. One of the books—the loan register and the important book in this case—was kept by the defendant himself. The witness Cox, who was the bookkeeper in the bank for some 17 months prior to the discovery of the shortage, testified that the defendant looked over the tags of each day on every following morning. He further stated that the accused "would always check over the adding machine slip to see that each debit and credit was listed by the machine," and that it was the defendant's custom to check each tag with the list preparatory to having it entered in the books. Furthermore, the defendant, a couple of months prior to the transaction on which the indictment is founded, and in the month of July, 1908, which, as is apparent, was subsequent to said transaction, delivered to, and filed with, the Bank Commissioner reports verified by him, setting forth facts which were thus represented to be sustained by the balance sheet, the authority for which were the books of the bank. Moreover, when, on the 4th day of December, 1908, in response to a previous demand by the Bank Commissioner, the defendant delivered to that official a copy of what purported to be the balance sheet of the day before, he, after being plied with some questions concerning the affairs of the bank, admitted that the statement of the loans was incorrect, and admitted that he was responsible for the condition of the loans, and made a full and practically an accurate explanation of the deficiency and the cause thereof. It may be added that it was at this time that he confessed having wrongfully used and misappropriated over $100,000 of the bank's funds.

We have gone over the testimony sufficiently to show that the defendant possessed full knowledge of the contents of all the books and their condition and of the tags narrating each day's transaction and the general condition of the affairs of the bank. Under these circumstances it cannot for a moment be doubted that the books and tags were admissible for the purpose of disclosing a general shortage, and thus a circumstance tending to establish the truth of the specific crime charged in the indictment.

What we have said with respect to the admissibility of evidence of the tags and the entries in the books applies with equal force to objections to evidence bearing upon certain other features of the case. But it is particularly urged that testimony showing that the defendant, during the period within which occurred the transactions leading to the general shortage, engaged in stock gambling on a very extensive scale, and that the books of the county assessor for said period disclosed comparatively little property to be assessed in his name, was erroneous and prejudicial. This evidence was clearly competent as involving circumstances tending to show that the defendant used the bank's money for private speculation, and thus caused the enormous deficiency in the cash accounts of the institution.

Other specific objections to the court's rulings are pointed out, but this opinion has now been extended to too great a length to give them particular notice. It is enough to say that we have taken the pains to carefully examine all these assignments and have found nothing in them detrimental to the substantial rights of the accused.

3. The court did not err by refusing to give to the jury instructions 4, 7, and 8, requested by the defendant. These instructions would have told the jury, in effect, that the defendant was authorized or had the right to borrow money from the bank whose funds he is charged with having misappropriated, and that if they (the jury) believed from the evidence, or entertained a reasonable doubt upon the proposition, that the defendant borrowed the money involved in the specific charge and in the general deficiency, it would be their duty to acquit. There was no evidence offered to show that the defendant borrowed the money. But undoubtedly the rejected instructions were requested upon the theory that they were pertinent because, as expressed by counsel in his brief, "it is in evidence that the right of the defendant to borrow from the bank was not questioned by any one connected with the bank," and further, that, after the disclosure of his shortage, he paid the bank in full on account of the shortage. In the absence of any evidence whatsoever supporting the only theory of which the refused instructions could be predicated—that he did borrow the money—and in view of the confession of the defendant, by which he not only admitted his responsibility for the losses to the bank, but that such losses were due to his own unauthorized and wrongful acts, the instructions were entirely out of place in the record. But appellant contends that the fact, admitted in evidence, that he returned the money to the bank amounts to proof that the other officers of the bank treated the transactions resulting in the shortage as involving loans. This position is drawn from the evidence of the written acknowledgment by the board of directors of the bank of the receipt of money from the defendant sufficient to cover the general shortage; but, apart from the mere written receipt itself, there is no evidence explaining that transaction, except in so far as it is explained by the general evidence showing the shortage and the defendant's wrongful responsibility therefor, and, of course, this does not sustain, but negatives, the theory that defendant borrowed the money.

Appellant insists that the court erred in its rejection of certain other instructions requested by him. These instructions are numbered 12, 13, 18, 24, and 76. The court's charge was exhaustive, and, in our opinion, fully and clearly covered every principle pertinent to the issue and the facts. Instructions 12 and 76 were, in a little different language, given in those instructions in which the jury were, in substance and in very plain terms, told that, notwithstanding the evidence of the entries in the books tending to show a general shortage, the defendant was entitled to an acquittal, unless his guilt of the specific crime charged was proved beyond a reasonable doubt. We think the court made it appear very clearly to the jury that the defendant could not be legally convicted on the proof alone of false entries or omissions to make proper entries not directly involving the charge laid in the indictment.

As to the other rejected instructions it may be said generally that those principles therein declared, which were applicable to the case, and therefore proper to be read to the jury, were sufficiently covered by the general charge of the court, and manifestly no harm could follow the refusal to repeat them in the language of appellant.

Instructions Nos. 42, 48, 49, 56, 57, and 61, given to the jury on the motion of the people, are denounced by appellant as prejudicially erroneous. We find absolutely no merit in any of the criticisms directed against these instructions. We shall not examine all these in detail. The criticism of instruction No. 42, as to which it is declared that the court thereby instructed the jury that proof of criminal negligence on the part of the defendant would establish the offense, involves, in our opinion, a palpably erroneous construction of its purpose and effect. The first part of the instruction is based on, and is in the language of, sections 20 and 21 of the Penal Code, and is in abstract form. The part of the instruction animadverted upon reads: "The court instructs you that in every crime or public offense there must exist a union or joint operation of act and intent, or criminal negligence." The court, as is obvious, thus referred to crimes generally, and not to the particular one then before the court; and the statement is not only correct as an abstract proposition of law, but is given in nearly every criminal case that is tried, whether the elements of the offense involved call for proof of a specific intent, or for proof only of such criminal negligence as is sufficient in certain cases to establish a crime. There may, and no doubt do, arise cases in which an instruction involving an abstract statement of a proposition of law would be, and is, harmful to the accused. But this is not one of them. The instruction merely explains or states, as the law provides, that there are crimes, to consummate which the proof of criminal negligence is sufficient, but nowhere does the court expressly say that criminal negligence is all that is required to be shown in the crime with which the defendant is charged. To the contrary, as we have shown, the court, in other portions of its charge, declared in pointed language and concrete form the necessity of proof of a fraudulent and felonious intent with respect to the specific act imputed to the defendant, and described and charged in the indictment before his conviction could legally follow.

We have given this record extended, as well as careful, consideration, and have been unable to discover any error in the trial of the cause which would justify the reversal of the judgment and the order. The record is a large one, and the briefs of counsel on both sides voluminous in size and exhaustive in argument, but we have, nevertheless, endeavored to give to all the important points presented the consideration which we thought they deserved. The trial appears to us to have been fair in all respects, and we doubt not for a moment that the result is justified by the proofs. We may further add, in conclusion, that if the facts of the Cook & Passalacqua transaction, as they are disclosed by the record here, do not sufficiently establish that the specific crime charged in the indictment was committed on the day named in said indictment, and that those facts, with other evidence properly received, do not show that the defendant committed it, then it is difficult to conceive of a case where a bank cashier, engaged for a series of years in a systematic wrongful use of the funds of the bank, and possessing the ability and cleverness to so manipulate the books of the institution as to keep in obscurity for all those years the fact of his dishonesty and the methods by which he has prosecuted his faithlessness to his trust, could ever be made to answer for his crime. Stockholders and depositors could thus be robbed with licensed impunity, and their despoiler go unwhipt of justice. Where, as here, for illustration, the total defalcation involves innumerable distinct transactions, and its prosecution has covered a period of four or five years, there must always be great difficulty experienced by public officers charged with the execution of the criminal laws to specifically prove any particular one of the many transactions from which the general shortage has arisen; and, if the courts, though properly requiring at all times that no substantial right of an accused citizen shall be taken from him in the trial of the charge against him, are to heed and adopt the hair-splitting yet disingenuous refinements often characterizing the arguments of learned and ingenious lawyers in their interpretation and application of rules of evidence, particularly when their clients are beset by desperate circumstances, there would then, indeed, invariably appear insuperable obstacles to the true course of justice in such cases.

For the reasons herein given, the judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

We concur: CHIPMAN, P. J.; BURNETT, J.

CIAPUSCI et al. v. CLARK et al. (Civ. 659.)

(Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Nov. 22, 1909. Rehearing Denied by Supreme Court Jan. 21, 1910.)

1. Logs and Logging (§ 3*)—Standing Timber—Contract.

A contract of sale of standing timber recited that the grantor has sold to the grantee a certain amount of timber growing on his land for a fixed sum "as stumpage for said timber." The contract provided that the purchaser should have four years within which to take the timber, with privilege of an extension, and should have 10 days from the date of the agreement to examine the timber and the title. Held to constitute an absolute sale of the timber.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Logs and Logging, Cent. Dig. §§ 6-12; Dec. Dig. § 3;* Contracts, Cent. Dig. § 890.]

2. Logs and Logging (§ 3*)—Contract—Construction—Forfeiture.

A contract for the sale of standing timber gave the purchaser four years within which to remove the timber, with the privilege of an extension by payment of $5 per year rent in advance. Held, that the provision for the rental was a covenant apart from the sale of the timber, and not a condition upon which the sale depended so that nonpayment of such rent at the appointed time could not alone work a forfeiture of all rights under the contract, where the full price of the timber had been paid.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Logs and Logging, Cent. Dig. § 9; Dec. Dig. § 3.*]

3. Logs and Logging (§ 3*)—"Stumpage."

The word "stumpage" is defined to mean timber standing in the tree, and the standing timber on land is commonly called "stumpage." It is also a term used to express the compensation paid by the purchaser for standing timber to be cut and removed by him.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Logs and Logging, Cent. Dig. § 9; Dec. Dig. § 3.*

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, vol. 7, p. 6703.]

4. Landlord and Tenant (§ 108*) — Forfeiture for Nonpayment of Rent.

To entitle a landlord to enforce a forfeiture for nonpayment of rent, he must, as a general rule, make a demand for payment.

Appeal from Superior Court, Mendocino County; J. Q. White, Judge.

Action by A. Ciapusci and another against J. Ross Clark and another. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

McNab & Hirsch, for appellants. Olney, Pringle & Mannon, for respondents.

CHIPMAN, P. J. This is an action to quiet title to certain land in Mendocino county. The cause was tried upon an agreed statement of facts, from which it appeared:

That on May 20, 1903, C. D. Robinson was the owner of the land in question. On that day he executed and delivered to Bender Bros., engaged in the business of buying and selling timber and timber lands, an instrument in writing, hereinafter set out. On September 12, 1903, Bender Bros. sold, assigned, and transferred all their rights under said instrument to defendant J. Ross Clark, by assignment written on said instrument, which, with said assignment was, on September 21, 1903, duly recorded in the office of the county recorder of said county. On October 8, 1904, said Clark "sold, assigned, granted and conveyed to the defendant Empire Construction Company, a corporation, all his right, title and interest in said instrument and in and to the land and timber therein set out, by an assignment in writing indorsed on said instrument" which was duly recorded after the commencement of the action. This instrument, with the assignments indorsed, is as follows:

"Gualala, May 20, 1903. I, C. D. Robinson, of Gualala, Mend. Co., Calif., have this day sold to Bender Bros., of San Francisco, Calif., a certain lot of timber growing on my land for the sum of eight thousand dollars ($8,000.00) United States gold coin, as stumpage for said timber being located on the northwestern portion of my ranch, and more particularly described as follows, all the timber growing on (describing the land), comprising about four hundred acres, said Bender Bros. to have the right to cut all the timber growing on said land, as above described, with the exception of the Bull pine timber growing next to the County Road, and I, C. D. Robinson, reserve the field fenced in near the southwest corner of said land, said Bender Bros. are to have the right to make all necessary roads for hauling said timber, also privilege of building cook houses and sleeping apartments for working men, also stables and corrals for teams, but no buildings for any other purpose whatever, and they shall not allow any other business to be carried on on the above described premises. And I, C. D. Robinson, reserve the right to go on said land at any time for the purpose of prospecting for mineral water or oil, or any other minerals, and the said Bender Bros. shall have four years to take said timber off of said land, with privilege of a longer time by paying the sum of five dollars per year rent in advance, for a time not to exceed ten years from date of this agreement. And it is further agreed that as soon as the timber is all off they shall peacefully give up all rights and possessions to the above described premises. I, C. D. Robinson, agree to let Bender Bros. have ten days to examine the timber and it is agreed at the end of ten days if they want the timber they will pay five hundred dollars, and at the end of thirty days, if the titles are all right, they are to pay the balance due on the eight thousand dollars. If title is good and the balance is not paid, the said Bender Bros. lose the aforesaid mentioned five hundred dollars. If title proves to be no good, I, C. D. Robinson, will pay the said five hundred dollars back to Bender Bros. I, C. D. Robinson, guarantee all rights of way to the County Road from any part of the above mentioned land, and it is further agreed that Bender Bros. shall have exclusive rights for any and all roads that are made over said land, or to be made on said land. [Signed] C. D. Robinson." (Witnesses to the signatures omitted.)

"San Francisco, Sept. 12, 1903. For and in consideration of the sum of $10.00 to us in hand paid, we hereby sell, assign and set over to J. Ross Clark, of Los Angeles, California, all our rights covered by the foregoing bill of sale. [Signed] Bender Bros., by Geo. L. Bender." (Duly acknowledged so as to entitle this to be recorded.)

"For value received, I, J. Ross Clark, the grantee of Bender Bros. in the within agreement, do hereby grant and convey unto the Empire Construction Company, a corporation, all my right, title and interest in and to the within contract, and in and to the land in the contract described and the timber growing thereon. Reference is hereby made to the description contained in the within contract and to the record thereof in Liber 94 of Deeds, page 128 of the records of Mendocino County, State of California. In witness whereof, I have hereunto set my hand this 8th day of October, 1904. [Signed] J. Ross Clark. Witness: [Signed] Warren Olney." (Duly acknowledged so as to entitle this to be recorded.)

The consideration of $8,000 was paid by Bender Bros. to Robinson, in accordance with the terms of said instrument, and thereupon they entered upon the land "and removed a large portion of the timber set out in the foregoing writing executed by said C. D. Robinson," and during his lifetime, and while he was the owner of the land. No timber has been cut or removed since January 1, 1906. Robinson had knowledge of the removal of the timber under claim of right by Bender Bros. and made no objection thereto. Defendant the Empire Construction Company is the owner of said instrument and has succeeded to and is owner of all the rights existing under it. On September 8, 1906, Robinson conveyed the land to his daughter, Mrs. Jacobs. The deed was duly recorded (date not given), and on February 2, 1907, she conveyed the land to plaintiffs. The deed was duly recorded (date not given), and plaintiffs are now the owners of the land, "subject to any and all right in said lands in favor of the Empire Construction Company which may now exist by virtue of said instrument made and entered into by Robinson with Bender Bros." Said Mrs. Jacobs and plaintiffs acquired said real property with full knowledge of the execution and delivery to Bender Bros. of the written instrument herein set out and of the payments made and of the cutting and removal of timber thereunder as hereinbefore set forth, and defendants had no actual knowledge of the transfer of said real property to plaintiffs until the commencement of the action. (Complaint was filed July 20, 1907.) The $5 per year rent mentioned in said instrument has not been tendered or paid except as appears by the following: On May 22, 1907, the Empire Construction Company, at Los Angeles, mailed to C. D. Robinson a check for $5 to pay the rent for the year ending May 20, 1908. This letter was received by F. L. Robinson, grandson of C. D. Robinson, who, on June 15, 1907, wrote the company, returning the check, and stating that C. D. Robinson was dead, and that the property in question had changed hands. On July 15, 1907, the company replied asking to be advised if C. D. Robinson's "right to the agreement of sale dated May 20, 1903, given by him to Bender Bros., has been assigned, and, if so, to whom, also advise who are his heirs, or name of administrator." On May 11, 1908, the company tendered to plaintiffs $10 in payment of rent reserved in said instrument for the two years beginning May 20, 1907, which was refused, and thereupon the company deposited the amount in the Bank of Point Arena to plaintiffs' credit and so notified them. C. D. Robinson died January 1, 1907.

Upon these facts the court entered judgment for defendant the Empire Construction Company, adjudging it to be the owner of the timber mentioned in said instrument with the right to remove the same and quieting plaintiffs' title subject to such right. Plaintiffs appeal from the judgment on bill of exceptions.

The controversy arises out of the conflicting construction given to the contract of sale by the respective parties. Appellants claim: First, that the agreement conveys "merely a license to cut—'stumpage'—for a determinate amount of time, and if payment is not made at the time fixed the right shall cease, and the time absolutely ceased by failure to make the payments." Second. "If the instrument must be construed to convey an estate in real property, that such interest is not perpetual, but is simply a determinable fee; in other words, merely conveys a present estate of absolute ownership in the timber, defeasible as to all the timber not removed within the time required by the terms of the instrument."

Respondents' position is, "broadly stated, that Robinson sold and the Benders bought all the timber in controversy for $8,000; that Robinson received and Bender Bros. paid for this timber a price mutually satisfactory; that upon the payment of the purchase price the Benders became the owners of the timber itself; that such ownership gave them an indefeasible interest in the realty in controversy; and that respondent company, as the successor of the Benders, is the owner of such indefeasible interest in the realty." Furthermore, that such "valuable rights in timber covering 400 acres of land will not be held forfeited in a court of equity for nonpayment of $5; that the $5 payment provided for in the contract is a reservation of rent and need not be paid until demanded; and that Robinson's death excused a tender of this rent."

It seems to us that no very searching analysis of the contract of sale is necessary to justify the conclusion that Robinson not only intended to sell, but did sell, all the timber except that specifically reserved. The condition as to the examination of the title rendered the contract executory, but upon full payment made it became an executed sale. Throughout the instrument the language imports a sale of all the timber; the price paid was for all the timber and was equivalent to $20 per acre—certainly on its face an adequate price, as it manifestly was satisfactory to seller and buyer. The property sold is described as "all the timber growing on" the land described; the purchasers "to have the right to cut all the timber growing on said land." The purchasers were given "four years to take said timber off of said land, with privilege of a longer time by paying the sum of five dollars per year rent in advance, for a time not to exceed ten years from date of this agreement," and they were to "peacefully give up all rights and possessions" under the contract "as soon as the timber is all off." It was further provided that the purchasers were to "have ten days' time to examine the timber" and also to see "if the titles are all right." Undoubtedly this was to give the purchaser opportunity to estimate the quantity of timber on the entire tract and to determine whether to pay the purchase price for all the timber. We can see no such significance in the use of the word "stumpage" as appellants attach to it, namely, "the right to cut timber, or the price of timber as cut." No inference can reasonably be drawn from the use of this word that the sale was less than of the entire standing timber as it stood, or that the price paid was only "of timber as cut." The word "stumpage" is defined to mean "timber standing in the tree." Nitz v. Bolton, 71 Mich. 388, 39 N. W. 15. "The standing timber on land is commonly called 'stumpage.'" Gordon v. Grand Rapids & I. R. Co., 103 Mich. 379, 61 N. W. 549. "'Stumpage' is the term used to express the compensation paid by the purchaser for standing timber to be cut and removed by him." Baker v. Whiting (U. S.) 2 Fed. Cas. 495, 499. As used, the word seems not to have any very definite meaning, and it is not to be given a meaning in conflict with other plain provisions of the contract, e. g., where the seller says, "I * * * have sold * * * a certain lot of timber growing on my land * * * more particularly described as follows, all the timber growing on" the land described. The contract contemplated that a longer period than four years might be necessary for the removal of the timber, and hence the provision extending the time not to exceed 10 years from the date of the contract. And it is upon this provision appellants rely most confidently; the contention being that the right given (i. e., merely a right to cut timber) was for a limited period, and the privilege of continuing that right depended absolutely upon the prompt payment of $5 on May 20, 1907, failing which, all rights of respondents ceased. The resultant effect, if this be true, is to work a forfeiture of the $8,000 paid as the full value of all the timber and also the right to take possession and remove the property bought. Well-established principles forbid any such inequitable result where the intention of the parties, expressed in their contract, may reasonably be held to be otherwise.

We are asked to import into the contract terms of forfeiture where there is not even a hint that forfeiture was intended and where the seller said he was to have peaceable possession "as soon as the timber is all off." In the case of Halstead v. Jessup, 150 Ind. 85, 49 N. E. 821, the owner of timber land sold to Halstead the timber thereon; the contract providing that he was "to have four years to take off said oak timber." Halstead sought to remove some of the timber after four years had expired and was denied the right by Jessup, who had acquired title to the land. The suit was to recover the value of the standing timber. The court said: "The only question between the appellant and the appellee, upon the terms of the contract, was as to the appellant's right, after the expiration of the four years, to go upon the land and take possession of the timber. By the denial of this right, and the retention of the timber, the appellant was certainly damaged to the extent of the value of the timber. The law does not favor forfeitures, and will not enforce them, in the absence of clearly stated conditions of forfeiture. Here, as we have said, there is no stated condition of forfeiture. If by delay in taking the timber after the period named, damage should accrue to the owner of the land, it would not be questioned that such damage could be recovered. But it would be manifestly unjust that mere delay should forfeit both the appellant's money and his timber, and that the appellee should become the owner of the timber upon the strength of an implied forfeiture."

In Irons v. Webb, 41 N. J. Law, 203, 32 Am. Rep. 193, the court held similarly in a similar case, and that the provision for removal within two years is a covenant and not a condition. In Walker v. Johnson, 116 Ill. App. 145, where the timber was not removed within the limited time, the court said: "Under the contract with Abbott, the defendant became the owner of the growing timber, coupled with the right to cut and remove it. This was more than a mere license. It was a substantial part of the thing sold, paid for, and delivered, so far as it was capable of delivery. The time limit for the removal of the timber is to be treated as a covenant and not a condition upon which to base forfeiture."

Our own Supreme Court has expressed similar views in Peterson v. Gibbs, 147 Cal. 1, 81 Pac. 121, 109 Am. St. Rep. 107. The facts there so clearly resemble the facts here that we think the principles of law there laid down must rule this case. The only noticeable dissimilarity discoverable is that in the case cited the instrument used the words "grant, bargain and sell," while here the language is "I have sold." But as we think a sale was intended to be made and was in fact made in the present case by the terms of the agreement, the difference between the two instruments in this regard is immaterial. In the case cited the purchaser agreed to pay $200, annually, rental for the privilege of removing the timber after the ten years had expired and also half of the taxes levied upon the land, while here the purchaser agreed to pay the nominal sum of $5 annually. In the case cited the $200 rental yas paid by the purchaser, but he had not paid his half of the taxes. His contract was made in 1887, and the action was brought in 1901—fourteen years later—and yet no timber had been removed. The court said: "While there is much apparent conflict in the decisions as to the proper construction of a contract for the sale of standing trees to be removed, it is well settled that such a sale may be absolute and the agreement to remove within a specified or reasonable time merely a covenant, in which case the timber remains the property of the purchaser, although not removed within the specified time. See Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law (2d Ed.) p. 541; Hoit v. Mills, 54 N. H. 109, 20 Am. Rep. 19. The question in each case is: What is the contract between the parties? Here there is absolutely nothing in the terms of the agreement which can be construed as making the removal of the timber a condition precedent to the passing of title, or as causing delay in such removal, beyond the period of 10 years from the date of the instrument, or failure to pay the rental reserved or one-half the taxes, to operate as a divesting of the title conveyed."

It seems to us that Peterson v. Gibbs disposes of appellants' contention that the provision for the payment of $5 to secure an extension of the time in which to remove the timber was a privilege given on condition of prompt payment of that sum, and that the use of the term "rent" was without significance. The agreement is conceded to have been inartificially drawn. It is not reasonable to suppose that so important a privilege as that of the right to remove the timber which had been fully paid for should depend upon so trifling a circumstance as the prompt payment of $5 per annum. There is nothing in the nature of the transaction to suggest that consequences so serious were intended to be imposed by such failure, or that a forfeiture of all rights was to follow. We are not precluded from regarding the use of the term "rent" as having some meaning. It was used probably with as clear a conception of its import as the other provisions in connection with it. We see no reason why we may not interpret the provision to mean that the buyer was to pay $5 per annum in advance as rent for the privilege of cutting timber after four years and before the expiration of ten years. As this was a covenant apart from the sale of the timber and not a condition upon which the sale depended, we are led to the safe conclusion that nonpayment at the appointed hour cannot alone work a forfeiture of all rights under the contract. Regarding the $5 payment as rent, there could be no forfeiture under this agreement without demand by plaintiff of the rental upon or after the last day given the lessee on which tc pay. Sauer v. Meyer, 87 Cal. 34, 25 Pac. 153; Civ. Code, § 1442; Taylor on Landlord & Tenant (8th Ed.) § 297; 18 Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law (2d Ed.) p. 375. And in Cyc. p. 1401, the rule is thus stated: "The general rule that to entitle the landlord to enforce a forfeiture for the nonpayment of rent he must make a demand for payment was laid down at an early date and has since been unanimously followed." Respondents suggest, furthermore, that Robinson was dead when the rent fell due, and the lands were then owned by plaintiffs, and there was therefore no requirement on defendants' part to perform the idle act of endeavoring to pay rent to a dead man. Respondents also invoke the maxim, "De minimus non curat lex," citing Mietzsch v. Berkhout, 100 Cal. xviii, 35 Pac. 321, 323. Generally, equity will not relieve where the injury is trifling. See Smith v. His Creditors, 59 Cal. 267; People v. Daniels, 70 Cal. 521, 11 Pac. 655; Civ. Code, § 3533. It would seem grossly unjust to forfeit rights so valuable for so small a sum as $5, and it is asking much of a court of conscience to do so. We do not, however, believe that the exigencies of the case require resort to this maxim, and we do not apply it. If we were to speculate as to the real purpose of this rent clause, we should be inclined to think that it was inserted under a misapprehension that without it some sort of a prescriptive right might accrue to defendants.

The judgment was in accord with sound principles, as we think, and it is therefore affirmed.

We concur: BURNETT, J.; HART, J.

In Bank. Petition for writ of mandate by D. C. Crocket against C. W. Mathews, auditor of Mendocino county, to compel the issuance of a warrant on the treasurer of the county in favor of plaintiff. Peremptory writ issued.

Preston & Preston, for petitioner. Robert Duncan, Dist. Atty., for respondent.

ANGELLOTTI, J. This is an application to this court for a writ of mandate requiring the defendant to draw a warrant upon the treasurer of the county of Mendocino, a county of the fourteenth class, in favor of plaintiff for the sum of $40, alleged to be the amount of salary due plaintiff as justice of the peace of Ukiah township in said county for the month of June, 1909. The matter was submitted on a general demurrer to the petition.

Plaintiff is entitled to the relief demanded if his rights in regard to compensation are determined by the provisions of an act entitled, "An act to amend section 4243 of the Political Code of the state of California, relating to the compensation and expenses of officers in counties of the fourteenth class," approved March 13, 1909. St. 1909, p. 322, c. 208. His present term as justice of the peace commenced in January, 1907, and at the time of the approval of the act of March 13, 1909, the law fixing his compensation was section 171 of the county government act of 1897 (St. 1897, c. 277), as amended by an act approved March 21, 1905 (St. 1905, p. 670, c. 511, § 1), under which both justices and constables of counties of the fourteenth class were compensated solely by specified fees for services performed, it being established by the decision in Smith v. Mathews, 103 Pac. 199, filed June 25, 1909, that the provisions of the act of March 18, 1907 (St. 1907, p. 354, c. 282), by which the county government act, amended in many particulars and revised, was incorporated as a part of the Political Code, was not to be construed as showing a legislative intent that the changes in salaries and compensation thereby made as to many officers should affect incumbents.

The act of March 13, 1909, deals exclusively with the matter of the compensation of the county and township officers of counties of the fourteenth class, no other subject being in the slightest degree referred to therein. The act consists of two sections. Section 1 of the act declares that "in counties of the fourteenth class the county and township officers shall receive as compensation for the services required of them by law or by virtue of their offices the following salaries and fees, to wit"; and this is followed by 15 subdivisions by which the compensation of each officer is fixed. No change was made thereby in the compensation of the recorder, tax collector, assessor, district attorney, and supervisors, who had theretofore received fixed salaries, nor in that of the coroner, public administrator, or surveyor who, under both old and new law, were to receive "such fees as are now or may hereafter be allowed by law." The theretofore fixed salaries of the county clerk, auditor, treasurer, and superintendent of schools were increased, and the sheriff was given certain additional allowances. Subdivision 13 deals exclusively with justices of the peace, giving them for all services rendered in criminal cases, in lieu of the fees theretofore allowed a monthly salary to be paid each month as salaries of county officers are paid, the salary to be $40 per month in townships where the population is 2,000 or more, $30 per month in townships where the population is 1,000 and less than 2,000, and $20 per month in townships where the population is less than 1,000, the population to be determined "by multiplying the vote for Governor cast in each township at the next preceding general state election by five." No change was made in the matter of compensation in civil cases. Subdivision 15 deals exclusively with constables, providing in lieu of certain fees in criminal cases a fixed monthly salary, graded, as in the case of justices, according to the populations of the townships. Section 2 of the act is as follows: "Except as to subdivisions 13 and 15, this act shall not take effect until the expiration of the present term of officers hereinabove enumerated."

It is claimed by defendant that this act was not intended by the Legislature to affect the compensation of incumbents of the offices of justices of the peace and constables at the time it was enacted. It is not disputed that the Legislature had the power either to reduce the compensation of any county or township officer after his election or during his term of office, or to substitute a different method of compensation provided his compensation was not thereby increased; the prohibition of section 9, art. 11, of the Constitution, referring simply to an increase of compensation. Nor is it disputed, the act before us not disclosing whether or not the salary system of compensation substituted thereby for the fee system does produce an increase of compensation for justices and constables, that, if the act sufficiently shows the intent that the new system shall affect incumbents, the conclusive presumption is that the Governor and the Legislature have investigated, ascertained, and determined that the change does not result in an increase of compensation, a fact essential to a valid law affecting incumbents, and that the courts have no right to question or review the determination of the legislative branch of the state in that regard. This is the doctrine established by Stevenson v. Colgan, 91 Cal. 649, 27 Pac. 1089 14 L. R. A. 459, 25 Am. St. Rep. 230. See also, Smith v. Mathews, supra.

We cannot construe the act otherwise than as one intended to affect incumbent justices and constables. The intention of the Legislature in that regard is too clearly expressed to admit of any other construction, and it is impossible to account for the insertion of section 2 of the act upon any other theory. If the act was to have no application to incumbents, section 2 was unnecessary and meaningless. In an act dealing solely with the matter of the compensation of the county and township officers of counties of a certain class, the Legislature says that "except as to" the provisions relating to justices of the peace and constables the act "shall not take effect until the expiration of the present term" of the officers; in other words, shall not affect incumbents, for in the connection in which they are used the words used can have no other meaning. The necessary implication is that the excepted provisions—those relating to justices of the peace and constables—shall "take effect" and affect incumbents at the time every statute, unless a different time is provided therein, does take effect, viz., "sixty days after its passage." Section 323, Pol. Code. So far as the apparent intent of the Legislature is concerned, the act before us must be read exactly as if section 2 in terms read: "Except as to subdivisions 13 and 15, this act shall not take effect until the expiration of the present terms of officers hereinabove enumerated. As to subdivisions 13 and 15, it shall take effect sixty days after its passage." The sentence italicized is, in the absence of other language, the necessary consequence of the other sentence. Nothing else could have been meant or intended.

The doctrine of Smith v. Mathews, supra, is not opposed to our conclusion on this point. The court there was considering an act not dealing exclusively with the matter of compensation of county and township officers, but one that constituted a complete county government act, embracing, as said by the Chief Justice, "numerous other matters of grave importance, entirely distinct from official salaries and compensation." It was held that the true construction of such an act was to treat all the provisions as to compensation alike, and, "knowing that such of them as increase salaries could have been intended to apply only to officers elected subsequent to the amendment, to conclude, in the absence of express and specific declaration to the contrary, that other amendments which may or may not have the effect of increasing compensation were likewise intended to operate only in favor of or against officers to be thereafter elected." In the concurring opinion the rule laid down is substantially that legislation affecting the compensation of an officer will not be presumed as intended to apply to incumbents unless the Legislature "expressly so declares," and will not so apply unless the Legislature has plainly said that it is to do so. Nothing more was meant or said thereby than that the intent of the Legislature to that effect must be made to affirmatively appear by clear language. In the act under consideration the declaration of the Legislature is, in our judgment, tantamount to "an express and specific declaration" that the provisions as to justices and constables shall operate as to incumbents.

The claim is made by learned counsel for defendant that, if the act be construed as operative on incumbent justices and constables, it is violative of section 11 of article 1 of the Constitution, which provides that "all laws of a general nature shall have a uniform operation." It is said that this law does not operate uniformly for the reason that its operation is suspended as to all officers upon whom it assumes to operate except justices of the peace and constables. This objection is answered by the case of Vail v. San Diego Co., 126 Cal. 35, 58 Pac. 392, between which and the case at bar there is no material distinction. The plaintiff there was county surveyor of San Diego county. Under the law existing at the commencement of his term, he was to receive "ten dollars per day for all work performed." During his term, the county government act of 1897 was enacted, and this act provided in effect that in counties of the class to which San Diego belonged the surveyor should receive a salary of $2,000 per annum "in lieu of all fees and per diem now allowed by law." The act provided that its provisions, "so far as they change the compensation of any officer * * * heretofore paid a fixed salary, or heretofore paid a fixed salary and commissions, and not fees or per diem, shall not affect incumbents, unless otherwise provided in any of said sections," and that "this act, except as otherwise herein provided, shall take effect and be in force sixty days from and after its passage." According to its terms, the act did change plaintiff's compensation. The question was whether the act was effectual to change it, the claim being, as here, that the provisions purporting to make the changes operative on incumbents who had previously received a per diem, but not on those who were in receipt of a fixed salary, were in conflict with section 11 of article 1 of the Constitution. It was held that the distinction thus made by the act as to its taking effect on the one class of incumbents and not on the other was not an arbitrary one, but one founded in intrinsic differences naturally suggesting the propriety of different adjustments of the law in that regard, and that the classification was therefore authorized, and, that this being so, it followed that the law was uniform in its operation inasmuch as it affected equally all incumbents in each class or category; the court saying: "A statute is uniform in its operation if it applies to all persons or objects within the class to which it relates. The general provisions of said sections 233 and 234, by which the act of 1897 was made operative on the compensation of incumbents who had been paid 'fees or per diems,' affected equally all incumbents in that category, and such operation is therefore uniform." We see no reason to question the correctness of any conclusion reached in that case. In the case at bar the act was made operative solely as to all incumbents whose method of compensation was changed from fees to salary. The only distinction made by learned counsel between that case and this is that the law involved in the Vail Case "was a general statute applying to the entire state," while the act here is one applicable to one class of counties. This is entirely immaterial. The Vail Case establishes the proposition that such a classification is authorized in any general law fixing compensation of county and township officers, and does not destroy the uniformity of the operation of the law. It is thoroughly established that under the constitutional provision (article 11, § 5) empowering the Legislature to classify the counties by population for the purpose of regulating the compensation of officers, when such a classification has been made, a "statute providing for the compensation of officers within any class is a general law, and * * * it is immaterial whether such provision be in a special statute for each class, or in a single act providing for all of the classes, and * * * an amendment to such statute which affects an entire class is equally a general law, as was the original act." Welsh v. Bramlet, 98 Cal. 219, 33 Pac. 66. This point was very fully discussed in Johnson v. Gunn, 148 Cal. 745, 84 Pac. 665, in which many authorities are cited, and it is concluded "that the provisions made by the Legislature in other acts, or in other sections of the same act, regulating the compensation of officers in other classes of counties, cannot be referred to or taken into consideration for the purpose of determining from them that the provisions relating to the townships in this class of counties are unconstitutional because special, or local, or not uniform with those adopted for the other classes." This was the clear effect of numerous decisions of this court. It may be that these decisions trench somewhat upon the doctrine of the earlier case of Miller v. Kister, 68 Cal. 142, 8 Pac. 813, relied on by defendant, although most of the later decisions have sought to distinguish it on the facts. However this may be, the conclusions we have arrived at not only appear to us to be correct on principle, but are too amply fortified by the later decisions to be avoided.

That there is only one county in the fourteenth class is, of course, immaterial. It is not disputed that the Legislature may classify the townships of any class of counties according to population for the purpose of fixing the compensation of the township officers therein. See Tucker v. Barnum, 144 Cal. 266, 77 Pac. 919; McCauley v. Culbert, 144 Cal. 276, 77 Pac. 923; Johnson v. Gunn, supra.

What we have said practically disposes of all points made by the learned counsel for defendant. We see no good answer to the claim of plaintiff.

Let a peremptory writ of mandate issue as prayed for in the petition.

Ex parte KING. (Cr. 1,558.)

(Supreme Court of California. Jan. 3, 1910.)

1. STATUTES (§ 68*)—"GENERAL LAW."

A law is a "general law" when it applies equally to all persons embraced in a class founded on some natural or intrinsic or constitutional distinction.

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, vol. 4, pp. 3065–3071; vol. 8, pp. 7669–7670.]

2. STATUTES (§ 72*)—"SPECIAL LEGISLATION."

If the individuals to whom legislation is applicable constitute a class characterized by some substantial qualities or attributes of such character as to indicate the necessity or propriety of certain legislation restricted to that class, such legislation, if applicable to all members of that class, is not "special legislation" within the Constitution.

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, vol. 7, pp. 6577–6584; vol. 8, p. 7802.]

3. STATUTES (§ 72*)—"UNIFORM OPERATION OF LAWS."

If a statute operates uniformly on all members of the class to which application of the statute is limited, as it properly may be, it has the "uniform application" required by Const. art. 1, § 11.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Statutes, Cent. Dig. § 72; Dec. Dig. § 72.*

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, vol. 8, pp. 7175–7176.]

4. CONSTITUTIONAL LAW (§ 48*)—GENERAL LAWS—VALIDITY—PRESUMPTION.

Whether the individuals affected by a law constitute such a class that the law is general and not special is primarily one for the Legislature; and, the law being attacked as special, every presumption is to be indulged in favor of its validity.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Constitutional Law, Cent. Dig. § 46; Dec. Dig. § 48.*]

5. CONSTITUTIONAL LAW (§ 48*)—GENERAL LAWS—VALIDITY—PRESUMPTION.

Where, on the facts legitimately before a court on attack of a statute as special legislation, it is reasonable to assume there were good and sufficient reasons actuating the Legislature in creating the class, which alone is affected by the statute, though such reasons may not clearly appear from a mere reading of the statute, such assumptions will be made.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Constitutional Law, Cent. Dig. § 46; Dec. Dig. § 48.*]

6. CONSTITUTIONAL LAW (§ 48*)—SPECIAL LEGISLATION.

To warrant a court in adjudging a statute special legislation on the ground that there was no proper basis for making the class alone affected by the statute, it must clearly appear that there was no reason sufficient to warrant the Legislature in finding a difference and making the discrimination.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Constitutional Law, Cent. Dig. § 46; Dec. Dig. § 48.*]

7. STATUTES (§ 72*)—GENERAL AND SPECIAL LAWS—CLASSIFICATION OF SALOONS.

The difference between saloons permanently established in a definite place, looking forward to a continuance in business, and those only temporarily established in a place, outside a city or town, because of the presence of a camp containing a large body of laboring men, as to the manner in which they are likely to be conducted, is such as to authorize Act March 25, 1909 (St. 1909, c. 413), legislating against the latter class.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Statutes, Cent. Dig. § 72; Dec. Dig. § 72.*]

8. INTOXICATING LIQUORS (§ 15*)—VALIDITY OF REGULATIONS—CLASSIFICATION OF SALOONS.

The distinction between permanently established saloons and those only temporarily established because of the presence of a camp containing a large body of laboring men engaged in a public work, being such as to authorize Act March 25, 1909 (St. 1909, c. 413), legislating against the latter, the provision substantially making establishment of a saloon, outside a city or town in proximity to such a camp, six months prior to establishment of the camp requisite to its being considered a permanently established place, cannot be considered unreasonable, or as one arbitrarily made to confer privileges on the former class.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Intoxicating Liquors, Dec. Dig. § 15.*]

9. CONSTITUTIONAL LAW (§ 70*)—LEGISLATIVE QUESTIONS—GENERAL AND SPECIAL LAWS—CLASSIFICATION OF SALOONS—REASONABLENESS.

Whether the distance of four miles in Act March 25, 1909 (St. 1909, c. 413), legislating against saloons temporarily established outside a city or town, because of a camp containing a large body of laboring men, within four miles of such camp, is a reasonable one is a question for the Legislature.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Constitutional Law, Cent. Dig. § 131; Dec. Dig. § 70.*]

10. STATUTES (§ 71*)—UNIFORM APPLICATION—CLASSIFICATION OF SALOONS.

The uniformity of the operation of Act March 25, 1909 (St. 1909, c. 413), legislating against saloons temporarily established outside a city or town, within four miles of a camp containing a large body of laboring men engaged on public work, the question of temporary nature depending on whether the saloon was established less than six months before the establishment of the camp, is not affected by the provision that the act shall not apply to sales of liquors "at any winery, licensed brewery or distillery where the same is manufactured."

In Bank. Application of L. W. King for writ of habeas corpus, prayed to be directed against J. W. Kelly, Sheriff of Kern County. Writ discharged, and petitioner remanded.

D. M. Hammack and Hammack & Hammack, for petitioner. J. W. P. Laird, Dist. Atty. Kern County, Leslie R. Hewitt, City Atty. Los Angeles, and W. B. Mathews, for respondent. W. W. Dodge, Asst. City Atty. Los Angeles, Warren Olney, Jr., and Max Thelen, amici curiæ.

ANGELLOTTI, J. The petitioner seeks his discharge from the custody of the sheriff of Kern county on the sole ground that the act of the Legislature of the state under which he is held is unconstitutional and void. The act in question is one entitled "An act to prohibit the sale of intoxicating liquors within a certain distance of any camp or assembly of men, numbering twenty-five or more, engaged upon the construction, repair or operation of any public work, improvement or utility," approved March 25, 1909 (Stats. 1909, p. 722, c. 413). By section 1 of this act it is made unlawful "for any person to sell, keep for sale, or give away, any spirituous, vinous, malt or mixed intoxicating liquors at any place situated more than one mile outside the limits of an incorporated city or town, and within four miles of any camp or assembly of men, numbering twenty-five or more, engaged upon, or in connection with, the construction, repair or operation of any public or quasi public work, improvement or utility; provided, however, that nothing in this section contained shall be deemed to apply to the sale, keeping for sale, or disposal of any such liquor at a licensed saloon or liquor store which shall have been established, or at a licensed saloon or liquor store which shall be maintained, at the time this act takes effect, upon the same premises where a licensed saloon or liquor store shall have been established, at least six months prior to the establishment of such camp or assembly of men, or to the sale, keeping for sale, or disposal of any such liquors at any winery, licensed brewery or distillery, where the same is manufactured." Section 2 makes a violation of the act a misdemeanor punishable by fine or imprisonment or both fine and imprisonment.

The claim of the petitioner is that the effect of the proviso excepting certain sales from the operation of the act is to render the act violative of section 11, art. 1, of our Constitution, which provides: "All laws of a general nature shall have a uniform operation." It is urged that, in view of this proviso, this law limiting the business of the sale of intoxicating liquor denies to a portion of a class bearing the same relation to the law equal opportunities in the business so limited. While arbitrary discriminations by the Legislature between persons standing in the same relation to the subject of legislation will not be sustained by the courts, it is firmly settled that "a law is general and constitutional when it applies equally to all persons embraced in a class founded upon some natural or intrinsic or constitutional distinction." City of Pasadena v. Stimson, 91 Cal. 251, 27 Pac. 607. "If the individuals to whom the legislation is applicable constitute a class characterized by some substantial qualities or attributes of such a character as to indicate the necessity or propriety of certain legislation restricted to that class, such legislation, if applicable to all members of that class, is not violative of our constitutional provisions against special legislation" (Deyoe v. Superior Court, 140 Cal. 476, 481, 74 Pac. 28, 29 [98 Am. St. Rep. 73], and cases there cited), and if it operates uniformly upon all the members of such class, it necessarily has the "uniform operation" required by section 11, art. 1, of the Constitution. The question whether the individuals affected by a law do constitute such a class is primarily one for the legislative department of the state, and it is hardly necessary to cite authorities for the proposition that when such a legislative classification is attacked in the courts, every presumption is in favor of the validity of the legislative act. Where upon the facts legitimately before a court, it is reasonable to assume that there were reasons, good and sufficient in themselves, actuating the Legislature in creating the class, though such reasons may not clearly appear from a mere reading of the law, such assumption will be made, and the legislation upheld. To warrant a court in adjudging the act void on this ground, it must clearly appear that there was no reason sufficient to warrant the legislative department in finding a difference and making the discrimination. See Grumbach v. Lelande, 154 Cal. 679, 684, 685, 98 Pac. 1059. In the light of these well-settled rules, there is, in our judgment, no force in petitioner's claim.

The purpose of the act is apparent from its provisions. It was not the design to regulate or prohibit the carrying on in the usual way of the business of selling intoxicating liquor at regularly and permanently established places of business, established without reference to the fact that the place would be temporarily advantageous by reason of the presence of a camp or assembly of men engaged in the kind of work mentioned in the act. That such established places of business might temporarily happen to be within a short distance of such a camp or assembly of men was not considered by the Legislature as sufficient to call for any exercise of its power. The design was to protect the work described in the act, and the men engaged therein, from what is called in one of the briefs "the itinerant saloon," established temporarily in a certain place solely because of the proximity of such a camp or assembly. It seems clear to us that good and sufficient reasons may have appeared to the Legislature for making this distinction. It is easily conceivable that it may have been made to appear that there were evils attendant on the maintenance of such places that did not exist in the case of the place permanently established, and generally almost entirely dependent upon the residents of the community for its existence and support. The saloonman permanently established in a definite place, looking forward to a successful and profitable continuance of his business in the community, naturally has more incentive to conduct his business in an orderly and decent manner, and with due regard, not only for such regulations as may be imposed by law, but also for the idea of the community as to what constitutes a respectable saloon, than has one who is only temporarily established in a place because of the presence of a camp containing a large body of laboring men, and for the purpose of obtaining as much as he can of their earnings. The only incentive of the latter would ordinarily be to so conduct his business as to obtain the largest possible patronage and the greatest possible profit from the men on account of whose presence he had located his temporary establishment. It is unnecessary to dilate on this, for it must be obvious to any one in view of the nature of the business that there would ordinarily be such an essential difference between the two classes in the method of conducting the business that the Legislature might well conclude that certain evils, seriously impairing the doing of work in which the public is interested, and injuring the men engaging therein, exist in the case of the place so temporarily established, while they do not exist as to the permanently established place. As was said in Grumbach v. Lelande, supra, "It certainly is not made clear that good reason does not exist for the discrimination."

If it must be held that the Legislature could make a distinction between the two classes we have discussed, as we are satisfied must be held, we can see no valid objection to the requirement that a liquor saloon or store shall have been established at least six months "prior to the establishment of such camp or assembly of men," in order to be considered a permanently established place. Such is substantially the meaning of the six months' provision. It is apparent that it would be practically impossible to guard against the mere temporary establishment in any other way than by requiring some such evidence of good faith on the part of the person engaging in such business. If the law excepted all places established at the time of the establishment of the camp, approximate knowledge of the site of a proposed camp could always be acquired by the party in sufficient time to enable him to locate within a convenient distance before its establishment. We cannot say that the Legislature was not reasonably warranted in concluding that a "saloon or liquor store," established outside of a city or town, and in the vicinity of the line of a proposed public work on which would be employed a large number of men, less than six months before the actual commencement of the work in that vicinity, would ordinarily be a mere temporary establishment, located solely with a view to the patronage of the men engaged in such work. The period of six months is not in itself an unreasonable time, and the Legislature may well have been justified by the facts within its knowledge in fixing that period. The discrimination thus made between places established more than six months and those established less than six months is not to be taken as one arbitrarily made for the protection of or for the purpose of conferring any privilege on those of the former class, and it may be conceded that it could not be sustained if such were the apparent object. It is to be taken solely as one reasonably made in furtherance of the policy of the Legislature to prohibit the maintenance of temporary establishments for the sale of intoxicating liquors near the "camp or assembly of men" described in the act, a policy, as we believe, fully warranted by its power in the matter of police regulations.

The question whether the distance prescribed, four miles, was a reasonable one, in view of the purpose of the act, was also, of course, a question for legislative determination. There is nothing to indicate that it is at all unreasonable.

Much reliance is placed by counsel opposing this law on the cases of Ex parte Bohen, 115 Cal. 372, 47 Pac. 55, 36 L. R. A. 618, and Van Harlingen v. Doyle, 134 Cal. 53, 66 Pac. 44, 54 L. R. A. 771, but neither of these cases appears to us to be in conflict with the views we have expressed. In both the court held that there were no differences which justified the classification attempted to be made. The Bohen Case involved an ordinance prohibiting interments of bodies within the limits of the city and county of San Francisco, but excepting interments in such lots as had already been purchased for interment purposes. It was made to appear that in one cemetery alone more than 18,000 bodies could legally be interred under the exception, while the capacity of the unsold lots in the same cemetery was sufficient for only 3,600 bodies. It was held substantially that no good reason could be conceived why the one class of burials should be more offensive or more opposed to pubilc policy than the other, and allowed while the other was prohibited. The case of Van Harlingen v. Boyle involved the validity of a provision of law prohibiting the procuring by county officers of any supplies, printing, stationery or books from any person or firm "whose paper has not been established or whose place of business has not been established in the county for one year or more prior to" the time when the prices therefor were fixed by the board of supervisors. It was substantially held that all merchants and publishers stood in the same relation to supplies and advertising for the county, and could not be arbitrarily classified by the period of time during which they had engaged in business in the county. No natural or intrinsic or constitutional basis for any such distinction could be conceived. The essential difference between those cases and this is that here there is sufficient warrant for finding a natural and intrinsic difference between the classes created by the legislative department.

What we have said shows very clearly that the provision excepting from the operation of the act sales "at any winery, licensed brewery or distillery where the same is manufactured" cannot be held to affect the uniformity of the operation of the law. With relation to the evils sought to be prevented, the distinction between such places and the places prohibited is too clear to require discussion.

The writ is discharged, and the petitioner remanded to the custody of the sheriff of Kern county.

JUDSON v. LOS ANGELES SUBURBAN GAS CO. et al. (L. A. 2,233.)

(Supreme Court of California. Jan. 4, 1910. Rehearing Denied Feb. 3, 1910.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1009*)—REVIEW OF CONFLICTING EVIDENCE.

Though the reviewing court will not weigh conflicting evidence in an equity case, it will consider the contention that the evidence is not sufficient to justify any judgment for appellee.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 3971, 3972; Dec. Dig. § 1009.*]

2. NUISANCE (§ 8*)—NOISE AND SMOKE—SIMILAR ANNOYANCES.

The fact that there were electric and steam railroads operated near plaintiff's premises, and may have been a source of discomfort to him, is no defense to an action for a nuisance caused by noise and smoke from a gas plant.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Nuisance, Cent. Dig. § 8; Dec. Dig. § 8.*]

3. NUISANCE (§ 33*) — NOISE AND SMOKE — SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

Evidence held sufficient to sustain a judgment restraining a nuisance caused by noise and smoke from gas works and for damages.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Nuisance, Cent. Dig. § 89; Dec. Dig. § 33.*]

4. NUISANCE (§ 4*)—NOISE AND SMOKE—NATURE OF INJURY.

A thing may constitute a nuisance to the owner of a dwelling, though it has not affected the health of the occupants of such dwelling.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Nuisance, Cent. Dig. § 32; Dec. Dig. § 4.*]

5. NUISANCE (§ 4*)—NOISE AND SMOKE—NATURE AND EXTENT OF INJURY.

A gas factory may constitute a nuisance as to a dwelling, though the noise and smoke therefrom is intermittent, owing to periodical cessation of work, and variation in the direction of the wind.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Nuisance, Cent. Dig. §§ 26, 28; Dec. Dig. § 4.*]

6. NUISANCE (§ 4*)—NOISE AND SMOKE—NATURE AND EXTENT OF INJURY.

A gas factory may constitute a nuisance as to a dwelling owing to noise and smoke, though no damage to the dwelling house or herbage on his land results nor to the rental or saleable value of the property.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Nuisance, Cent. Dig. §§ 26, 28; Dec. Dig. § 4.*]

7. NUISANCE (§ 3*)—MANUFACTURE OF GAS.

Though a gas factory is not a nuisance per se, and is a legitimate and necessary business, it is subject to the rule that the owner of property must use it in such a manner as not to injure that of another.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Nuisance, Cent. Dig. § 12; Dec. Dig. § 3.*]

8. NUISANCE (§ 7*)—MANUFACTURE OF GAS—EFFECT OF PRECAUTIONS.

That the most approved appliances and methods for the manufacture of gas have been adopted does not justify the continuance of such manufacture where it remains a nuisance.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Walter Bordwell, Judge.

Action by William J. Judson against the Los Angeles Suburban Gas Company, the California Coke & Gas Company, and others. Plaintiff had judgment, from which and an order denying a new trial defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Porter, Sutton & Cruickshank, for appellants. Emmet H. Wilson and B. H. Donnell, for respondent.

MELVIN, J. This is an action for damages caused by an alleged nuisance and for its abatement. The action was dismissed as to defendants T. S. C. Lowe and Thaddeus Lowe. The California Coke & Gas Company answered the complaint herein, denying substantially all of its allegations, and E. E. Crandall, as receiver of the Los Angeles Suburban Gas Company, intervened and filed his answer. He does not appeal, however. Plaintiff recovered judgment for $750 damages, and defendants were enjoined from maintaining the nuisance. This appeal is from the judgment and from the order denying a motion for a new trial.

The complaint alleged that the California Coke & Gas Company, as lessee of the other corporation, constantly managed, conducted, and operated certain gas works in such a manner as to precipitate about and above the property of plaintiff dense smoke and noxious, offensive gases. It was also alleged that the manufactory was so operated as to produce loud and disturbing noises, and roaring and rumbling sounds which reached and penetrated to plaintiff's house and studio, and, together with the smoke, gases, fumes, etc., disturbed plaintiff and his family, making the house and studio places "devoid of quiet, peace, and rest."

Plaintiff's property is located upon the bank of the Arroyo Seco in the city of Los Angeles. Mr. Judson is an artist, and at the time of the trial and for a long time prior thereto he had been occupying his studio building as a home, letting his adjacent dwelling house to a tenant. The gas works are about 900 feet from plaintiff's property across the Arroyo in a southwesterly direction from his residence and studio. There is no proof that plaintiff's land has depreciated; that its rental value has been impaired; nor that the health of Mr. Judson or that of any member of his family has been injuriously affected by the operation of defendants' gas works. He did assert, however, that the smoke, odor, and noise produced by the manufacture of gas at defendants' works interfered with his comfortable enjoyment of his property. The testimony adduced before the chancellor was of a conflicting character, and while, of course, we cannot, under our invariable rule, pass upon its weight, we must consider appellants' contention that the evidence is not sufficient to justify any judgment whatever in favor of respondent. Mr. Judson testified that the works were in the Arroyo 50 or 60 feet lower than his property; that nearly every day since the erection of the gas works, at night as well as during the hours of daylight, he had noticed offensive odors; and that the annoyance had gradually increased all the time. Speaking of the noises he testified: "The noises that I complain of consist of a continuous roaring sound and occasional explosions. The roaring is almost continuous, and the explosions are frequent. The roaring sounded like the rumbling of a train, and the explosions sometimes like a shot out of a pistol, sometimes like a shotgun, sometimes like an explosion of dynamite, and again as though it were a large mass of gas that made a much heavier explosion, but not so sharp. I heard these explosions sometimes frequently and sometimes there would be quite a period when it did not occur. These noises disturbed my sleep at night. The members of my family were also disturbed by these noises." He further said: "The smoke disturbed me whenever the wind carried it our way. The smoke was black and white and yellow. We noticed it very soon after the gas works were built, and during the period of a year and a half prior to last January it was occasionally so thick as to obscure the landscape. These periods when it obscured the landscape probably lasted for from 20 minutes to an hour." While unable to state any exact amount of pecuniary damage, Mr. Judson testified that the smoke, odors, and noise had disturbed him in his occupation as an artist. He was corroborated by a number of his neighbors, some residing nearer and some farther from the gas works than he did. Their testimony greatly resembled that of plaintiff, except for the immaterial variations which one expects in accounts given by different people of physical conditions and happenings. The smoke was described as being of a "very penetrating and unpleasant" odor, and as being at times so thick that "it is impossible to see across the road," or as sweeping over the Arroyo "in such quantities as to strongly suggest a London fog." The noise was described variously by the different witnesses, but all agreed that at times annoying explosions occurred, one lady likening the sounds to a Fourth of July celebration.

While it was shown on behalf of the defendants that the main line of the electric railroad between Los Angeles and Pasadena passed very near plaintiff's studio; that the tracks of two steam railroads were within a few hundred feet of his property; and that between the gas works and his home a wagon road crossed the Arroyo on a wooden bridge —we cannot say that the sounds inevitably coming from such sources would be as annoying as those produced by the explosions, clanking of machinery, and hissing produced, according to the testimony, by the operation of the gas works. The fact that other sources of possible discomfort to plaintiff existed in the neighborhood of his property is no defense to an action of this kind. Robinson v. Baugh, 31 Mich. 294. Nor can we say that the annoyance suffered by plaintiff was of a slight character and not such as justified the injunctive relief granted nor the damages awarded. Considered as a whole, we think the evidence on behalf of the plaintiff amply sufficient to sustain the judgment. In order that a judgment of this character may be upheld, it is not necessary that the health of plaintiff or of members of his household should have been impaired. It is sufficient if the odors, sounds, and smoke were offensive to the senses. Meigs v. Lister, 23 N. J. Eq. 201; Coker v. Birge, 9 Ga. 428, 54 Am. Dec. 347; Cleveland v. Citizens' Gaslight Co., 20 N. J. Eq. 206; Bohan v. Port Jervis Gaslight Co., 122 N. Y. 23, 25 N. E. 246, 9 L. R. A. 711; Hayden v. Tucker, 37 Mo. 221.

Admittedly the discomfort caused respondent by the operation of the gas factory was not constant. This makes no difference. It has been repeatedly and we think most properly held that where a nuisance is intermittent, owing to periodical cessation of work, variation in the direction of the wind and the like, nevertheless injunction will lie. The learned chancellor observed in Ross v. Butler, 19 N. J. Eq. 302, 97 Am. Dec. 654: "I am not aware of any authority or established principle, holding that a clear, unmistakable nuisance, which it is intended to commit periodically, will be permitted because it does not exist the greater portion of the time, but only for a small portion of it. This court will not determine that a family shall have their dwelling house made uncomfortable to live in for twelve hours, once in two weeks, or that they shall protect themselves by closing the house tightly, and remaining indoors for that time. It is surely no justification to a wrongdoer that he takes away only one twenty-eighth of his neighbor's property, comfort, or life."

The fact that respondent proved no damage to the dwelling house or herbage on his land nor to the rental, or vendible value of the property, does not prevent the court from awarding damages. In the very nature of things the amount of detriment sustained is not susceptible of exact pecuniary computation. It is for the court to say what sum of money the plaintiff should receive in view of the discomfort or annoyance to which he has been subjected. Wood on Nuisances, §§ 563, 866; Tuebner v. Cal. St. Ry. Co., 66 Cal. 175, 4 Pac. 1162; Gavigan v. Atlantic, etc., Co., 186 Pa. 604, 40 Atl. 834; Berger v. Minneapolis, etc., Co., 60 Minn. 296, 62 N. W. 336; Hockaday v. Wortham, 22 Tex. Civ. App. 419, 54 S. W. 1094.

There is nothing in the habeas corpus proceedings in Re Smith, 143 Cal. 368, 77 Pac. 180, which conflicts with the conclusion reached by us in the case at bar. This court held in the Smith Case that an ordinance passed by the board of supervisors of the county of Los Angeles prohibiting the erection of gas plants in that locality was invalid as being unreasonable. A gas factory does not constitute a nuisance per se. The manufacture in or near a great city of gas for illuminating and heating is not only legitimate, but is very necessary to the comfort of the people. But in this, as in any other sort of lawful business, the person conducting it is subject to the rule sic utere tuo ut alienum non lædas, even when operating under municipal permission or under public obligation to furnish a commodity. Terre Haute Gas Co. v. Teel, 20 Ind. 131; Attorney General v. Gaslight & Coke Co., L. R. 7 Ch. Div. 217; Sullivan v. Royer, 72 Cal. 248, 13 Pac. 655, 1 Am. St. Rep. 51. Nor will the adoption of the most approved appliances and methods of production justify the continuance of that which, in spite of them, remains a nuisance. Evans v. Fertilizing Co., 160 Pa. 223, 28 Atl. 702; Susquehanna Fertilizer Co. v. Malone, 73 Md. 276, 20 Atl. 900, 9 L. R. A. 737, 25 Am. St. Rep. 594; Susquehanna Fertilizer Co. v. Spangler, 86 Md. 562, 39 Atl. 270, 63 Am. St. Rep. 533.

The judgment in this case enjoins the appellant "from conducting and operating the gas works and manufactory * * * in such a manner as to cause or permit smoke, gases or offensive smells or fumes to be emitted therefrom or to be precipitated therefrom upon the property of the plaintiff." Counsel for appellant place upon this language the construction that it absolutely enjoins the gas companies from causing or permitting any smoke or gases to be emitted from the works, regardless of its reaching respondent's property or not. We think this interpretation of the injunction is not justified. The appellants are enjoined from maintaining the same sort of nuisance that had caused the annoyance to plaintiff. The injunction would perhaps be clearer if read with the first "therefrom" omitted, but we think the meaning is obvious. While the language does not limit the production of gases, etc., to such as would be inoffensive to plaintiff, it is clear from the evidence of appellants' own witnesses that the plant is operated with the least possible amount of escaping smoke, fumes, and gases. When so operated, it has been a nuisance injuriously affecting respondent. Therefore any conduct of the processes of manufacture for which that plant is equipped would but repeat the injury and annoyance to him. Consequently the injunction is not too broad, as it might be if applied to some factory in which the injurious effects complained of might be prevented without abating the operation of the works entirely. In this essential particular the case at bar differs from McMenomy v. Baud, 87 Cal. 134, 26 Pac. 795, and that case is therefore not authority for the proposition that the injunction is too broad. Here it is conceded by appellant that the works cannot be operated at all without producing the conditions which obtained when plaintiff commenced his action.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

RUSSELL et al. v. ROSS et al. (S. F. 4,911.)

(Supreme Court of California. Jan. 4, 1910. Rehearing Denied Feb. 3, 1910.)

1. PRINCIPAL AND SURETY (§ 161*)—DISCHARGE OF SURETY—ACTIONS—EVIDENCE—SUFFICIENCY.

In an action against a contractor and his surety for a breach of contract, where it was claimed that the surety was released by the act of the plaintiffs in making premature payments to the contractor, evidence held to sustain a finding that no premature payments were made.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; M. C. Sloss, Judge.

Action by Fred Russell and another, copartners, under the title of Russell & Rogers Company, against George Ross and another. From a judgment for plaintiffs, and an order denying defendants' motion for a new trial, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Myrick & Deering, Edward F. Treadwell, Mastick & Partridge, and H. W. Hutton, for appellants. Walter H. Linforth and Jackson Hatch, for respondents.

MELVIN, J. This action was brought to recover damages for an alleged breach of contract. The jury found a verdict for $10,000 in favor of plaintiffs, and this appeal is prosecuted from the judgment, and from the order denying defendants' motion for a new trial.

It appears that in May, 1902, plaintiffs entered into a contract with defendant Ross for the building of the hull of a vessel at Coos Bay, Or., the price to be $26,725. The Pacific Surety Company executed and delivered to plaintiffs a bond in the sum of $10,000 conditioned upon the faithful performance of the contract by Ross. The agreement between plaintiffs and Ross provided for payments at various times during the building of the vessel, each payment, except the first, depending upon the amount of progress made upon the work. The first four payments, amounting to $12,500, were duly made under the terms of the contract. On September 13, 1902, before the fifth payment became due, Ross telegraphed to plaintiffs for an advance. Plaintiffs took the telegram to Messrs. Foard & Anderson, who were sureties of Ross to the Surety Company, showed them the message, and informed them that, in the opinion of plaintiffs and their lawyers, no prepayment of the installment could be made by plaintiffs to Ross without releasing the Surety Company from liability under the bond. After some discussion plaintiffs loaned Foard & Anderson $2,500, taking the promissory note of the latter firm for that amount, and this money was sent by Foard & Anderson to Ross with the knowledge of plaintiffs. Subsequently the fifth installment became due, and Ross requested that it be paid to Foard & Anderson. This was done by cancellation of the aforesaid note. No interest charge was made. On October 6, 1902, a similar transaction occurred, whereby Foard & Anderson borrowed $1,000 and sent it to Ross, giving the plaintiffs their promissory note as before. Later Ross and Messrs. Foard & Anderson wrote to plaintiffs, asking for more money, and plaintiffs refused either to loan or advance any additional sum. About November 2, 1902, plaintiffs learned that the vessel had been attached. Thereupon Mr. Russell went to Oregon; paid $4,038.57 demanded by the attaching creditors, and settled other claims. These amounted in the aggregate to $9,178.30. He then placed Captain Peterson in charge as representing his firm, and proceeded to finish the hull, at a cost of $14,000. Ross remained as overseer or foreman without compensation. Ross' own testimony on this point is as follows: "I * * * had a pride in the boat, and would like to finish it if I was able. He then said he did not see anything to be done but finish the boat, and I offered him my services without charge or expense to him in completing her. I then went to Prosper with him, and he drew checks, paying off the claims and liens on the boat." Ross also remained on the vessel until its delivery in San Francisco. Upon these facts and others that will appear later in the discussion the District Court of Appeal reversed the judgment, and the order denying a new trial.

In the opinion rendered by the District Court of Appeal it is held that the transaction between Russell & Rogers Company and Messrs. Foard & Anderson, by which the latter were loaned amounts to be advanced later by them to Ross, with the knowledge of Russell & Rogers Company, amounted to the same thing as a payment directly to Ross by respondents, in violation of the terms of the contract; and that the Surety Company was thereby released from all liability under its agreement of suretyship. The case principally relied upon for the support of these conclusions is County of Glenn v. Jones, 146 Cal. 518, 80 Pac. 695. In opposition to these views, respondents contend that the question whether or not premature payments were made is one dependent for solution upon conflicting evidence, and that the jury having found no violation of the building contract, an appellate tribunal cannot set aside that conclusion. They also contend that, even granting the prepayment of amounts due under the contract, such advances do not of themselves release the sureties. Their theory is that no such release occurs unless prepayment places the surety company in a different and more disadvantageous position than that which it would occupy if no untimely payments had been made.

It seems to us that this case presents a sharp conflict of evidence. On the one hand there are declarations on the part of plaintiffs which seem to indicate that they believed their dealings were in effect directly with Ross. In answer to a letter of Foard & Anderson plaintiffs wrote on October 17, 1902: "We are in receipt of your letter requesting us to make a further advance to George Ross. In reply thereto would say that we have already paid all that the contract requires, and advanced $1,000 besides, and we cannot do anything more. Very truly yours, [Signed] Russell & Rogers Company." After the completion and launching of the vessel plaintiffs wrote to the Surety Company, "We have paid to George Ross the sum of $13,747.67 in excess of the contract price, and we now make demand on you for the payment of the amount of your bond, $10,000." They also sent to the persons for whom they were having the vessel built a statement containing, among other things, the following items: "Total cost of construction $40,472.67; contract price $26,725.00; amount George Ross exceeded his contract $13,747.67." And in the first complaint filed by them appeared the statement that "said plaintiffs were compelled to and did pay to the said George Ross in the completion of said boat a sum exceeding $10,000 in excess of the said contract price of $26,725." There were other circumstances supporting the theory that plaintiffs considered their advances as being made to Ross, and not to Foard & Anderson. These are indicated as follows in the opinion of the District Court of Appeal: "And as to the payment of $9,178.30 by plaintiffs when Russell went up and met Ross at Coquille, Or., this was paid by plaintiffs by giving checks to Ross, drawn in his favor, and by him indorsed to the parties to whom the bills were owing. Not only this, but all further sums for material and labor were paid by plaintiffs. The bills were made out against Ross, and certified to by him as being correct. The receipts were given to him and in his name. The amounts were charged on plaintiffs' books to him."

Let us now examine the evidence which supports the theory for which respondent contends. Plaintiff Russell testified that shortly prior to September 13, 1902, plaintiffs received a telegram from Ross requesting them to advance to him $2,500 upon the contract; that he took this dispatch to the office of Foard & Anderson, and informed a member of that firm that he had consulted his firm's attorney, and had been advised by the latter that if they made the advance requested by Ross, such action would release the Surety Company from all liability; that on the day following, Mr. Foard called upon plaintiffs and asked them to advance the $2,500; that they refused this request; that Foard & Anderson, who were the sureties of Ross to the Surety Company, requested plaintiffs to make them a loan of $2,500, which they would then advance to Ross and obtain from him an order on plaintiffs for the next payment of $2,500 when it should become due; that they did loan this sum to Foard & Anderson, paying by a bank check drawn to the order of that firm, and taking their note for $2,500 and interest; and that this transaction was entered on the books of Russell & Rogers Company, not as a payment to Ross, but as a dealing with Foard & Anderson. Witness Russell also swore that plaintiffs did not advance said sum of $2,500 or any sum to the defendant Ross, and did not make said loan either directly or indirectly to him, but, on the contrary, made it to Foard & Anderson, and to no other person or persons. He testified additionally that when the fifth payment became due Ross requested that it be made to Foard & Anderson, and that the indebtedness witnessed by the note was duly settled accordingly. Witness Anderson corroborated Mr. Russell in his account of the loan of $2,500. The alleged loan of $1,000 to Foard & Anderson was made, according to Russell's testimony, under practically the same circumstances, and with the same understanding which had existed with reference to the earlier one; but after the note came due, Foard & Anderson having refused to pay it, Russell & Rogers Company brought suit, recovered the amount due upon the note, and collected the judgment.

As to the abandoning of the contract by Mr. Ross, his own testimony was most positive. It appears from the testimony of plaintiff Russell that prior to November 1, 1902, plaintiffs received a letter from Ross, from which they learned that the boat had been attached, that Ross was in financial straits, and that he could not launch the boat unless he could get more money. This letter was immediately shown to the officers of the Surety Company, who declined to do anything, upon the ground that the liability of the company had not matured. Mr. Russell then went to Prosper, Or., where the boat was being built. He found that the hull had been attached for $4,038.50, and that there were clamorous creditors threatening other liens upon the property. The whole amount due he found to be $9,178.30. According to Russell, Ross abandoned the contract, and left the former nothing to do, if the boat was to be completed, but to settle the liens and to proceed with the work on behalf of his firm. While these claims were paid by checks drawn in favor of Ross, the checks were prepared in the presence of Ross and his creditors, and Ross immediately indorsed them and turned them over to the various claimants. Ross testified, speaking of the meeting with Russell, in part as follows: "Q. And you told him, did you not, that you could not complete the boat? A. I certainly did. I was willing to complete the boat but I did not have the means with which to do it. Q. Then you did abandon your contract? A. I was obliged to abandon my contract. I did abandon my contract. I could not do otherwise, as I did not have the money to pay the liens then on the boat and the other claims on which liens were threatened, nor did I have any money with which to complete the boat." After Russell went to Oregon and took charge of the further construction of the vessel, no more payments were made to Ross, but checks were drawn by plaintiffs in favor of those who furnished material and labor for the completion of the hull. This appears from uncontradicted testimony. Ross remained, without compensation, to direct the work, but no money passed through his hands, and no sum was paid out by him after he declared his abandonment of the contract.

It will be seen from the above discussion that the jury was compelled to pass upon a question presented by conflicting evidence. We cannot say as matter of law that the transaction between the plaintiffs and Messrs. Foard & Anderson amounted only to subterfuge, whereby plaintiffs really made untimely payments to Ross. On the contrary, the taking of the notes and the collection after suit of the $1,000 might have indicated to the jurors that plaintiffs were merely accommodating Foard & Anderson, who had an interest in helping Ross to construct the vessel under the terms of the contract. While the written declarations of the plaintiffs and other circumstances might properly form the basis for a different decision upon this point, we cannot usurp the function of the jury, and say that their conclusion was not supported by the weight of evidence. It is not within our province to determine which testimony is true, and which is false. Casey v. Leggett, 125 Cal. 664, 58 Pac. 264. If there is any evidence fairly tending to support the determination of a question of fact, we are bound by it. McMullin v. McMullin, 140 Cal. 112, 73 Pac. 808.

The jury having found that no premature payments were made by the plaintiffs to the builder, and that the latter abandoned his contract, leaving the hull unfinished, it is not necessary for us to determine whether or not a premature payment to the contractor in a case like this would necessarily amount to a breach of conditions sufficient to exonerate the surety. Respondents present authorities sustaining the proposition that not every advancement made to a contractor by the person for whom he is erecting some structure, under an agreement providing for installments of the agreed price at different stages of the work, amounts to a violation of the contract, whereby the surety is relieved of all liability. Among the cases cited are Bateman Bros. v. Mapel et al., 145 Cal. 241, 78 Pac. 734; Hampton v. Christensen et al., 148 Cal. 729, 84 Pac. 200; Monroe v. Nat. Surety Co., 47 Wash. 488, 92 Pac. 281. The learned judge of the superior court in this case, however, instructed the jurors that if the plaintiffs made any payments to Ross prior to the time the same became due under the terms of the contract, such payments had the effect of releasing the Pacific Surety Company from all liability under the contract, and in such case the jury should find a verdict in favor of the Surety Company. The case having been tried upon the theory that any prepayment would have relieved the Surety Company from the duty of indemnifying the plaintiffs in any sum, and having been decided adversely to the litigant who contended for the correctness of that theory, the question whether the rule announced in County of Glenn v. Jones, 146 Cal. 518, 80 Pac. 695, should be applied in all strictness, or a more liberal doctrine should prevail in the case at bar, becomes purely academic.

Before the contract was abandoned by Ross the Russell & Rogers Company had paid him under the contract $15,000. This sum would have doubtless been almost, if not quite, a total loss to them if they had done nothing at that time, because the claims against the vessel aggregated more than $9,000, and it would indeed be remarkable if the incompleted hull would bring anything like its cost at a forced sale. Under the circumstances the most economical thing, both for the plaintiffs and the Surety Company, was the completion of the work by the firm of Russell & Rogers Company. It was the duty of plaintiffs to make the loss as light as possible. Winans v. Sierra Lumber Co., 66 Cal. 65, 4 Pac. 952. Upon the failure of Ross to complete the contract, and the refusal of the Surety Company to have anything to do with the matter, it was clearly the right of plaintiffs to do the work themselves. 1 Sutherland on Damages, § 91; Bryant v. Broadwell, 140 Cal. 490, 74 Pac. 33.

There is no merit in the contention that because Ross remained as foreman without salary, a new contract superseding the ol was made with him. Ross, as we have seen, was a mere volunteer. If he had chosen at any time to leave the place, there was not even such an agreement as would give Russell & Rogers Company the right to demand damages for any loss consequent upon such desertion.

From the foregoing it follows that the judgment and order from which appeal is taken should be affirmed, and it is so ordered.

DOW v. SUNSET TELEPHONE & TELEGRAPH CO. et al. (S. F. 4854.)

(Supreme Court of California. Jan. 4, 1910.)

1. Telegraphs and Telephones (§ 14*)—"Trouble Shooter."

A "trouble shooter" is a person employed by a telephone company to discover and repair minor troubles attending the telephone service, defective telephones, fallen wires, weakness of batteries, and grounding of wires.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Telegraphs and Telephones, Cent. Dig. § 8; Dec. Dig. § 14.*]

2. Electricity (§ 9*)—"Ground."

By "ground," as used in describing difficulties attending the telephone service, is meant the interruption of the current by the crossing of wires or the breaking and falling of a telephone wire to the earth, or against some surface that acts as a conductor of electricity, and interrupts its continued flow along its proper wire.

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, vol. 4, p. 3175.]

3. Electricity (§ 18*)—Injuries From Live Wire—Contributory Negligence—Inquiry By Person Injured—"Hot."

An inquiry by an employé of a telephone company sent out to fix a defective telephone, whether there was "anything hot on it," is an inquiry whether the wires of the telephone which he was sent out to fix had become surcharged from any cause with a dangerous quantity of electric fluid.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Electricity, Cent. Dig. § 10; Dec. Dig. § 18.*]

4. Electricity (§ 9*)—"Fuses."

The "fuses" used in telephones are thin hair-like wires of low fusibility, which immediately melt, and prevent any excess current of electricity from being carried over the telephone wires into the house.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Electricity, Cent. Dig. § 4; Dec. Dig. § 9.*

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, vol. 4, p. 3019.]

5. Electricity (§ 19*)—Actions—Pleading.

In an action by an employé of a telephone company for injuries received by coming in contact with a telephone wire heavily charged with electricity from contact with a light wire of defendant light company, a complaint which charges rottenness of insulation of the light wire, and that the telephone wire came in contact with the electric light wire by reason of natural sagging "and in consequence of having been suspended too closely above said light wire," charges both companies with negligence in allowing their wires to remain in too close proximity.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Electricity, Cent. Dig. § 11; Dec. Dig. § 19.*]

6. Electricity (§ 19*)—Injury from Live Wire—Question for Jury.

In an action against an electric light company for injuries resulting from the escape of electricity from one of the company's wires to a telephone wire thereby injuring plaintiff who was an employé of the telephone company, evidence held sufficient to make the question of defendant's negligence in allowing the insulation of its wire to become defective a question for the jury.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Electricity, Cent. Dig. § 11; Dec. Dig. § 19.*]

7. Electricity (§ 16*)—Injuries from Live Wires—Inspection.

It is the duty of a lighting company carrying electricity by its wires through the streets in dangerous quantities, not only to make the wires safe by proper insulation, but to keep them so by vigilant oversight and repair.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Electricity, Cent. Dig. § 9; Dec. Dig. § 16.*]

8. Electricity (§ 17*)—Injuries from Live Wires—Persons Liable.

Where a telephone wire is placed dangerously close to an electric light wire, the continued maintenance of the wires in this position is negligence on the part of both companies, though the telephone wire was the last one placed in position.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Electricity, Dec. Dig. § 17.*]

9. Electricity (§ 19*)—Injuries from Live Wire—Evidence—Question for Jury.

In an action against an electric light company by an employé of a telephone company who was injured by coming in contact with a telephone wire that had been dangerously charged with electricity through contact with an electric light wire, evidence held sufficient to submit the question of contributory negligence to the jury.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Electricity, Cent. Dig. § 11; Dec. Dig. § 19.*]

10. Electricity (§ 19*)—Injuries from Live Wire—Admissibility of Evidence.

Plaintiff, an employé of a telephone company, was injured by coming in contact with a telephone wire which had been heavily charged with electricity through contact with one of defendant's electric light wires. One of defendant's witnesses was asked if after the accident he had found one of the telephone wires resting on the light wire, and, on replying that he did, was asked if he removed that wire, to which he also answered that he did. Held, that the evidence was not inadmissible as being evidence of subsequent repairs, but was admissible as tending to show the condition existing before and after the accident, as well as the cause of the accident, and tending to show that, when the condition was changed, the trouble was removed.

11. Damages (§ 132*)—Personal Injuries—Excessive Amount.

A verdict for $3,500 for personal injuries from contact with a live telephone wire is not excessive where the plaintiff was burned to the bone on the back of his head, had burns on his hands, several burns on the sole of one of his feet, which at the time of the action caused him pain when walking any distance, and the arch of one foot had permanently broken down, and his ability to earn a livelihood was much impaired.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Damages, Cent. Dig. §§ 372-385; Dec. Dig. § 132.*]

Action by George W. Dow against the Sunset Telephone & Telegraph Company and Oakland Gas, Light, & Heat Company. There was a judgment for plaintiff, and from the judgment and an order overruling a motion for a new trial defendant last named appeals. Affirmed.

John J. McDonald, Bernal Silvester, Garret W. McEnerney, and Wm. B. Bosley (Samuel Rosenheim, of counsel), for appellant. H. W. Pulcifer, Stanley Moore, and A. H. Orrick, for respondent.

HENSHAW, J. Plaintiff was a "trouble shooter" in the employ of the defendant telephone company. His principal duty was to discover and repair minor troubles attending the telephone service, defective telephones, fallen wires, weakness of batteries, and grounding of wires. Upon the day of the accident, he had been sent to locate and remedy the trouble with the telephone belonging to the Pure Water Company. He had been told by his superior that the telephone of the Pure Water Company was "noisy," and had asked in return if there was "anything hot on it." He was told in reply that it seemed to be "a ground." By "a ground" is meant the interruption of the current by the crossing of wires or the breaking and falling of a telephone wire to the earth, or against some surface that acts as a conductor of electricity, and interrupts its continued flow along its proper wire. By his question whether there was anything "hot" on the wire plaintiff's meaning was whether the telephone wires of the Pure Water Company had become surcharged from any cause with a dangerous quantity of electric fluid. Inasmuch as a telephone wire carries only about 30 volts, there is no danger attendant upon working amongst such wires under ordinary circumstances. But, where a telephone wire comes in contact with a wire belonging to some other kind of system using a high voltage, danger may result. Plaintiff inspected the telephone of the Pure Water Company, found it was working badly, examined the fuse box, and found that the fuses were in good condition. The fuses are thin hair-like wires of low fusibility which immediately melt and prevent any excess current of electricity from being carried over the telephone wires and into the house. He thus became satisfied that there was nothing "hot" on the wire, and proceeded down the street following the course of the wire to see if he could locate a "ground." He thus in his progress came to a test pole—that is to say, a pole with a double cross-arm—between which the wires could be scraped, testers applied, and the direction of the trouble located. He ascended this pole to apply his tester to the Pure Water Company wires in order to ascertain whether the trouble lay between that point and the office of the Pure Water Company, or was further on. On ascending the pole he braced himself with one leg thrust over the cross-arm, and took out his pliers to prepare the Pure Water Company's wires for the application of the tester. Running along this pole were numerous other telephone wires. Amongst them were two running out San Pablo avenue to Sixty-Third street, and there crossing the street and passing over electric light wires belonging to the defendant Lighting Company. These wires were the telephone wires of a schoolhouse known as the "Bay School." As Dow was working with his pliers upon the Pure Water Company telephone wires, his hand, or the instrument which it held, came in contact with the Bay school telephone wires, and Dow fell back unconscious, hanging in the air by the leg which he had thrust under the brace. For the injuries which he sustained by this electric shock he brought this action for the recovery of damages against the telephone company and the lighting company. It was made to appear that the defendant lighting company controlled a wire on Telegraph avenue carrying a high and dangerous voltage of electricity. The telephone company had strung the telephone wires of the Bay school across the street and over the wire of the lighting company and in dangerous proximity thereto. Originally about six or eight inches separated them, but by the sagging of the telephone wires, when the wind blew or other disturbance caused the swaying of the telephone wires, they came into occasional contact with the light company wires, and received from them electricity in quantities extremely dangerous to human life. This occasional contact or "bouncing" contact, as it is called, had been noted by employés of the Light Company, and some 10 days before the accident one had reported it to his superior, the foreman, saying that "somebody would get an awful rap out of it some time." But the foreman replied: "To hell with it. It is up to the telephone company. Let them attend to it." It appears that the trouble with the Pure Water Company telephone was caused by the fact that the Bay school telephone wires running near it were thus occasionally supercharged from the lighting company wire, and the Pure Water Company wires, in turn, by induction drew to themselves some of the electric current, thus causing the defective service through the telephone, or making it, as it was called, "noisy." After the accident, the cause of it, the proximity and occasional touching of the Bay school telephone wires with the lighting wire, was remedied, and an inspection showed that the insulation of the light wires was old and chafed, and that the voltage in them was transmitted to the Bay school telephone wires. Plaintiff charged that the Oakland Gas, Light & Heat Company negligently and carelessly allowed its insulation to become defective, and negligently and carelessly omitted to repair and renew it where it was crossed by the telephone wire; that the insulating material covering the lighting wires had become rotten, defective, and worn out, and in such condition that the current contained therein would escape into any wires which might come in contact therewith; and that this was well known to the defendants and unknown to plaintiff. Trial was had before a jury and verdict and judgment for plaintiff followed, from which latter and from the order of the court denying its motion for a new trial, the Gas, Light & Heat Company appeals.

Appellant first contends that the evidence fails to show any negligence upon its part. Herein it refers to the testimony that the insulation was that usually employed by companies engaged in the same service, and that, notwithstanding the number of years for which this wire with its insulation had been in use, it was still good and sufficient insulation. It is further urged in this connection that, as the rottenness of the insulation is the only charge of negligence against the telephone company, there may not be considered upon this appeal the argued negligence charged to both companies of allowing their wires to remain in too close proximity. But in this appellant is in error. The complaint not only charges the rottenness of the wires, but it further charges that the telephone wires came in contact with the electric light wires by reason of natural sagging "and in consequence of having been suspended too closely above said electric light wire." Much evidence of the existing conditions was freely admitted. It was shown that there was a "jumping arc" of light caused by the contact or close proximity of the two wires, and that this was known to employés of the lighting company and reported to their foreman who had charge of that department, and that an inspection of the lighting company's wire after the accident showed an abrasion or fusing or a rottenness at the place of contact which unquestionably allowed the electricity in dangerous quantities to escape to the telephone wire. But, even treating the case as one where the consideration of the negligence must be strictly limited to the defectiveness of the insulation, sufficient was shown to warrant the presentation of the question of appellant's negligence to the jury. Under the evidence offered by plaintiff, it was established that there was dangerous proximity between the wires of the two companies and occasional contact between them. Moreover, the circumstance of the jumping arc made clear the fact of escaping electricity and called direct attention to the circumstance that insulation must of necessity be at that point imperfect, for the duty of the lighting company carrying electricity by its wires through the streets in such dangerous quantities was not only to make the wires safe by proper insulation, but to keep them so by vigilant oversight and repair. Fitzgerald v. Edison Electric Co., 200 Pa. 540, 50 Atl. 161, 86 Am. St. Rep. 732; Hebert v. Lake Charles Ice, etc., Co., 111 La. 522, 35 South. 731, 64 L. R. A. 101, 100 Am. St. Rep. 519; Knowlton v. Des Moines Edison Light Co., 117 Iowa, 451, 90 N. W. 818; Giraudi v. Electric Imp. Co., 107 Cal. 120, 40 Pac. 108, 28 L. R. A. 59, 48 Am. St. Rep. 114; 2 Cooley, Torts (3d Ed.) p. 1492; Day v. Consolidated Light, etc., Co., 136 Mo. App. 274, 117 S. W. 81; Luehrmann v. Laclede Gaslight Co., 127 Mo. App. 213, 104 S. W. 1128. But, in addition, the charge contained in the complaint of the too close proximity between the wires itself embraced an allegation of negligence. It was shown that the wires were originally strung with six or eight inches space between the light wires and the telephone wires, while it is in evidence that a foot and a half or two feet clearance was necessary for safety, and that five or six feet would be even better if it were possible to gain that distance. It matters not that the telephone wire was the last placed, and that this company, therefore, became in the first instance directly responsible for the negligent work. With knowledge upon the part of the appellant that the wire was thus dangerously close and liable to sag, the continued maintenance of the wires in this position was negligence upon the part of both companies. Rubin, 102 Va. 809, 47 S. E. 834; W. U. Telegraph Co. v. Griffith, 104 Ga. 56, 30 S. E. 420. In 15 Cyc. 474, the principle is stated in the following language: "Due care requires those using wires or conductors of electricity so to place and maintain them with reference to similar conducting agencies that dangerous contact is not probable; and where wires maintained concurrently by different parties are so erected or strung that one is likely to fall upon or come in contact with the other, thereby producing possible destructive consequences, either or both of them must make efforts to abate such dangerous condition, and, if an injury occurs through a neglect of such duty, both are liable."

It cannot be said as matter of law that the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence. He had satisfied himself that there was no high tension upon the wires which he was examining and was about to test.

There was nothing within his knowledge to lead him to believe that any of the other telephone wires, which in normal conditions were perfectly safe, had become dangerously overcharged, and the question of his contributory negligence was therefore properly submitted to the jury. Paine v. Electric Illuminating & Power Co., 64 App. Div. 477, 72 N. Y. Supp. 279.

The only ruling of the court in admitting and rejecting evidence which calls for specific mention is that where defendant's witness, over its objection, was compelled to testify that after the accident he visited San Pablo avenue near the Bay school, and found one of the telephone wires on the light wire. He was asked the following question, "Did you remove that wire?" and answered that he did. It is contended that this was in the nature of objectionable evidence of subsequent repairs, which is not permissible to show prior neglect as to the condition of the machine or implement. Sappenfield v. Main St. R. R. Co., 91 Cal. 48, 27 Pac. 590; Limberg v. Lumber Co., 127 Cal. 604, 60 Pac. 176, 49 L. R. A. 33; Helling v. Schindler, 145 Cal. 313, 78 Pac. 710. The evidence, however, was not admitted for this purpose nor addressed to this end. It was proper for the plaintiff to prove, as he did, that there had been contact between these wires before the accident, as well as to show contact after the accident. And in fixing the cause for the accident it was quite proper in this connection to show that, when the wires were cleared, the effect was to relieve both the school telephone wires and the Pure Water Company wires of all their trouble. It was evidence, therefore, not of subsequent repairs, but of a condition shown to have existed before the accident, and continuing after the accident, and tending to establish the cause of the accident by further showing that, when the condition was changed, the trouble was removed. See Brunger v. Pioneer Roll Paper Co., 6 Cal. App. 691, 92 Pac. 1043; Dyas v. S. P. Co., 140 Cal. 307, 73 Pac. 972.

The instructions of the court to the jury make up some 44 pages of the printed transcript. It would be unprofitable to discuss the objections which appellant makes to some of them. A reading of them discloses that the jury was fairly and dispassionately instructed upon every phase of the question pertinent for their consideration. Nor can it be said that the verdict in the sum of $3,500 was excessive for the injuries sustained by Dow. He was burned to the bone on the back of the head. He had burns on his hands. Several burns on the sole of one of his feet, one of which was two or three inches long. They still caused him pain when on his feet to any extent or when walking any distance. A breakdown of the arch of one foot resulted and was a progressive and permanent condition. His ability to earn his livelihood was much impaired by the injuries to his hands and feet, and he suffers much pain in the use of them.

The judgment and order appealed from are therefore affirmed.

SPRAGUE v. HART et al. (Civ. 712.)

(Court of Appeal, Second District, California. Nov. 19, 1909.)

1. CONTRACTS (§ 332*)—ACTIONS FOR BREACH—SUFFICIENCY OF COMPLAINT.

In an action for breach of contract, the complaint alleged that plaintiff entered into seven contracts with defendant trust company to purchase certain lots, and made payments thereon; that the title to the lots was in said company as trustee for defendant H. and others; that the contracts were executed by said company as trustee; that thereafter defendant H. acquired all equitable rights of the other persons except plaintiff when plaintiff and H. entered into an agreement, reciting that plaintiff had demanded a rescission of the contracts of sale; that H. agreed to procure the cancellation of the contracts and restore to plaintiff the payments made, by conveying such of the lots as she might select equal; that on inability of the parties to agree on the valuation, a new agreement was made, under which defendant trust company was to hold the title to the lots; that defendants W. and B. agreed to sell as many of the lots as might be necessary to reimburse plaintiff before a date named; that defendant trust company was to convey the lots as sold, and pay over the purchase money, less expenses, to plaintiff; that under the last agreement plaintiff's original contracts were canceled; that nothing was ever done by defendants under the last-named agreement, and that plaintiff has never been repaid, and that a sum specified is now due her; and that title to the lots is still held in trust by defendant trust company for defendants named and plaintiff to secure payment thereof. Held, that the complaint states a cause of action against the three individual defendants upon which a personal judgment might be rendered.

2. CONTRACTS (§ 338*)—PLEADING (§ 8*)—ACTIONS FOR BREACH—ANSWER.

An answer, which denies that defendant trust company holds title as trustee for the benefit of plaintiff to secure her interests in the lots, or that it executed the seven contracts, and denies that the original contracts for sale were ever canceled, and that plaintiff is entitled to be reimbursed, or that any sum is due plaintiff from defendants H., W., and B., or either or any of them, and alleges that plaintiff never made the selections of lots required by her contract, and that defendant trust company never consented to act as trustee under the last contract, raises no material issue, all the denials being conclusions of law, except as to the seven original contracts, which denial was rendered unimportant by the later contracts and the denial that the seven contracts had been canceled.

3. CONTRACTS (§ 245*) — CANCELLATION — EFFECT.

Plaintiff entered into seven contracts for the purchase of certain lots, and made payments thereon. Defendant trust company at the time held title to the lots as trustee for defendant H. and others, and subsequently H. acquired all the equitable rights of the other persons except plaintiff, and plaintiff and H. entered into an agreement by which H. agreed to procure the cancellation of the contracts and restore to plaintiff the payments she had made, by conveying to her such lots as she might select equal. Thereafter a new agreement was entered into, wherein the former contract was made a part of the new agreement, which provided that W. and B. would sell as many of the lots as necessary to reimburse plaintiff before a date specified, and the defendant trust company was to convey the lots sold, receive the purchase money, and pay the same to plaintiff's attorney, less expenses. Held, that the portion of the first agreement, necessitating a selection of the lots to be conveyed to plaintiff, was superseded by an agreement in the last to sell the lots and pay the money.

4. MORTGAGES (§ 386*)—PROPERTY HELD IN TRUST AS SECURITY—POWER OF EQUITY TO FORECLOSE LIEN.

Where a trust company holds title to land in trust to secure to plaintiff the payment of a certain sum, and the debt secured was not paid, and no power of sale in order to reimburse plaintiff was given to the trustee, equity could foreclose the lien or trust to apply the proceeds of sale on the debt.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Walter Bordwell, Judge.

Action by Sarah A. Sprague against George E. Hart and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Johnstone Jones and R. P. Jennings, for appellants. John D. Pope and Wellborn, Wellborn & Campbell, for respondent.

TAGGART, J. This is an action to recover the sum of $1,000, alleged to be due on a contract to reimburse and repay plaintiff payments made by her upon the purchase of certain real estate, and for a decree to sell the real estate and apply the proceeds of such sale to the payment of the amount due. Plaintiff had judgment on the pleadings according to the prayer of the complaint, and defendants appeal.

It is alleged in the complaint that plaintiff agreed to purchase from the defendant Merchants' Trust Company certain lots in Ocean Beach, San Luis Obispo county, and for that purpose, on March 28, 1906, entered into seven contracts with that company, and made certain payments thereon, amounting in the aggregate to $1,000; that the title to the lots at the time they were so purchased was held by said trust company as trustee for the defendant Hart and other persons unknown to plaintiff, and that the contracts were executed by the trust company as such trustee, and that thereafter the trust company held, and still holds, the title thereto, in trust for plaintiff and the other defendants named; that on December 15, 1906, the defendant Hart acquired all the equitable rights of all other persons, except plaintiff, in the lots mentioned, the legal title thereto remaining in the Merchants' Trust Company, and on the last-mentioned date plaintiff and Hart entered into an agreement in writing, wherein it was recited that the plaintiff had demanded a rescission of the contracts of sale on the ground that she had been induced to purchase the lots by representations which were not true, whereby Hart agreed that, while not admitting that any misrepresentations had been made, yet in order to avoid litigation, he would procure the cancellation of the contracts of sale, release plaintiff from all obligation to make further payments thereunder, and restore to her the payments which she had made thereon. By this agreement plaintiff was to be reimbursed for such payments, by accepting conveyances to her, free of incumbrances, of such of the lots as she might select, equal in value to the total amount paid by her, together with interest thereon to date of payment.

Owing to the inability of the parties to agree upon a valuation of the lots to be taken by plaintiff under this contract, a new agreement was made on March 23, 1907, wherein the defendants Williams and Brownstone are named as parties of the first part, Hart, the party of the second part, and the plaintiff, of the third part. The inability of the parties to agree under the contract of December 15th is recited. That instrument is made a part of the new agreement, and the purpose of the latter is stated as follows: "Now, therefore, for the purpose of adjusting said disagreement as to valuation, and to avoid further controversy"—the parties mutually agree, etc. By this instrument it is provided that the Merchants' Trust Company is to continue to hold the title to the lots; Williams and Brownstone agree to sell the lots, or as many of them as may be necessary to reimburse the plaintiff the original payments made by her, with interest, such sales to be made as soon as practicable, but in any event before the ——— day of September, 1907, and at such prices as would provide sufficient means to so reimburse plaintiff after paying all expenses and commissions. The Merchants' Trust Company is to make conveyances of the lots as sold, receive the purchase money, less expenses and commissions, which are not to exceed 40 per cent., and pay over the same to plaintiff's attorney for her. This instrument bears the signatures of the parties thereto, and written assent of the trust company to act as trustee thereunder.

It is also alleged that Hart interested the defendants Williams and Brownstone in the property (in a manner unknown to plaintiff) prior to the making of the agreement of March 23, 1907; that pursuant to the agreement of December 15th plaintiff surrendered up her seven original contracts to the Merchants' Trust Company and Hart and that they were canceled; that nothing was ever done by defendants under the last-named agreement; that plaintiff has never been reimbursed or repaid the sums paid out on the original contracts, and that the sum of $1,000 is now due to her from the defendants Hart, Williams, and Brownstone on account of the matters and agreements above set forth; and that the title to the lots is still held in trust by the Merchants' Trust Company for the defendants named and plaintiff to secure the payment of the $1,000.

The answer denies that Merchants' Trust Company holds title as trustee for, or to secure plaintiff, or for the benefit of plaintiff in any manner at all, or that it executed the seven contracts on behalf of the other defendants; denies that the original contracts of sale ever were canceled; denies that plaintiff is entitled to be reimbursed the moneys paid on the contracts, or that the sum of $1,000, or any sum, is now due plaintiff from the defendants Hart, Williams, and Brownstone, or either or any of them. By way of further answer, it is alleged that plaintiff never made the selections of lots, required by the writing of December 15th, and that the Merchants' Trust Company never consented to act as trustee under the instrument dated March 23, 1907.

That the complaint states a cause of action against the three individual defendants upon which a personal judgment might be rendered is, we think, apparent. As to Hart there is no doubt, and as to Williams and Brownstone their promise to make sales of the lots and pay over the proceeds to plaintiff brings them within the rule declared in Dunn v. Mackey, 80 Cal. 104, 110, 22 Pac. 64, 66. Says the court in that case: "Counsel contend that the defendant bound himself to pay only on condition that he made a sale of the property. But we do not so construe the contract. He bound himself absolutely to sell and pay over the money within a year, and to pay before the end of the year if he made sale of the property." The distinction drawn between the consideration for the promise in that case and in this does not affect the applicability of the rule, and under it the defendants Williams and Brownstone are liable to the plaintiff for the $1,000 on their promise to repay her, on behalf of themselves and their codefendant Hart.

There is nothing in the contention of appellants that because the last agreement expressly makes the first a part of it, the reimbursement to plaintiff must still be made by a selection of lots by her. This portion of the first agreement is superseded by the agreement in the last to sell the lots and pay the money.

There was no material issue raised by the answer. No allegation of fact necessary to the statement of plaintiff's cause of action is denied by the answer of defendants. All of the denials are of conclusions of law, except the denial that the seven original contracts were executed by the Merchants' Trust Company on behalf of the other defendants, which was rendered unimportant and immaterial by the later contracts, and the denial that these contracts had been canceled. With respect to the latter, the complaint having alleged that plaintiff surrendered them up in accordance with the agreement, it was not material to her right to recover that the defendants failed to cancel them as they agreed to. Neither do the matters set up by way of further answer affect her right. The necessity for the plaintiff to make her selection of lots under the first agreement was removed, and passed from consideration when the second instrument was executed. It was equally immaterial whether the Merchants' Trust Company accepted the trust under the last instrument. The company was not a party to that instrument, and no additional burden was placed upon it thereby if it did not assent to its provisions; but, as trustee for the benefit of plaintiff and defendants, and to secure plaintiff her interests in the lots as determined by the parties in interest, the trust company could have made the conveyances necessary to carry out the last agreement without additional authorization.

The relief which a court of equity may grant in such a case as this is to be determined by the respective rights of the real parties in interest as found and adjudicated by the court, and is not affected by the fact that the title to the property which is given as security is held by a trustee. Bell v. Staacke, 141 Cal. 186, 202, 74 Pac. 774. Under the allegations of the complaint the Merchants' Trust Company held the title to the lots in question in trust to secure to plaintiff the repayment of the $1,000. The debt secured was not paid in accordance with the contract; and, no power of sale for this purpose having been given to the trustee, we see no reason upon which to sustain appellants' contention that the court could not foreclose the lien or trust for the purpose of applying the proceeds of sale upon the indebtedness. To accept appellants' view would be to declare that defendants, by failing to carry out their agreement, could deprive plaintiff of the benefit of her security, which would be contrary to all conscience and equity.

Judgment affirmed.

BYRNE v. KNIGHT et al. (Civ. 720.)

(Court of Appeal, Second District, California. Nov. 29, 1909.)

1. Mines and Minerals (§ 83*)—Grub-Stake Contract.

Where under a grub-stake contract plaintiff was to furnish defendant with supplies, and to have an interest in mining claims located by defendant, that after obtaining goods on plaintiff's credit, defendant himself paid therefor did not impair the contract.

2. Mines and Minerals (§ 83*)—Grub-Stake Contract—Evidence.

In an action to have defendants declared to hold in trust for plaintiff an undivided half interest in certain mining locations, evidence held not to support findings that no grub-stake contract existed between plaintiff and defendant at the date of the locations, that plaintiff did not furnish the supplies required, and that the locations were not made in the name of the plaintiff as one of the locators.

Appeal from Superior Court, Inyo County; Walter A. Lamar, Judge.

Action by Jack Byrne against Tom Knight and another. Judgment for defendants and from an order denying a new trial plaintiff appeals. Reversed and cause remanded.

P. W. Forbes and George Edgar Jackson, for appellant. S. E. Vermilyea, Ben H. Yandell (Wellborn, Wellborn & Campbell, of counsel), for respondents.

ALLEN, P. J. The action is one to obtain a judgment decreeing defendants to hold in trust for plaintiff an undivided half interest in certain mining locations. Plaintiff's claim of right thereto is based upon what is known in miners' parlance as a "grub-stake" contract. This contract, the court finds, was entered into between plaintiff and defendant Knight about the 3d of January, 1906, and that plaintiff and defendant performed all conditions imposed upon either up until January 12, 1906, upon which date, the court finds, the contract was abrogated, and that thereafter plaintiff furnished no supplies to Knight; that while Knight did, on and between February 14 and April 26, 1906, locate the following claims, known as "Last Hike" Nos. 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 8, 10, 12, 14, 15, 16, 17, 18, 19, 20, 21, 22, 23, 24, 25, 26, 29, 30, 31, 32, 33, 34, 35, 36, 37, 38, 39, 40, 41, 42, 43, and 44, the "Mars" group, consisting of eight claims, numbered 1 to 8, inclusive, and the "Venus" group, consisting of eight claims, numbered 1 to 8, inclusive, he did not locate during that time "Last Hike" claims Nos. 7, 9, 11, 13, 27, 28, 45, 46, 47, and 48, or "Jupiter" Nos. 2 and 4; that defendant Knight did not locate all or either of the claims found to have been located in the name of plaintiff and himself as equal owners or owners in any other proportion, or at all; that all of said claims were located by said Knight in the name of himself and defendant Joe Simpson; that Knight filed such location notices of the locations made by him in the recorder's office of the "Wild Rose" mining district between the 14th of March and the 2d of April, and that the name of plaintiff did not appear in any of such recorded notices.

The accuracy of the finding of the court with relation to the abrogation of the grub-stake contract, and the further finding that after the 12th of January plaintiff furnished no supplies, and that the locations were not made in the name of plaintiff as originally agreed upon, is challenged. We think, if the findings of the court, to the effect that the grub-stake contract was not in force at the date of the making of the locations, and that plaintiff furnished no supplies between the 12th of January and the dates of the locations, have no support from the evidence, that it is of little materiality whether plaintiff's name was inserted in the location notices posted at the mines or recorded in the mining district. If, as a matter of fact, the uncontradicted testimony in the case demonstrates that the grub-stake contract did exist between the parties at the date of these locations, and that pursuant thereto plaintiff had furnished, as agreed, necessary supplies to defendant, plaintiff's right to the property located during the life of such contract attached, regardless of the character of the location notices actually posted or recorded.

We have examined the record with great care to discover some evidence from which the trial court would be warranted in finding that no grub-stake contract existed at the date of the locations mentioned, or that plaintiff was in default in relation to the obligations imposed upon him by such contract, and we are unable to find any testimony tending to show the abrogation of the contract or plaintiff's default. The uncontradicted testimony in the record is to the effect that, while plaintiff and defendant made the contract, as found by the court, in January, 1906, between that date and January 12th plaintiff was injured and went to Ballarat, a distance of 35 miles from Harrisburg, in the district surrounding which the prospecting was being done; that on the 12th of February defendant Knight came to Ballarat in a wagon driven by a Mrs. Adams, and on that day the grub-stake contract entered into on the 3d of January at Harrisburg was renewed. To use the language of plaintiff, "he told me that me and him was in on anything he found." Pursuant to this, it is in testimony that on that day plaintiff saw one Calloway, who, with a partner named Schober, was operating a little store at Ballarat, and that plaintiff inquired of Calloway—and this is corroborated by Calloway's testimony—if he (Calloway) would furnish Knight with a bill of grub to go prospecting with, and that plaintiff would pay for it later. This Calloway assented to; and it further appears that on the day following, being the 13th of February, Knight applied to Calloway at the store, and asked him if Byrne had made arrangements for some grub for him, and Calloway answered in the affirmative. It then appears that later in the day Knight got the supplies, but they were delivered by Schober, Calloway's partner, who was ignorant of the agreement between plaintiff and Calloway, and after the goods were delivered the same were charged on a tag to Knight and subsequently transcribed upon the books in that way. It further appears that when Mrs. Adams and Knight returned to Harrisburg from Ballarat, Knight told the husband of Mrs. Adams that the reason why he went to Ballarat for the supplies was because Byrne had stood Calloway off for them. It further appears that on the 14th or 15th of February Knight went up about 6 miles from Harrisburg to a locality now called "Skidoo," being the place where these controverted mining locations are situate, and after his arrival there told a fellow miner that he was prospecting for plaintiff and Joe Simpson. It further appears that when he went up to Skidoo he took with him a Dutch oven and some cooking utensils belonging to plaintiff; that the day following, and within a week thereafter, he located all of the mining claims found by the court to have been located by him. The uncontradicted evidence is further that a number of the location notices contained the name of plaintiff as one of the locators in connection with that of Knight and Simpson; and, further, it appears that when copies of the notices were presented a month later for record, the name of Byrne appeared on some of them examined by witnesses. It is true that there is evidence in the record tending to show that after Knight came back to Harrisburg he gave away the supplies obtained at Calloway's and accepted other supplies from Simpson, agreeing to locate for Simpson, and that Simpson was the acting recorder of the district where the location notices were recorded. But even conceding this to be true, a case is presented where a contract is made on the 13th of February, and an arrangement made by plaintiff at the store, the effect of which was to create a liability in favor of the merchant as against plaintiff for the value of the supplies furnished, and that Knight obtained these supplies, and within a time when such supplies would have been sufficient for his sustenance he made the locations, and we find nothing in the record controverting these established facts. It is true that after the locations were made and the notices recorded, and the controversy arose in relation to the interests of the parties, Knight, or some one for him, went to the store of Calloway and Schober and paid the bill; but most certainly, had Knight not paid the bill, plaintiff would have been liable for the goods, under the evidence in the record, and, being liable, and Knight having obtained the goods and made the locations, he could not destroy the force and effect of the contract, nor impair plaintiff's rights, by subsequently, without plaintiff's knowledge or consent, liquidating the demand for the supplies, nor could he destroy plaintiff's rights during the existence of this contract, and while he was subsisting upon plaintiff's supplies by entering into a new contract with Simpson.

As a summary, then, we are of opinion that the record wholly fails to support the findings that no grub-stake contract existed at the date of the locations, that plaintiff did not furnish the supplies required, and that the locations were not made in the name of plaintiff as one of the co-locators. While we recognize fully the force and effect of the rule that where there is a conflict in the evidence the finding of the trial court will not be disturbed, we recognize another rule, that something must affirmatively appear in the record to support a material finding when the same is attacked by proper specifications, and when such finding is essential in support of the judgment.

The order denying a new trial is therefore reversed, and cause remanded for further proceedings.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; J. M. Seawell, Judge.

Action by Jue Yee against Ch. Tetzen & Co. From a judgment granting inadequate relief, and an order denying a new trial, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Robert B. Gaylord, for appellant. M. H. Wascerwitz, for respondent.

COOPER, P. J. This action was brought to recover $5,129.92 for vanilla beans, alleged to have been sold and delivered by plaintiff's assignor to defendant corporation at its special instance and request. Plaintiff recovered judgment for only $272, and hence he prosecutes this appeal from the judgment, and from the order denying his motion for a new trial.

The subject of the controversy is 150 tins of vanilla beans, the gross weight of which was 15,838 pounds, the said beans having been shipped from Tahiti, and delivered into the possession of the defendant, and were, while in his possession in his storeroom, burned in the fire of April 18, 1906. There is no dispute as to the fact that the defendant was to pay 34 cents per pound for good vanilla beans. There is no question as to the fact that the defendant had, at the time of the fire, the actual possession of the beans. There is no dispute as to the right of the defendant to have good beans and to reject all bad beans. The question, therefore, before the trial court was as to whether or not the title had actually passed to defendant at the time the beans were destroyed. This question, under a conflict in the testimony, was one peculiarly for the trial court to determine. It determined the question in favor of the defendant, and there is sufficient evidence to support the finding. There is evidence which, if true, shows that the beans were delivered only for the purpose of inspection, and in order that the good beans might be selected. There is evidence that the assignor of plaintiff went to the defendant on the morning of the fire, and some two hours before the beans were burned, and asked the defendant to try to get a wagon and have the beans removed. There is evidence that in a long course of dealing between the parties as to the sale of the same kind of beans in the same kind of tins, defendant always inspected the beans and ascertained the amount of good beans before it paid for them. The facts bring the case so near the line that we cannot disturb the finding to the effect that the title had not actually passed to defendant. To express our views upon the question independent of the determination of the trial court would serve no useful purpose.

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Cruz County; Lucas F. Smith, Judge.

Action by William Powers and others against Oliver A. Perry and others. From a judgment for plaintiffs, and an order denying a new trial, defendants appeal. Reversed.

Wyckoff & Gardner, for appellants. James A. Hall, for respondents.

COOPER, P. J. This action was brought for the purpose of quieting plaintiffs' title to an alleged water right in and to sufficient water from a spring on defendants' land for "household purposes," for the right to convey the same through a pipe to the adjoining lands of plaintiffs on the west, and to enjoin the defendants from in any way interfering with such water right. The case was tried before the court without a jury, and findings filed, upon which judgment was entered for plaintiffs as prayed. This appeal is from the judgment and from the order denying defendants' motion for a new trial.

The main facts, concerning which there is no controversy, are substantially as follows: On the 28th day of April, 1898, one Edward White and his wife were the owners of a tract of land in Santa Cruz county, which tract embraced the lands now owned in separate tracts by plaintiffs, by defendants, and by White. On said day White conveyed to plaintiffs the lands described in the complaint, containing about 54 acres, by an ordinary grant, bargain, and sale deed, which deed contained no reference to any water right of any kind. This deed was immediately placed upon record. On the same day, and as a part of the consideration, White executed and delivered to plaintiffs a written grant to the waters of a spring on the adjoining land retained by White, "sufficient for household use," with the right of ingress and egress to and from the land on which the spring was situated. The plaintiffs entered into the possession of the land so conveyed to them, and used the waters of the spring for household purposes by taking the animals to the spring to water them, and by hauling the water to their dwelling house west of the spring. No controversy arose between the plaintiffs and White as to the use of the waters from the spring.

On November 1, 1900, White, by an ordinary deed of grant, sold and conveyed the tract of land now owned by defendants, and on which the spring is located, to one Patterson, which deed was duly recorded. This deed made no mention of the water right of plaintiffs, nor did it refer to it. Patterson, however, had actual notice of the claim of plaintiffs to the use of the waters of the spring, but he did not know of the water right being in writing. No question, however, arose between Patterson and plaintiffs as to the use of the water. During the year 1904, with the consent of Patterson, the plaintiffs ran a three-quarter inch pipe some 10 or 12 inches underground from a box at the spring down the hill, across a canyon, and thence up the hill, about 150 feet west of the boundary line between Patterson and plaintiffs, where the pipe again emerged from the ground by a standpipe which emptied into a trough on the land of plaintiffs. This pipe, at the point where it leaves the spring, was parallel to a similar pipe which extended from the box at the spring down the hillside to a trough on the Patterson land, where it emerged from the ground and emptied into the said trough for the use of Patterson. This condition appears to have continued without interruption until the 15th day of May, 1906, when Patterson, for a valuable consideration, sold the land to defendants, and executed a deed of conveyance to them. The sale by Patterson was made through an agent, who showed defendants over the premises, but neither Patterson nor the agent spoke to defendants as to any claim of any kind of a water right. In fact it is not now claimed that defendants had any actual notice as to the plaintiffs' claim to the water. Defendants had the records searched, but the grant to the water right claimed was not of record. It was not until July, 1907, that defendants, according to their testimony, discovered, and at the same time objected to, the use of the water through the pipe from their spring. In August, 1907, the plaintiffs placed the grant to the use of the water made to them by White of record.

The defendants thus became the innocent purchasers for a valuable consideration of their tract of land freed of any claim to the water right, unless the finding of the court that they had constructive notice can be sustained. In this regard the court finds: "That said defendant Margaret E. Perry and her husband, Albert A. Perry, had actual notice of circumstances sufficient to put a prudent man or woman upon inquiry as to the fact that the said plaintiffs were adversely, openly, notoriously, continuously, and uninterruptedly using the water from said spring on the land immediately thereafter purchased by said Margaret E. Perry, described and set out in finding No. 2 herein." If the defendants, at the time of their purchase, had actual notice of sufficient facts to put a prudent person upon inquiry, as found by the court, they are bound by the grant of the water to the plaintiffs.

This brings us to a consideration of the main question as to whether the evidence is sufficient to support the finding that defendants had constructive notice. Our Code (Civ. Code, § 19) defines constructive notice as follows: "Every person who has actual notice of circumstances sufficient to put a prudent man upon inquiry as to a particular fact has constructive notice of the fact itself in all cases in which, by prosecuting such inquiry, he might have learned such fact." It is said in the American and English Encyclopedia of Law, second edition, volume 21, page 582: "Constructive notice has been defined to be no more than evidence of notice the presumption of which is so violent that the court will not allow it to be controverted." The above definition is quoted with approval in the exhaustive note to Le Neve v. Le Neve on the question of constructive notice, in White & Tudor's Leading Cases in Equity, sixth edition, volume 2, part 1, star page 46, and the authorities for it are given as follows: Plumb v. Fluitt, 2 Anst. 438, and Kennedy v. Green, 3 My. & K. 719. It has been defined by our own Supreme Court in Wilkinson v. Thorp, 128 Cal. 224,[1] as follows: "Constructive notice is a knowledge of such facts that the party possessing such knowledge is conclusively presumed to know other things besides the facts which have been proven to have come to his knowledge. The information or knowledge of facts possessed by a party must be such that he is conclusively presumed to have notice of the main fact to which the constructive notice is invoked."

Applying the above definitions, it is clear that the burden was upon plaintiffs to prove that the defendants had knowledge of facts sufficient to raise a conclusive presumption against them as to knowledge of the main fact; that is, the right of plaintiffs to the use of the water for the purposes named in the grant made to them by White. If the defendants had known that the water was being used by plaintiffs, it would have been their duty to make inquiry concerning the matter, and ascertain, or endeavor to ascertain, the true facts. And it matters not how such knowledge was obtained, whether by being told orally, or by seeing the plaintiffs taking and using the water, or by seeing the pipe leading from the spring, or patent evidence of such pipe leading from the spring down the hill off the defendants' land, across the canyon, and up to the trough of plaintiffs. In other words, there must be something visible upon the lands shown to defendants, and patent to any prudent person possessing ordinary faculties, that would at least suggest that plaintiffs were taking the water from the spring. We have carefully read the evidence, and do not find it such as to support the finding.

Defendants looked over the place, and at the spring, but they each testified that they saw no pipe or evidence of any pipe leading from the spring off their place. The agent Mann, who was with them, testified that he did not see any pipe, or anything to indicate a pipe, running from the spring to the lands of plaintiffs. It was in evidence that the end of a three-quarter inch pipe was in the spring; that it could be seen by looking down in the bottom of the spring, but the evidence clearly shows that this end of the pipe was near the end of the pipe conveying the water to the trough on the defendants' own premises, and that they both tapped the spring some 18 inches below its surface, and that the spring was partly covered with a heavy growth of briers and tall grass. It was testified by one or two witnesses that there was a depression in the ground leading off down the hill from the spring toward the trough on defendants' land sufficient to indicate that a pipe had been buried in the ground there; but this was perfectly consistent with the fact that it was only the pipe leading down from the spring to the trough on defendants' land. And not only this, but it was shown without contradiction that the ground at and near the spring, and for some distance between the spring and defendants' trough down the hill, is wet and covered with a heavy growth of briers and grass. It was also shown without dispute that below the trough on defendants' land, and from that west to the plaintiffs' boundary line, the land had been plowed and cultivated, and no evidence was found by any one plowing the land of any underground pipe. One of the plaintiffs testified that beyond the land of defendants and across the canyon there is a "visible depression," where the pipe line runs up the hill; but he did not pretend to state how far this depression extends, nor whether it was visible in any manner at the time the defendants purchased, or whether it was visible from the premises purchased by defendants. It was also shown that plaintiffs had plowed and cultivated the hillside through which the pipe was laid below their standpipe and box down the hill to or nearly to defendants' land. The plaintiff William Powers testified that the depression that he had mentioned in his testimony did not run any further down than from the spring to defendants' trough; that the surface is heavily covered with swamp grass and briers. He further testified that weeds and grass were growing around and hanging over the box at the spring so that you could hardly see the water unless you cleared away the weeds and grass.

It does not seem reasonable to impute notice by such facts. Defendants were not compelled to look down into the bottom of the box to see if the ends of two iron pipes were contained therein; nor were they required to dig up the soil to look for a hidden pipe leading off the property. It is said the standpipe and box were visible across the canyon, and where the water came out of the plaintiffs' pipe into the box on the hillside. Conceding that defendants saw the standpipe and trough on plaintiffs' land, they were not bound to inquire where the water came from simply on account of seeing such trough. It was perfectly natural to suppose that the water came from some other place, or from a spring on plaintiffs' own land.

Nor can the doctrine of adverse user aid the plaintiffs. The right of daily ingress and egress to and from and across the land for the purpose of taking water had not existed for five years when the pipe was laid by the consent of Patterson. This pipe had not been in the ground for five years when this action was brought, and not only this, but the use by a pipe covered with earth was not open nor notorious.

The court erred in allowing the plaintiffs to prove, over defendants' objection, that there are three springs of water upon defendants' land, and that plaintiffs have no other source of supply of water than the pipe line leading from defendants' spring. It is true the case was being tried by the court; but as the court, over defendants' objection, admitted the evidence, and seemed thus to deem it important, we cannot say that the evidence, when admitted, did not influence the decision of the trial judge. The fact that defendants have three springs and plaintiffs none, while a misfortune to plaintiffs, is not a reason for giving plaintiffs the use of that which in law belongs to the defendants. Plaintiffs in purchasing the land paid White for the water. Defendants in purchasing their land paid Patterson for the water. One of two innocent parties must suffer, and in such case the loss must fall upon the one through whose negligence it occurred. The plaintiffs, by taking the ordinary precaution of placing the conveyance to their water right of record, could have avoided this litigation.

The judgment is fatally uncertain, being "in and to sufficient water for household purposes." There is no allegation as to the amount of water the plaintiffs will need for "household purposes." No mention is made of the number of stock to be watered, or the number of houses to be supplied. The plaintiffs might erect several houses for their families or relatives upon the land, or build houses for tenants. It is evident that no one could tell by the present judgment the extent of the servitude sought to be placed upon defendants' land. The judgment must be sufficiently certain as to constitute an estoppel between the parties and to be enforced by the court. Rogers v. Overacker, 4 Cal. App. 333, 87 Pac. 1107; Riverside Water Co. v. Sargent, 112 Cal. 230, 44 Pac. 560; Steinberger v. Meyer, 130 Cal. 156, 62 Pac. 483. It was said in the latter case: "Indeed, as the judgment now stands, it can only serve the single purpose of furnishing the groundwork for future litigation, and plaintiff is certainly entitled to something more. He is entitled to a plain and explicit adjudication declaring what his rights are to these waters, and what defendants' rights are to the waters, if they have any."

The judgment and order are reversed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Imperial County; Franklin J. Cole, Judge.

Petition for prohibition by George Fisch and others against P. F. Nice, Justice of the Peace, and others. Defendants had judgment, and petitioners appeal. Affirmed.

Shaw & Brewer and Eshleman & Swing, for appellants. Noland & Birkhauser, for respondents.

ALLEN, P. J. Appeal from a judgment of the superior court of Imperial county. An action was originally commenced by one Wiest, as plaintiff, against Fisch and others in a justice's court of Imperial county. The complaint averred as a first cause of action that plaintiff was the owner of and in possession of certain described inclosed land, upon which was situate personal property belonging to him; that defendants, the owners of certain live stock, willfully allowed such stock to break and enter upon such premises and destroy the personal property of plaintiff to his damage. In a second and third cause of action it was alleged that the live stock belonging to defendants was by them willfully allowed to break into the inclosure of plaintiff and destroy growing crops therein. The demand for damages for all of the alleged causes of action was within $300. Service of process was had upon defendants; they appeared to the action, and thereafter applied to the superior court for a writ of prohibition requiring the justices to desist from further proceedings. An alternative writ was issued, but upon the final hearing the same was dissolved, and judgment ordered for the respondents. From this judgment petitioners for the writ appeal.

Appellants' contention is that it affirmatively appears from the complaint filed that the possession of real estate was involved. Hence the justice was without jurisdiction, and this is asserted upon the authority of Boyd v. Southern California Ry. Co., 126 Cal. 574, 58 Pac. 1046. It may be conceded that if it affirmatively appears from a complaint that title or possession to real estate is involved, the justice is without jurisdiction to hear and determine the action. It is appellants' contention that plaintiff's sole remedy is based upon the act of March 23, 1907 (St. 1907, p. 999, c. 538). This act makes it unlawful for any person owning or having possession of any animal to suffer or permit such animal to break into or enter upon any land owned by or in the possession of another person; and by section 2 it is provided that the owner of, or person who is in the lawful possession of, land trespassed upon in violation of this act is entitled to recover, by action in a court of competent jurisdiction, from the owner of, or person in possession of, or person chargeable with the care of, the trespassing animal. It is insisted, therefore, that because the statute restricts the right of maintaining the action to one in lawful possession, it follows that section 838, Code Civ. Proc., applies, which is that the parties to an action before a justice cannot give evidence upon any question which involves the possession of real property.

We think that appellants' contentions are fully answered by our Supreme Court in Pollock v. Cummings, 38 Cal. 684, cited and approved in Heilbron v. Heinlen, 72 Cal. 374, 14 Pac. 22. The "lawful possession" mentioned in the statute referred to is entitled to a construction by which it may be said that it means only "peaceable or quiet possession, contradistinguished from possession which is not merely constructively tortious, but actually so." Michau v. Walsh, 6 Mo. 346. As to the first cause of action, which seeks to recover for the value of personal property, the injury to which was occasioned by the willful and permissive act of the defendants, we think that the right of action in no wise depends upon the section of the statute referred to, and plaintiff could have maintained such action regardless of the fact as to whether the property was situated upon his own land or upon the land of another. As to the remaining causes of action, which are on account of growing crops, and which may be conceded to be comprehended within the statute mentioned, it was not incumbent upon the plaintiff to show any possession other than actual possession, and this, upon the authority of the cases above cited, may be shown in actions before a justice of the peace; the fact of possession being but an incident, and not the basis of the action. Most especially should this be true in a controversy between one claiming the right of possession of land and a trespasser thereon. We think, therefore, the court was warranted in refusing the writ, and this without reference to the adequacy of the relief afforded the defendants to the action through an appeal.

Judgment affirmed.

KOYER v. WILLMON. (Civ. 717.)

(Court of Appeal, Second District, California. Dec. 1, 1909. Rehearing Denied by Supreme Court Jan. 27, 1910.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1195*)—DETERMINATION—EFFECT ON NEW TRIAL—LAW OF THE CASE.

Questions of law arising out of documentary evidence which establishes undisputed facts or the sufficiency of pleadings, when determined by an appellate court, become the law of the case; but, when the fact which is to be decided depends upon the credit to be given the witnesses whose testimony is received, or the weight to which their testimony is entitled, or the inferences of fact that are to be drawn from the evidence, the sufficiency of the evidence, to justify the decision, must be determined by the tribunal before which it is presented, and is not controlled by an opinion of the appellate court that similar evidence at a former trial of the cause was insufficient to justify a similar decision.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 4661–4665; Dec. Dig. § 1195.*]

2. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1195*)—DETERMINATION—EFFECT ON NEW TRIAL—LAW OF THE CASE.

In an action to have defendant adjudged to hold a one-half interest in property in trust for plaintiff, where one of the issues was whether a partnership existed between them for the purchase of the property, it was not error for the trial court, in delivering his opinion, to state that the burden was upon plaintiff to establish the allegations of his complaint by a preponderance of evidence, but that under the decision on a former appeal, he must hold that a partnership existed between the parties, and that when the plaintiff had given evidence of that, and that the property in suit was included in the agreement, then the burden shifted to the defendant to establish his case by a preponderance of evidence; this not amounting to a statement that the trial court was bound by the former decision as to a question of the existence of the partnership.

3. APPEAL AND ERROR (§§ 1030, 1046*)—HARMLESS ERROR.

Irregularity in proceedings, or misconduct of a trial judge, only includes departures from the due and ordinary method of the disposition of an action by which the substantial rights of a party are materially affected.

4. TRIAL (§ 23*)—COURSE AND CONDUCT—PRESENCE OF COURT STENOGRAPHER.

Where the court reporter was present at the trial of a case, and took stenographic notes of those things required in civil actions by Code Civ. Proc. § 269, it was not error to dismiss him before the oral argument or decision of the case.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Dec. Dig. § 23.*]

5. TRIAL (§ 106*)—ARGUMENT AND CONDUCT OF COUNSEL.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Walter Bordwell, Judge.

Action by A. S. Koyer against J. C. Willmon. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Sidney J. Parsons and O. P. Widaman, for appellant. Jones & Weller and Robert Young, for respondent.

ALLEN, P. J. Appeal from a judgment and an order denying a new trial. The action was one brought to obtain a judgment of the superior court adjudging defendant to hold an undivided one-half interest in and to certain described property in trust for plaintiff, and for a decree that upon the payment by plaintiff to defendant of one-half of the money advanced it be adjudged and decreed that plaintiff is the owner of an undivided one-half interest in said property.

This case was once heard upon appeal in the Supreme Court, and is reported in 150 Cal. 785, 90 Pac. 135. The complaint in the record upon this appeal is the same as was the complaint in the case above cited. In that case upon appeal the Supreme Court held that the allegations of the complaint, if true, were sufficient to make plaintiff and defendant partners, and that a partnership for the buying and selling of lands may be proved by an agreement resting in parol. After the remittitur was sent down in the case above mentioned, defendant filed an amended answer controverting certain matters not theretofore put in issue by the original answer. Having in view these facts, there should be no controversy over the proposition that, in any case, the questions of law arising out of documentary evidence which establishes undisputed facts, or the sufficiency of a complaint to constitute a cause of action, when once determined in an action by an appellate court, become and remain the law of the case. But it is likewise true that, "when the fact which is to be decided depends upon the credit to be given to the witnesses whose testimony is received, or the weight to which their testimony is entitled, or the inferences of fact that are to be drawn from the evidence, the sufficiency of the evidence to justify the decision must be determined by the tribunal before which it is presented, and is not controlled by an opinion of the appellate court that similar evidence at a former trial of the cause was insufficient to justify a similar decision." Allen v. Bryant (Sup.) 100 Pac. 704.

The primary and principal contention of appellant upon this appeal is that the presiding judge in delivering his opinion stated: "In all cases, in the first instance, the burden is upon plaintiff to establish the allegations of his complaint by a preponderance of evidence, but, taking the decision of the Supreme Court in this case into consideration, which binds me and is the law of the case, I must hold that a partnership has been established and did exist between the plaintiff and defendant for the purchase of lot 14. * * * The Supreme Court says that a partnership did exist. I am bound by that; and, as soon as the plaintiff had given evidence of that, and that the property in suit was included in the agreement, then the burden did shift, and it then became the duty of plaintiff to establish by preponderance of the evidence that he had offered to carry out the agreement—take the property in suit for the joint use of himself and defendant—and that the plaintiff had refused to carry out his part of the agreement. * * * I think, as I say, that as soon as the plaintiff had made his prima facie case, this decision being the law of the case, I am bound by it, and that the burden was upon and remained upon the defendant, and this burden I do not think he has met." From this it is insisted that the trial court was guilty of misconduct, or that there was an irregularity in the proceedings, in that it affirmatively appears that the court erroneously construed the decision upon the former appeal to have the effect of concluding the trial court upon questions of fact involved in the establishment of the partnership, and that, in effect, the trial court undertook to cast the burden of disproving such facts upon the defendant by reason of the language employed in the decision above referred to. We do not so construe the statement of the trial court. It will be observed that the trial court stated a correct legal proposition; that in the first instance the burden was upon the plaintiff to establish the allegations of his complaint by a preponderance of the evidence. This is all the burden which the law does cast upon the plaintiff, and the subsequent remarks of the court, in our opinion, were pertinent, and expressed the law when he said that, as soon as the plaintiff had given evidence that the partnership agreement was established, the burden was cast upon defendant to establish a plea in confession and avoidance, or the facts under which such a plea might be established, even though not formally pleaded.

Appellant concedes that the plaintiff, upon this second trial, "made out at most only the barest possible prima facie case, without the slightest bit of corroborative evidence." When he did make out a prima facie case he was at liberty to rest, and then the duty devolved upon the defendant to either present to the court evidence which overcame the prima facie proof, or tended to show, notwithstanding the existence of the partnership agreement, facts from which it would be inequitable and unfair to enforce its terms; and we cannot conceive how appellant or his counsel could be surprised or labor under a misunderstanding when the court made use of the term "burden of proof shifting," as technically it does not shift, for it is always upon the defendant to overcome the prima facie case made out by plaintiff, or to establish the facts which would avoid the equitable relief sought. The mere use of the term "shifting of the burden," when taken in connection with the affirmative statement of the court that the burden rested upon plaintiff in the first instance, should be given no effect other than as a declaration that the burden was upon the defendant to overcome the prima facie case, or to sustain a plea of confession or avoidance, or facts amounting thereto. It is but justice to the trial court to infer from his language: "The Supreme Court says that a partnership did exist. I am bound by that, and as soon as the plaintiff had given evidence of that, and that the property in suit was included in the agreement, then the burden did shift"—taken in connection with his other statement of the burden being upon plaintiff at all times to establish the allegations of his complaint, that the court only undertook thereby to declare that he was bound as of the law of the case by the decision which declared that certain facts, when established, created a partnership, and not that the mere introduction of the decision of the Supreme Court established a partnership. Any other construction would be unjust to as distinguished a jurist as the one presiding at this trial. The fact appearing in the record that testimony was received by the court upon the part of plaintiff tending to establish the partnership and every other allegation of the complaint, and that the finding of the court is based upon such evidence, conclusively shows to our mind that there was no intention by the court to express, nor could it reasonably be apprehended by counsel that he was expressing, an opinion that the questions of fact presented upon the former trial were conclusive upon this, or that the facts involved upon that appeal should conclude the rights of the parties upon the second trial. It is true that in Pratt v. Pratt, 141 Cal. 247, 74 Pac. 742, it is practically determined that it is an irregularity upon the part of the trial court to express an opinion as to the weight and effect which should be given to the testimony of a witness during the progress of the trial, instead of waiting until its close and the summing up of the case, but we apprehend the doctrine of that case will be carried no further than is there declared, and that the rule laid down in Gay v. Torrance, 145 Cal. 144, 78 Pac. 540, to the effect that an irregularity in the proceedings or the misconduct of the trial judge will only include departures by the court from the due and orderly method of the disposition of the action by which the substantial rights of a party have been materially affected, is the correct one. We see nothing in this record, reading it all together, which would indicate either misconduct or irregularity requiring even as serious a consideration as we have given it, and in its treatment we have accorded to appellant all of the rights by which under any method he might be able to present the questions involved upon appeal.

The second and further contention of appellant is that the court erred in dismissing the reporter before oral argument or decision of the case. We are unable to find any authority in support of the proposition that this was prejudicial error; in fact, in civil cases, we are not prepared to say that it would be error to try a case in the absence of the official stenographer, and certainly not where the record discloses that he was present and took stenographic notes of those things required in civil actions by section 269, Code Civ. Proc. Nor do we regard seriously another specification of error to the effect that the court did not request argument of counsel as to the law of the case, or upon any other matter involved in it.

We see nothing in the record indicating that by any action upon the part of the court defendant was deprived of an opportunity to raise and present any and every question involved in the case. Defendant enumerates 35 specifications of error, all with reference to the insufficiency of the evidence to sustain the findings of the court. The court finds upon the evidence, oral and documentary, the entering into of the agreement set out in the complaint; the understanding and agreement of the parties thereunder; the purchase of the property; the agreement that the title to the same should be taken in a certain manner in trust for plaintiff and defendant; the omission of defendant to cause the title to be so taken, but that, on the contrary, he took the title in himself; and generally as true every allegation of the complaint. As before said, it is conceded by defendant that there was a prima facie case made; that is to say, that there was evidence offered in behalf of plaintiff to show the truth of all the allegations of his complaint, and this concession is made necessary by an examination of the record, from which it appears that there was ample testimony offered upon the part of plaintiff to justify and warrant the court in each and every finding made by it. The weight and effect of all this evidence was for the trial court to determine, and it is not incumbent upon an appellate court, nor is it the policy of the law that it should, nor does the law warrant it in substituting, or seeking to substitute, its construction and opinion as to the weight of the evidence in the record, in opposition to the finding of the trial court, with its opportunities of seeing the witnesses, hearing their testimony, and determining with whom the truth lies.

We see no prejudicial error in the record, and the judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

12 Cal. App. 93

STERLING v. COLE. (Civ. 718.)

(Court of Appeal, Second District, California. Dec. 1, 1909. Rehearing Denied by Supreme Court Jan. 27, 1910.)

1. Appeal and Error (§ 994*) — Review — Findings—Credibility of Witnesses.

Since the jury could consider plaintiff's motives and interest, and his conduct in failing to speak when good faith under the circumstances required him to speak, in determining the probability of the existence of an agency by defendant's testator to purchase property for him, though plaintiff's testimony as to the agency was not directly contradicted, a finding against plaintiff's contention under such circumstances could not be disturbed on appeal.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 3902, 3903; Dec. Dig. § 994.*]

2. Principal and Agent (§ 23*)—Actions—Sufficiency of Evidence—Existence of Agency.

In an action to recover money claimed on account of profits made by defendant's testator in purchasing property as plaintiff's agent, evidence held to sustain a finding that testator was not plaintiff's agent in purchasing the property.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Principal and Agent, Cent. Dig. § 41; Dec. Dig. § 23.*]

3. Appeal and Error (§ 994*)—Findings—Conclusiveness — Credibility of Witnesses.

Appellate courts cannot reverse findings based on the credibility of witnesses; the only remedy being a motion for new trial before the trial court.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 3902, 3903; Dec. Dig. § 994.*]

4. Trial (§ 191*) — Instructions — Assumption of Facts.

Where, in an action to recover money due on account of profits made by defendant's testator in purchasing property as plaintiff's agent, the evidence was conflicting as to whether testator was plaintiff's agent in puchasing, instructions assuming the existence of the agency were improper.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. § 422; Dec. Dig. § 191.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, San Bernardino County; Frank F. Oster, Judge.

Action by E. C. Sterling against Henrietta H. Cole, as executrix of John A. Cole, deceased. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Leonard & Surr, for appellant. Byron Waters and H. M. Willis, for respondent.

TAGGART, J. The exceptions mainly relied upon for a reversal are directed to the insufficiency of the evidence to support the general verdict and the findings of the jury upon the 13 special issues submitted to them. The principal question here involved is: Does the record show evidence to justify the jury in finding that the decedent, J. H. Cole, was not the agent of plaintiff in the transaction in question? Plaintiff testifies directly that he did employ Cole to purchase the property, and he is corroborated in some respects by one other witness; and, unless we can say that the circumstances of the transaction and the other testimony were such that the jury, in the exercise of their exclusive statutory right of judging of the credibility of witnesses (section 1847, Code Civ. Proc.), could discredit the testimony of the plaintiff and his witness, we must reverse the judgment.

While these witnesses were presumed to speak the truth, the jury were nevertheless entitled to weigh their evidence by their motives and interests, and to consider the conduct of the plaintiff in speaking or failing to speak when the circumstances required that in good faith he should do so. There was evidence of this character before the jury from which to determine the weight to be given the testimony of these witnesses. From such evidence the jury could ascertain the probability or improbability of the truth of the testimony, and accept or discredit it, although there was not one direct statement in the evidence in conflict therewith. If, basing their findings upon such evidence, the jury should find that the testimony of plaintiff was not entitled to any consideration, this court would not, for the purpose of reversing the judgment, say the verdict was not justified by the evidence. The inferences to be drawn from the circumstances of the transaction, as to the credibility of the witnesses, are peculiarly within the province of the jury. In other words, jurors are not bound to decide, in conformity with the declarations of any number of witnesses which do not produce conviction in their minds, against a presumption or other evidence satisfying their minds. Section 2061, Code Civ. Proc. subd. 2.

Plaintiff's cause of action rests upon the allegations that he gave Cole $25,000 to purchase the interest of one H. E. Harris in a ranch in San Bernardino county, Harris' stock in the Rancho Verde Company, a corporation, in which the title to the ranch was held, and also Harris' interest in some government lands, upon which were located certain springs used in connection with the ranch, and that Cole only paid Harris $20,000 for the property, and concealed this fact from plaintiff. In answer to the special issues submitted to them the jury found substantially the following facts: That Cole did not agree to purchase the property from Harris as plaintiff's agent; that he did not purchase it as such agent, but on his (Cole's) own account; that Cole represented to plaintiff that the lowest price at which the property could be purchased from Harris was $25,000, and that this representation was true, and that this was the consideration paid by Cole to Harris but that the consideration did not all consist of money; that the purchase of this property by Cole from Harris was made, together with the purchase of Harris' interests in other properties, and the consideration as a whole for all these properties amounted to about $40,000, and was paid by assuming the payment of certain debts and obligations of Harris, consisting of taxes, interest, mortgage indebtedness, and contingent obligations due on a portion of the lands which were purchased from the Southern Pacific Railroad Company.

The testimony of Harris shows that he and Cole were the owners of all the corporate stock of the Rancho Verde Company, consisting of 600 shares, Cole of two-thirds (400 shares), and Harris one-third (200 shares), and half owners in other property, against some of which there were outstanding joint indebtedness of both for a considerable sum, besides the contingent liabilities that might have to be met if the railroad company should maintain against the government its rights to certain of the lands in question, which were held by Cole and Harris under contract from the railroad. In October, 1902, Harris gave Cole an option in writing on his interests in the properties, as follows: The 200 shares of Rancho Verde stock for $26,100. Interest in all other properties "over there," $15,000. Later on, October 28, 1902, a 30-day option, more formally drawn, and containing a more detailed description of the various properties, was executed by Harris to Cole, wherein Harris agreed to assign and convey to Cole the same property for a consideration of $25,000, and the assumption by Cole of the payment of all amounts due upon any contracts with the Southern Pacific Railroad, and of a mortgage of $20,000, of which Cole and Harris were each obligated to pay one-half. In explanation of these writings Harris testified that the two were, in effect, the same; that is, that the first showed the gross estimated values of the respective property, while those mentioned in the second were reduced to a net consideration. All the uncertainty as to the contingent liabilities was by the second instrument shifted, so that Cole was to assume them, and Harris could count on a fixed net sum. The later was also intended to be a more formal expression of the transaction. These options were executed in the deed of Harris et ux. to Cole, dated November 25, 1902, except that instead of paying the full $25,000 cash Cole only paid $24,000, which Harris accepted as a full consideration under the second option. The testimony of Harris contained evidence to sustain the findings of the jury as to the transactions between Cole and Harris, except, perhaps, the finding that $25,000 was paid by Cole to Harris. That $20,000 was assumed by the parties to be the net value of the Rancho Verde, and $5,000 the net value of the Las Flores, for the purpose of fixing a net consideration in the last option, in no way detracts from the support which the facts here mentioned give to the inferences of the jury. Neither is it material that subsequently it was developed that nothing need be paid on the railroad contracts. It also appears from the testimony of this witness that, while Mr. Potter (who at one time owned 200 shares of the Rancho Verde stock) held his stock the witness placed a net value of $25,000 on one-third of the corporate property by offering Mr. Potter that amount for his stock.

It also appears from the testimony of Harris that he did not consider any proposition of a separate purchase by Cole of the Rancho Verde property and stock, that in the negotiations he wanted to clear up everything between him and Cole, and that all of the operations between him and Cole after giving the option related to the entire property covered by the option. On the other hand, the plaintiff testified that in the negotiations which Cole was authorized to engage in on his behalf the Las Flores property was not mentioned, that he never took any interest in that property, never wanted to buy it, and that it was not included in his purchase. It is clearly established that the purchase by Cole from Harris was made on his own account, whether he had agreed to buy it for plaintiff or not, and, as we have heretofore said, the question upon which the case hinges is: Was the jury authorized to discredit the testimony of plaintiff?

During practically all of the same period of time covered by the transaction mentioned negotiations were being carried on, and the various steps of a sale and transfer by Cole to plaintiff of the stock of the former in the Rancho Verde Company were being taken, wherein and whereby plaintiff paid and agreed to pay to Cole the sum of $75,000 for his 400 shares of the stock of the corporation and his interest in the property used in connection with the Rancho Verde. In the written contract relating to this sale appears a recital that plaintiff had withheld a large sum of money out of the purchase price to cover the contingency that payment might be required to be made on the railroad contracts in order to make good the title of such portions of the lands as were held in this way. In this connection also appears the recital, "that if the party of the second part (Cole), or his heirs or assigns, or the party of the first part, his heirs or assigns, should * * * be the owner of the other one-third interest in the stock of said company. * * *" This contract is dated November 21, 1902, and the plaintiff testified that as early as October 24th or November 1st he began his conversations with Cole relative to the purchase for him of the Harris stock, and that on the same day (November 21, 1902), he authorized Cole to buy the stock for him for $20,000.

In October, 1905, according to the testimony of defendant, practically three years after both of the transactions (the sale of the Cole and the sale of the Harris interests) had been closed, other than the adjustment of this matter as to the railroad contracts between plaintiff and Cole, Cole asked plaintiff to repay him the sum of money so held out by him. Plaintiff replied that he was as anxious to pay it as Cole was to have it paid, but that he would have to see his attorney first. At that time no mention was made by plaintiff of the indebtedness upon which the present action was founded. Again, Mrs. Cole heard her husband address plaintiff by telephone in relation to this matter in December of the same year, and ask him if he had consulted his attorney in regard to the matter. Cole died November 8, 1906, and on January 17, 1907, defendant as executrix wrote a letter to plaintiff reminding him of the frequent requests of Mr. Cole for repayment of the money so withheld, and received a reply under date of January 19, 1907, to the effect that he (plaintiff) claimed that the estate of John A. Cole owed him a much larger sum than it could be reasonably claimed that he (plaintiff) owed to it. Although plaintiff alleges and testifies that he learned the facts upon which he bases this action between August and December, 1905, he does not testify that he made his claim known to any one until after the death of Mr. Cole. Indeed, the evidence does not disclose that he ever said anything about it prior to the letter of January 19, 1907.

We think there is evidence here upon which the jury might have distrusted and questioned the good faith of a claim made against an estate. They apparently discredited the testimony of plaintiff and his witness in regard to engaging Cole to purchase the property for plaintiff. Their estimate of the credibility of these witnesses might have been reviewed by the trial court on a motion for a new trial, but cannot be considered by this court on appeal. Appellate courts have no way of applying the rules by which the credibility of witnesses is determined. If a party is dissatisfied with the implied findings of the jury in this respect, he must find his remedy with the trial judge, who has had an opportunity to hear the testimony at the trial, and seen the witnesses on the stand. Fowden v. Pac. C. S. Co., 149 Cal. 151, 163, 86 Pac. 178.

Plaintiff's cause of action is based upon an alleged fraud of Cole. He discovered the fraud more than a year prior to Cole's death. He was well acquainted with Cole, knew the condition of his health, that he was failing and could not hope to live long, met him several times in the interval, and never mentioned that he claimed this $5,000 until Cole, the only person who could tell the other side of the story, if there was one, was in his grave, when he asserted his right to the return of the money. If we should say as a matter of law that under such circumstances the jury must accept the testimony of plaintiff, and a witness interested with him, as establishing the agency of Cole, then we would also be called upon to say to a jury that they must lay aside their common observation, knowledge, and experience in passing upon the credibility of a witness. We find nothing in the specifications of insufficiency of the evidence to justify a reversal.

The errors of law assigned need not be considered in detail. The question addressed to the witness Harris for the purpose of ascertaining the reason for the different figures given in the two options which he gave to Cole was a proper one. So, also, was the question intended to elicit the understanding with Mr. Potter. This enabled the jury to determine what liabilities Cole assumed in his contract with Harris, and was relevant to the issue, what was paid by Cole to Harris? The other question objected to had the same bearing. No such limitation of the use of special issues as that contended for by appellant here, was declared in Plyler v. Pacific Cement Co., 152 Cal. 125, 92 Pac. 56.

We are of opinion that the instructions given correctly declare the law. No instruction was proper in this case which assumed that an agency was proven. The rule that where there is no conflict in the evidence, or the evidence is such that the jury could not find otherwise, the court may instruct them that an agency exists as a matter of law has no application to this case.

Judgment affirmed.

GOSS v. GOLINSKY et al. (Civ. 646.)

1. BOUNDARIES (§ 3*) — COURSES AND DISTANCES.

Course and distances control incidental calls for monuments, except where there is a clear intention shown to make such calls locative, and they also control indefinite and conflicting calls for monuments, where surrounding circumstances show them to be more reliable, or where such is the intention of the parties, or where monuments are called for by conjecture.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Boundaries, Cent. Dig. §§ 38-40; Dec. Dig. § 3.*]

2. BOUNDARIES (§ 3*) — COURSES AND DISTANCES.

Distances called for between corners to creeks or roads, unless specially designated in such manner as to show the intention to make them locative, are not such, and will not ordinarily have precedence over a call for course or distance.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Boundaries, Cent. Dig. §§ 38-40; Dec. Dig. § 3.*]

3. BOUNDARIES (§ 3*)—CALL FOR MONUMENT.

Whenever precedence is given to a call for a monument or natural object over a course or distance, it is because the former is considered more reliable evidence than the latter of the actual survey.

4. BOUNDARIES (§ 3*)—CALLS FOR MONUMENTS.

Where calls for natural objects were intermediate and apparently incidental, and were not referred to or marked in such manner as to identify them or show that the original surveyor considered that they were controlling, and confusion would result from attempting to locate the land from such natural objects, resort must be had to the distances given as controlling.

Appeal from Superior Court, Shasta County; Charles M. Head, Judge.

Action by Eugenie J. Goss against B. Golinsky and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Braynard & Kimball, for appellant. W. D. Tillotson and James E. Isaacs, for respondents.

BURNETT, J. The action is to quiet title and to restrain defendants from mining upon land claimed by plaintiff. The property involved lies in township 34 N., R. 5 W., M. D. M., and the only question in controversy is whether the mines in dispute are located in section 28 or section 33 of said township. The north line of said section 33 is the south line of said section 28. As admitted by both parties, the issue is to be determined by the solution of the question whether or not the northwest corner of section 33 is a lost corner. It is so asserted by respondents, and the findings and judgment are based upon the proposition that said corner is what is known as a lost corner, and must be located by the system of surveying designated as the system of proportionate measurements. Plaintiff claims that said mines are located upon her land in the northwest quarter of said section 33, basing the contention upon the theory that the lines should be run in accordance with the calls for natural objects set forth in the field notes of the original government survey. According to appellant's theory, the northwest corner of said section 33 is more than 1,000 feet north of the point where it naturally would be in the ordinary course of United States government surveys and as shown upon the map of the original survey and as called for by the courses and distances of the original field notes. It is admitted that the official plat shows all of the sections apparently square and of the normal size, that the southwest and northeast corners of said section 33 are known, and that the northwest corner as located by the court is substantially 80 chains from said known corners, as called for in said field notes, but the ground for appellant's contention is found in these considerations: The said map shows a stream running across the west line of section 33, 12 chains south from the northwest corner of the section as shown upon the map. This stream is marked "creek," where it crosses said line, but some distance below it is marked "Little Backbone Creek." There is a smaller stream, designated as a "gulch," coming from the northeastward a short distance east of said theoretical corner, and it intersects the stream designated as "creek." These streams, as represented on the map, satisfy the distances called for in the field notes of the original survey, but as a matter of fact they are not correctly delineated. The first stream is approximately 17 chains, or about 1,100 feet, further north. The reference to the natural objects in the calls of the deed upon which appellant relies is as follows: "52.50 Cross gulch Course N. E. and descend; 68.00 Cross creek 10 lks wide Course S. E. and ascend." The contention of appellant, therefore, is that the corner should be moved north to correspond with the actual location of said creek, thus making the western boundary of said section 33 more than 1,000 feet longer, as we have stated, than as represented on the map or indicated by the distances in the field notes.

There seems to be no controversy as to the rules by which such discrepancies are to be resolved; the only difficulty being in their application to the facts. If the only question were the relative importance of natural objects or monuments, clearly identified, and courses or distances, the former would be entitled to precedence, but, as stated in the American & English Encyclopedia of Law (volume 4, page 786): "Courses and distances control incidental calls for monuments, except where there is a clear intention shown to make such calls locative, and they also control indefinite and conflicting calls for monuments. They govern where surrounding circumstances show them to be more reliable, or where such is the intention of the parties, or where monuments are called for by conjecture, and not by actually running out the lines upon the ground according to rule. The doctrine that monuments control courses and distances is never followed where to do so would lead to an absurdity, or where they are inconsistent with the meaning of the deed." Jones v. Andrews, 72 Tex. 5, 9 S. W. 170, is cited as an illustration of an incidental call for monuments. It is therein said: "Appellants asked the court to instruct the jury that a call for a natural object, such as a creek, or for an artificial object, such as a well-marked and long-established public road, will control course and distance, and also the lines of the survey, unless such lines are actually marked upon the ground.

* * * This is only true when they are selected as locative calls, and they are not then always absolute. When they are noted in the field notes as mere incidental calls, in passing, their reliability is weakened, and sometimes rendered wholly worthless. Distances called for between corners to creeks or roads, unless specially designated in such manner as to show the intention to make them locative, are not such, and will not ordinarily have precedence over a call for course or distance."

There are several reasons, in our judgment, why the location of the Little Backbone creek should not have such controlling influence as is claimed by appellant. In the first place, assuming that reference is made to this stream, there is nothing in the field notes to show that it was not a mere incidental call; there is certainly nothing in the surrounding circumstances to indicate an intention to make this stream a locative point. There can be no basis for holding that without reason the United States surveyor, departing from the usual custom, should locate this particular ground in the shape of a distinct trapezoid, increasing the area of section 33 and correspondingly diminishing that of section 28, and introducing irregularity and inequality into the survey, where uniformity and continuity are supposed to be observed as far as possible. But again, the reason for applying the rules to which reference has been made is to ascertain what ground was actually located by the original survey. Whenever precedence is given to a call for a monument or natural object over a course or distance, it is because the former is considered more reliable evidence than the latter of the actual survey. But in the case at bar, without doing violence to the competency of the surveyor, it is impossible to conclude that he actually located said creek as the terminus of said call in the deed, since a mistake of over 1,000 feet in the distance would not be made if any degree of care or skill were exercised. If he had in view this natural object, it is more reasonable to infer that he observed it from a remote point, and guessed at its distance, than that he actually located it by the survey.

There are other circumstances also lending support to respondents' position. Appellant's witnesses, who attached so much importance to said stream, could not and did not locate definitely said northwest corner. The best they could do was to say that it was within a radius of 250 feet from a certain point, and, again, there is evidence of other streams crossing said western line of section 33, and it is impossible to determine which is referred to in the field notes. As already seen, a monument or natural object is of importance only when clearly identified. It is manifestly of no value as an aid to the intention of the parties when its identity cannot be determined. It is true that there is no stream crossing said line at the distance from the southwest corner called for in the field notes, but this circumstance does not aid in the identification of Little Backbone creek as a monument established by the original survey. It would seem, indeed, that if said stream had been intended, it would have been designated by its name, so that this element of uncertainty would not have remained. To recapitulate: The calls for these natural objects are intermediate and apparently incidental calls, and are not referred to or marked in such manner as to identify them, or show that the original surveyor considered that they were controlling. Mendenhall v. Paris, 84 Cal. 196, 23 Pac. 1095. It is clear that confusion would result if we attempt to locate the land from these natural objects, and hence resort must be had to the distances given as controlling. Hostetter v. Los Angeles T. R. Co., 108 Cal. 38, 41 Pac. 330. Since the marks of the government survey are obliterated, and the corner cannot be located by witnesses or by reference to identified monuments, the measurements indicated in the field notes should be followed. Stangair v. Roads, 41 Wash. 583, 84 Pac. 405. The irregular shape of the two sections, and the departure from the accepted method of surveying the government land involved in the adoption of appellant's contention, should lead to its rejection, in the absence of any reliable evidence that such an arbitrary and unusual proceeding was adopted in the original survey. In our opinion, this artificial rule of construction for which appellant contends, if applied here, would only lead to confusion and uncertainty, and unjustly deprive respondents of valuable property, which they have occupied without question for 10 years.

As appellant admits in her brief that "the only question in this case is as to where the north line of section 33 runs on the ground," and as we think it clear that it was so located as to include the disputed territory within section 28, it is unnecessary to consider any other point. The judgment and order are affirmed.

We concur: CHIPMAN, P. J.; HART, J.

WESTERMAN v. CLELAND et al., County Board of Education. (Civ. 612.)

1. EVIDENCE (§ 450*)—SCHOOLS AND SCHOOL DISTRICTS (§ 135*) — PAROL EVIDENCE—EXPLAINING CONTRACT.

An entry in the minutes of the county board of education purporting to authorize W.'s employment as principal of a high school, "Ukiah High School, principal P. B. W. $1,500," did not constitute a contract of employment of W. for a year at a salary of $1,500, or any other contract; so that, in an action to recover his salary on the basis of such a contract, parol evidence was admissible to explain the entry by showing what it meant.

Appeal from Superior Court, Mendocino County; J. Q. White, Judge.

Mandamus by P. B. Westerman against B. L. Cleland and others, constituting the Board of Education of the County of Mendocino. From a judgment for defendants, petitioner appeals. Affirmed.

J. E. Pemberton and Mannon & Mannon, for appellant. Robert Duncan, for respondents.

CHIPMAN, P. J. Mandamus. Petitioner alleged that he was employed by defendants as a teacher and principal of the Ukiah High School for the year ending June 30, 1907, "at a fixed and agreed salary of $1,500 and petitioner accepted such employment"; that he performed all the duties required of him as such principal during said year for which he received the sum of $1,350 and no more, and there is now due him the further sum of $150. He prays for the peremptory writ of the court commanding the defendants "to draw and deliver to petitioner their order on the county superintendent of schools of the said county for the sum of $150 payable to petitioner out of the county high school fund." Defendants deny that petitioner was employed by defendants as a teacher or principal of said school "for and during the year ending June 30, 1907, or for any greater period of time than the pleasure of said Board of Education at a fixed or agreed salary of $1,500, or for any other compensation greater than $150 per month for each month that said petitioner should actually teach." It is further averred in the answer "that it was understood and agreed by and between said petitioner and said board of education that his salary and full compensation was to be $150 per month for the actual time served by him as such teacher and principal as aforesaid; that said petitioner under such employment actually served for the period of nine months, and received therefor in full payment the sum of $1,350." It is further averred that for reasons set forth the board of education on May 10, 1907, duly passed a resolution "that said school should be closed for the year on the 31st day of May, 1907, and that notice of such order and resolution was duly and properly and within the time required by law, served upon said petitioner, * * * and * * * said board of education, for the best interest of said high school, ordered the same closed, as herein alleged and the said school was closed on the 30th day of May, 1907; that said petitioner was thereupon discharged; * * * that for each month during the time that he served as such teacher and principal he accepted and received the sum of $150 as full payment for each month's services, and signed receipts therefor." It is also alleged that petitioner failed to perform his duties in many particulars as set forth, but the court found the fact to be otherwise, and this feature of the answer need not be further noticed.

Except as above stated, the court made findings of fact substantially as alleged in the answer. Plaintiff appeals from the judgment on transcript of the reporter's notes, contending that the findings are not supported by the evidence in respect of the time for which petitioner was employed and the salary to be paid. Plaintiff offered in evidence the minutes of July 2, 1906, and they were admitted over defendants' objection as irrelevant and immaterial. They related exclusively to the salaries for the several teachers of the Mendocino High School. The entry claimed to have some bearing upon the matter reads: "Principal, Robert Butter, at a salary of $1,500.00." Other entries concerning other teachers follow in like form. The minutes for the next day were then admitted and read as follows: "July 3rd, Ukiah High School. Principal, P. B. Westerman, $1,500.00." Other similar entries follow as to other teachers. There is a minute entry relating to the time for beginning the Mendocino High School and then follows this entry: "High School [not designating which high school]. To open Sept. 10th, 3¾ mo. term —one week's vacation—begin Dec. 31st, a mid term vacation of one week—school to close June 30th." The next entry introduced read as follows: "May 10 '07. The following resolution was adopted: Resolved, that the Ukiah High School be closed the 31st day of May, 1907, on account of the lack of harmony among the members of the faculty in said school, and for the further reason that the general disorder and lack of good discipline in said school is causing a serious injury to the school and further that due notice to close said Ukiah High School on the 31st day of May, 1907, be sent to the principal of said high school by the secretary of this board, and through the principal to the several teachers of the school." It appears from the testimony of plaintiff that, after the board had agreed upon his appointment, he called upon the board—"dropped in" as he expressed it—"and the board fixed the calendar for 10 months' term. It ran up to June 28th. They had considerable difficulty getting the calendar so as to get in 10 months." On cross-examination he testified that all the notice he received of his appointment was orally given. "I just went in and shook hands with them, thanked them for the appointment. That is about all there was to it." He testified to nothing relating to the terms of his appointment—either as to his salary or any specified time of employment and upon the foregoing rested his case. A motion for nonsuit was denied, and defendants called plaintiff as a witness, who admitted that there was nothing said to him as to the length of time he was to be employed nor as to his compensation. He inferred that there would be the usual 10 months' term. Witness testified to having received pay monthly for his entire service of nine months, at $150 per month, on requisitions and orders which were identified by witness and introduced in evidence. On the form of these orders is printed the following: "Note. All claims except for teachers' and janitors' salaries must be itemized on the back hereof, or on a bill attached hereto, which are hereby made a part of the order for such claims. Orders for teachers' salaries must give the time taught, and the monthly salary paid. Likewise, monthly salary of janitor." Then follows one of the orders, dated October 6, 1906, directing the county superintendent of schools to draw a requisition on the county auditor against the state school fund in the amount of $150, "in favor of P. B. Westerman, or order, for teaching from Sept. 10 to Oct. 5, during the school year ending June 30, 1907, in the Ukiah High School District. Monthly salary of teacher, $150. Note. Claim for which this order is given was allowed in pursuance of an agreement made at a meeting of this Board on the ——— day of ———, 19—— [Signed by the board]." This order went to the county superintendent for approval, and from him to the county auditor, who approved and ordered it paid by the county treasurer. Indorsed on back: "P. B. Westerman." There were nine of these in substantially the same form on which plaintiff was paid $150 monthly.

Witness Cleland, a member of the board, testified: That at the meeting when plaintiff was employed the question of salary was talked about. "Q. What was said at that time in regard to his (P. B. Westerman's) salary, principal of the high school? A. $150 a month." He was asked on cross-examination why the minutes read as they do and answered that he could not tell for he did not make the entry and had no recollection of having heard the minutes read. "Q. You wouldn't attempt to name a person who said a word about monthly salary? A. I know it was talked. I know I did myself for one. Q. Well, it was an employment for 10 months, wasn't it? A. No, sir; it was employment for principal of the Ukiah High School. Q. For how long? A. No time set." He could not remember that any motion was made fixing salary. "It was talked over and discussed." "Q. You didn't tell Mr. Westerman he was employed at $150 a month, did you then? A. I don't know. I usually talked to him about it." He testified that the school "had been run on a 10 months' basis for several years." It was admitted that plaintiff received notice of the resolution to close the school at the end of May, shortly after its passage, and also read the minute entry, but it was claimed that it did not purport to discharge plaintiff or have that effect. The school was in fact closed pursuant to the order.

Mr. Cotton, a member of the board, testified that he was present July 3, 1906, when plaintiff was employed. He testified: "Q. What salary did the board determine upon for Mr. Westerman as principal of the high school, what he should receive? A. $150 per month." Mr. Greenough, another member of the board, then present, testified that there was nothing said "in substance or effect that Mr. Westerman was employed up to June 30, 1907." He also testified that the board at that meeting, July 3, 1906, fixed plaintiff's salary at $150 per month, and that it was the intention to continue the salary as it had been previously. It was admitted that a 10 months' school had been decided upon by the board.

Plaintiff in rebuttal, over defendants' objection, introduced certain minutes of the board for 1903, 1904, and 1905. The minute entry for July 1, 1903, recorded the election of teachers. As to salary the entry was: "L. W. Babcock, principal, salary $1,500.00 per year," and like entry as to other teachers. The minute entry of July 2, 1904, showed that a resolution was passed "that the salary of the principal of the Ukiah High School be $1,500 per year." The minute entry for July 1, 1905, read: "L. W. Babcock, principal, salary $1,500.00." Objection was made to these minutes as irrelevant and immaterial, on the ground that the contract with plaintiff for 1906–7 could not be established "by proving a contract two years before with somebody else. The Court: That is correct. Objection overruled." Having held with defendants that these previous minutes would not establish the express contract sued upon, the court probably overruled the objection on some other ground not disclosed. Upon the point, it was held in Swafford v. Board of Education, 127 Cal. 484, 59 Pac. 900, that "evidence of employment of plaintiff's predecessor at the same monthly salary, and of his continuing to act for one year, and the wages paid plaintiff as his successor, is irrelevant and immaterial, and does not tend to prove the contract alleged."

It will be observed that plaintiff nowhere testifies or shows otherwise that he was ever told what salary he was to receive or the period of his employment. He relies on the minute entry of July 3, 1906, and inferences to be drawn therefrom and from other minute entries in other years and of July 2, 1906. The entry of July 3d alone is wholly insufficient to establish a contract such as is pleaded. Unexplained, it is meaningless. The admitted facts that he taught the school as principal, was paid $150 per month for nine months, which was at the rate of $1,500 for a school year of 10 months, with such inferences as might be drawn from all the minute entries admitted in evidence, if they may be considered, would probably be sufficient, without further evidence, to support his claim. But there was the uncontradicted testimony of members of the board of education that plaintiff was employed at the monthly salary of $150, and was not employed for any specific period of time; that the school was closed at the end of nine months, and plaintiff performed no service thereafter. If the minute entry of July 3, 1906, had stated what is claimed in the complaint—that plaintiff was employed for one year to be paid $1,500 for the year—the question raised by appellant that the minutes could not be impeached or contradicted might be considered. The minute entry, however, fails to import on its face such a contract as is claimed for it, or, indeed, any contract at all, and it was competent for defendants to show what the contract was, not as contradicting the minutes, but as explanatory thereof.

Appellant cites many cases to show that the minutes of the board of trustees cannot be impeached or varied in a collateral proceeding. Our Code of Civil Procedure makes the entries in public or official books or records made in the performance of official duty by a public officer prima facie evidence of the facts stated therein (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1920, 1926); and prima facie evidence is defined in section 1833, Code Civ. Proc., to be "that which suffices for the proof of a particular fact until contradicted or overcome by other evidence." See Swamp Land District v. Gwynn, 70 Cal. 566, 12 Pac. 462; Same v. Wilcox, 75 Cal. 443, 17 Pac. 241. We do not think it necessary to affirm or deny the correctness of appellant's position. Appellant concedes that the cases hold that something actually done, but omitted from the record entirely, may be proved orally as not really contradicting the record. In the entry purporting to authorize plaintiff's employment the record is: "July 3rd. Ukiah High School. Principal, P. B. Westerman, $1,500.00." In itself this entry does not establish a contract of employment for the specified time of one year at a salary of $1,500, as alleged in the complaint. Plaintiff found it necessary to introduce the minutes of other years in an endeavor to explain what was here meant. Defendants introduced evidence not to contradict the record, but to supply facts entirely omitted from it. This, we think, it was competent for defendants to do.

Appellant claims that his case is identical with Williams v. Bagnelle, 138 Cal. 699, 72 Pac. 408. In that case "the contract of plaintiff with the trustees was to teach one year from July 5, 1899, at a salary of one thousand dollars, payment to be made by drawing requisitions upon the county superintendent of schools." As we understand the facts in that case, the provisions of the contract were not disputed, except as to the meaning of the term "year," which the court held to mean "school year." The year for which the teacher was engaged it was expected would last nine months, and the trustees apportioned the monthly salary on a basis of a nine months' school; i. e., for each month plaintiff was given a requisition for one-ninth of his salary. The trustees recognized the mistake made, and, agreeably to their contract, drew their warrant for the remaining one-ninth of the salary. The county school superintendent refused to issue a requisition. The questions decided in that case settle most of the questions arising in the present case and appellant could with much confidence rest upon that decision if his facts warranted it. The trial court, however, upon sufficient evidence, found that the contract averred in the complaint was never made, and that the employment was at a monthly salary for no specified time. That the trustees contemplated a 10 months' term and did not order otherwise until in May, 1907, is not inconsistent with the fact proven that plaintiff was to be paid $150 per month for such time only as he taught the school. The order made to close the school the last day of May operated plaintiff's discharge. If the contract had been for the full school year of ten months and his pay to be for a full school year, the case cited would seem to sustain plaintiff, whether the school remained open and whether he was or was not discharged. No such contract, however, was proven.

Respondent makes the point that section 1699 of the Political Code prescribes the remedy and the only remedy to which plaintiff could resort, and therefore the writ will not lie. Williams v. Bagnelle, supra, construes this section, but the decision does not quite touch the point. We do not think it necessary to consider the question.

The judgment is affirmed.

LILLY-BRACKETT CO. v. SONNEMANN et al. (L. A. 2,287.)

(Supreme Court of California. Jan. 6, 1910.)

1. JUDGMENT (§ 142*)—DEFAULT JUDGMENT—SETTING ASIDE.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 473, providing that when the summons has not been personally served on defendant, the court may allow him on terms any time within one year after judgment to answer to the merits, where the summons was served by mail pursuant to an order for publication, defendant was entitled to have his default set aside without any showing of mistake, inadvertence, surprise, or excusable neglect.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Judgment, Cent. Dig. § 253; Dec. Dig. § 142.*]

2. LIMITATION OF ACTIONS (§ 165*)—NATURE OF PLEA.

A plea of limitations is an answer to the merits.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Limitation of Actions, Cent. Dig. § 649; Dec. Dig. § 165.*]

3. LIMITATION OF ACTIONS (§ 197*)—STRIKING OUT PLEA—LIMITATIONS.

Code Civ. Proc. § 361, declares that, where a cause of action has arisen in another state, and is there barred, an action thereon shall not be maintained, except in favor of a citizen of the state who has held the cause of action from the time it accrued. Held that, where defendant in an action to foreclose a mortgage pleaded limitations, and offered evidence that the cause of action on the mortgage note, which was executed in Massachusetts, would have been barred in that state if its statute of limitation had been the same as that of California, such proof, coupled with the presumption that the law of another state is the same as that of the forum, was sufficient to sustain a finding in defendant's favor.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Limitation of Actions, Dec. Dig. § 197.*]

4. STATUTES (§ 281*)—FOREIGN LAW—NECESSITY FOR PLEADING.

One relying on a foreign law must allege it.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Statutes, Cent. Dig. §§ 380, 381; Dec. Dig. § 281.*]

5. LIMITATION OF ACTIONS (§ 183*)—FOREIGN LAW—PLEADING.

Code Civ. Proc. § 458, provides that in pleading limitations it may be stated generally that the cause of action is barred by the provision of the section of the Code relied on. Held that, where a foreign law was a part of a plea of limitations, it was sufficiently pleaded by an averment that the action was barred by section 361, providing that, where a cause of action has arisen in another state, and is there barred, an action thereon shall not be maintained, except by a citizen of this state who has held the cause of action from the time it accrued.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Limitation of Actions, Dec. Dig. § 183.*]

6. EVIDENCE (§ 80*)—FOREIGN LAWS—PRESUMPTIONS.

Where the fact as to a foreign law is properly alleged, the presumption that the law is the same as that of the forum must be applied in the absence of proof whether or not the effect will be to sustain a substantive defense.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. § 101; Dec. Dig. § 80.*]

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Riverside County; F. E. Densmore, Judge.

Action by the Lilly-Brackett Company (a corporation) against A. H. Sonnemann and another. From the judgment, said Sonnemann appeals. Reversed, and cause remanded for new trial.

J. W. McKinley, for appellant. H. L. Camahan, Herbert Cutler Brown, and George H. Moore, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. After this case had been heard and decided in department 1, a rehearing was granted, in order that we might further examine the authorities touching upon the defense of the statute of limitations, and particularly that we might consider whether or not, at the time of the adoption of section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure, the rule was that given in the decision by the department. A further consideration of this subject has convinced us that the weight of recent authority is overwhelmingly in favor of the rule announced in the decision rendered in department, and that even at the time of the adoption of section 473 the modern doctrine had been adopted in many jurisdictions. That part of section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure which has reference to the reopening of judgments in cases in which personal service has not been obtained was adopted in 1872, and was based upon section 68 of the practice act (St. 1851, c. 5) as amended. St. 1865–66, c. 619, § 1. The case of Ekel v. Snevily, 3 Watts & S. (Pa.) 273, 38 Am. Dec. 758, cited in the department opinion, was decided in 1842, and was the first Pennsylvania case announcing the rule quoted by Mr. Justice Sloss. The earlier cases of Shock v. McChesney, 4 Yeates (Pa.) 507, 2 Am. Dec. 415, and Bank v. Israel, 6 Serg. & R. (Pa.) 294, cited in Ekel v. Snevily, were decided, respectively, in 1808 and 1820, but do not declare the rule as emphatically as it is set forth in Ekel v. Snevily, supra. Sanders and Davis, Administrators, v. Robertson, 23 Miss. 389, decided in 1852, squarely determined that the plea of the statute is one to the merits. Gourlay v. Hutton, 10 Wend. (N. Y.) 595, was a case in which it was determined that, on an ordinary application to set aside a default, the court will not impose the condition that the statute of limitations be not pleaded. This case was decided in 1833. It will thus be seen that, at the time of the adoption of section 473, Code Civ. Proc., there was a conflict of decision in the various states of the Union; some of the courts of last resort adhering to the doctrine of Brown v. Sutter, 1 Dall. 239, 1 L. Ed. 118, and the cases depending thereon, and others following the rule which is supported by the great weight of later authority, and announced in the opinion rendered in department. We, therefore, adopt the aforesaid opinion as that of the court. It is as follows:

"Sloss, J. This action was brought to foreclose a mortgage given by the defendants Sonnemann and Brackett, to secure their promissory note for $10,000, made on the 7th day of December, 1896, and payable to plaintiff, a Massachusetts corporation, one year after date. Both note and mortgage were executed in Massachusetts. The action was commenced on November 23, 1906. On the same day the court made an order providing for the service of summons on the defendant Sonnemann by publication. Pursuant to this order, which was based upon a sufficient affidavit, the summons was duly published, and a copy thereof, together with a copy of the complaint, were, on November 23, 1906, mailed by plaintiff to Sonnemann at his residence in the state of Washington. Sonnemann did not appear within the time allowed by law, and his default was duly entered, as was that of Brackett, on February 27, 1907, and a decree of foreclosure was made and entered against said defendants. Shortly thereafter Sonnemann appeared, and moved the court to set aside the decree and open the default, and this motion was granted by an order reading: 'It is ordered that the decree be set aside and the default opened, and that the case be tried upon its merits. It is further ordered that the defendant pay all costs that have accrued to this date.' The defendant Sonnemann promptly paid the costs so required to be paid by him, and filed his answer. In it he set up two defenses—that the note and mortgage were not supported by any consideration, and that the cause of action is barred by section 361 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The cause came on for trial some months later, and, before any testimony had been offered, counsel for Sonnemann in effect withdrew the first defense set up in his answer, and placed his reliance solely upon the plea of the statute of limitations. Code Civ. Proc. § 361. At a later stage of the trial plaintiff moved the court to strike out that portion of the answer pleading section 361, upon the grounds that it was not a plea of a meritorious defense, and was filed in violation of the order setting aside Sonnemann's default. The court granted the motion, and entered judgment of foreclosure in favor of plaintiff. Sonnemann appeals from the judgment, maintaining that the court erred in striking out his plea of the statute of limitations.

"The affidavits filed in support of the motion to vacate the default showing that he had in fact received copies of the summons and complaint mailed to him, and alleged circumstances tending to make out a case of excusable neglect on the part of the attorney who had been employed by him to defend the suit. But such mailing, pursuant to an order for publication of summons, was not a 'personal service,' and he was therefore entitled to have the default set aside under the third clause of section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure, without making any showing of 'mistake, inadvertence, surprise, or excusable neglect.' Gray v. Lawlor, 151 Cal. 352, 90 Pac. 691. We need not consider whether his actual knowledge of the pendency of the proceedings would have authorized the court to attach to its order opening the default any conditions as to the character of the defense to be made. No such conditions were here imposed. The order that 'the case be tried upon its merits' merely followed the Code section (473) which provides that when the summons has not been personally served on the defendant, the court may allow him, within one year after the rendition of the judgment, to 'answer to the merits of the original action.' If the court had discretion to limit the effect of its order opening the default, it had not so exercised its discretion, but had made the order general. The cases holding that it is not an abuse of discretion to refuse permission to amend an answer by adding a plea of the statute (Cooke v. Spears, 2 Cal. 409, 56 Am. Dec. 348; Bank v. Heron, 122 Cal. 109, 54 Pac. 537) are therefore not in point.

"The sole question, then, is whether a plea of the statute of limitations is an answer to the merits. The point is one that has come before the courts of various states; and, while the earlier cases showed a tendency to hold that such a plea is merely technical, and should not be permitted to a defendant who has been in default (Hawes v. Hoyt. 11 How. Prac. [N. Y.] 454; Brown v. Sutter, 1 Dall. [Pa.] 239 [1 L. Ed. 118]; Pennington v. Gibson, 6 Ark. 447; Sheets v. Baldwin's Adm'rs, 12 Ohio, 120; Newsom's Adm'r v. Ran, 18 Ohio, 240; Carr v. Dawes, 46 Mo. App. 351), the decided weight of authority, and particularly of modern authority, supports the view that the statute of limitations is to be viewed as a statute of repose, and, as such is a meritorious defense which may with propriety be set up after a default has been vacated. In Ekel v. Snevily, 3 Watts & S. 273 [38 Am. Dec. 758], the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania thus referred to the rule which had theretofore (Brown v. Sutter, supra) been declared in that state; 'It was said in Brown v. Sutter (1 Dall. 239 [1 L. Ed. 118]) that a judgment will not be opened to let in the statute of limitations; but, as the plea of that statute has since been considered in Shock v. McChesney (4 Yeates, 507 [2 Am. Dec. 415]) and the Bank of Israel (6 Serg. & R. 294) to be no longer an unconscionable one, the rules of practice would scarce be so held now.' This language was quoted with approval in Sossong v. Rosar, 112 Pa. 197 [3 Atl. 768], the court adding: 'Many times since we have commended it as a meritorious defense.' See, also, Ellinger's Appeal, 114 Pa. 505 [7 Atl. 180]. Other cases holding that an affidavit disclosing the defense of the statute of limitations is good as an affidavit of merits on an application to open a default, or that, after a general order opening a default, the statute may be pleaded, are Sanders v. Robertson, 23 Miss. 389; Gourlay v. Hutton, 10 Wend. [N. Y.] 595; Wheeler v. Castor, 11 N. D. 347, 92 N. W. 381 [61 L. R. A. 746]; Garvie v. Greene, 9 S. D. 608, 70 N. W. 847; Mitchell v. Campbell, 14 Or. 454, 13 Pac. 190; Hane v. Goodwyn, 1 Brev. (S. C.) 461. See, also, Benedict v. Arnoux, 85 Hun [N. Y.] 228 [32 N. Y. Supp. 905]; Freeman v. Hill, 45 Kan. 435 [25 Pac. 870] 23 Cyc. 964.

"As has been suggested, most of these decisions rest upon the position, not formerly held, that statutes of limitations are to be viewed favorably as affording to parties who may, by the lapse of time, have lost the ability to procure evidence, repose and security from stale demands. In Wood v. Carpenter, 101 U. S. 135 [25 L. Ed. 807], the Supreme Court of the United States says that: 'Statutes of limitation are vital to the welfare of society, and are favored in the law. They are found and approved in all systems of enlightened jurisprudence; they promote repose by giving security and stability to human affairs; important public policy lies at their foundation; they stimulate to activity and punish negligence. While time is constantly destroying the evidence of rights, they supply its place by a presumption which renders proof unnecessary.' This language has twice been quoted with approval by this court (Shain v. Sresovich, 104 Cal. 406 [38 Pac. 51]; Nichols v. Randall, 136 Cal. 432 [69 Pac. 26]), and the views so declared furnish satisfactory ground for holding that a defendant is answering to the merits when he asserts that the action is barred by lapse of time. The plea in this case being one that was permitted by the provisions of the Code section, as well as by the terms of the order opening the default, it should not have been stricken out.

"We cannot regard the error so committed as harmless. The particular provision relied on by Sonnemann was Code Civ. Proc. § 361, which declares that, where a cause of action has arisen in another state, and an action there is barred by the laws of that state, an action thereon shall not be maintained in this state, except in favor of one who has been a citizen of this state, and has held the cause of action from the time it accrued. The appellant offered evidence tending to show that a cause of action on the note, which was executed in Massachusetts, would have been barred in that commonwealth if its statutes of limitation had been the same as ours. No proof was made of the law of Massachusetts, and it is argued that, as the burden of sustaining the plea of limitation was on defendant, and a necessary part of that defense was the law of another state, no harm was done him in striking out his plea. It is true that the order striking out was made after the conclusion of the trial, and that it did not prevent appellant from putting in any evidence which he desired to offer. But we think his proof, coupled with the presumption that the law of another state is the same as that of the forum (Hickman v. Alpaugh, 21 Cal. 226; Bovard v. Dickenson, 131 Cal. 162 [63 Pac. 162]; In re Harrington's Estate, 140 Cal. 244 [73 Pac. 1000, 98 Am. St. Rep. 51]; Flood v. Dunphy, 147 Cal. 95 [81 Pac. 315]) was sufficient to have sustained a finding in his favor. No doubt this presumption, like that of the continuance of things once shown to exist (Code Civ. Proc. § 1963, subd. 32) is one of evidence, and not of pleading (Fredericks v. Tracy, 98 Cal. 658 [33 Pac. 750]). The appellant, relying on a foreign law, was bound to allege it. But since this law was a part of a plea of the statute of limitations, it was, under the provision of section 458 of the Code of Civil Procedure, sufficiently pleaded by the averment that the action was barred by the provisions of section 361. We see no reason for holding that the presumption of identity of foreign law with that of the forum should not apply as well to this as to any other case. Richardson v. Mackay, 4 Okl. 328 [46 Pac. 546], is cited by respondent to the point that this presumption will not be indulged in support of a 'substantive defense' (i. e., that the action was barred by a statute like Code Civ. Proc. 361), but the case appears to be one in which the defendant failed to allege facts showing that the bar had attached in the other state. Where, however, the fact as to the foreign law is properly alleged, we think the presumption that the law is the same as that of the forum must be applied in the absence of proof whether or not the effect will be to sustain a 'substantive defense.'"

In the petition for rehearing it was urged by respondent that the statute of limitations upon which appellant relied (Code Civ. Proc. § 361) had no application to this case, and that consequently the order striking out the plea of that statute, although made for another declared reason, was not prejudicial to appellant's rights. As this is an action to foreclose a mortgage upon real estate located in California, and as there can be in this state but one form of action to recover a debt secured by a mortgage (Code Civ. Proc. § 726), respondent's contention is that the relief is sought primarily against the land, and that the mortgagor is liable only in the event the proceeds of a sale will not prove sufficient to meet the debt. An action on the debt alone could not be maintained in California. Neither could an action to subject land in California to the payment of a debt be maintained in Massachusetts. It is argued, therefore, that the action is indivisible and founded upon the note and mortgage, constituting one inseparable contract (Meyer v. Weber, 133 Cal. 685, 65 Pac. 1110; Trinity County Bank v. Haas, 151 Cal. 555, 91 Pac. 385), and that, as no suit upon the mortgage and note could be tried in Massachusetts, a statute of limitation of that commonwealth applicable to personal actions can have no relevancy to the suit in California. This position finds support in other states. For example, in Gillett v. Hill, 32 Iowa, 220, it was held that, in an action somewhat similar to this, an answer setting up a plea of the New York statute to the note was insufficient because it failed to state that the law of New York also barred the foreclosure of the mortgage. That case was cited in one of the briefs in Allen v. Allen, 95 Cal. 184, 30 Pac. 213, 16 L. R. A. 646, and in that case this court said: "In this state, when an action on a promissory note, secured by mortgage of the same date upon real property, is barred by the statute of limitation, the mortgagee has no remedy upon the mortgage. Lord v. Morris, 18 Cal. 482; Heinlin v. Castro, 22 Cal. 100. The debt is regarded as the principal, and the mortgage is a mere incident. When the debt is barred, the remedy upon the mortgage is also barred. McCarthy v. White, 21 Cal. 495, 82 Am. Dec. 754. If, therefore, respondents could not maintain an action in New York for the recovery of the money due, they could not maintain an action in this state to foreclose the mortgage. Code Civ. Proc. § 361."

In San Jose Deposit Bank of Savings v. Bank of Madera, 144 Cal. 577, 78 Pac. 7, the following language was used: "We have here, therefore, the ordinary case of a mortgage given to secure a debt; and, as the debt in this case rests merely in parol, and not upon a written instrument, it was barred by lapse of time in two years, and, being thus barred, the lien of the mortgage sued on was 'extinguished' at the time of the commencement of this action. Civ. Code, § 2911. We have not overlooked the authorities cited by respondent, and have examined many others on the subject. There are decisions in which it has been held, in the absence of statutory provisions to the contrary, that the bar of a debt by limitation is not such a 'discharge' thereof as will bar a mortgage securing it. It may be that the general law on the subject is correctly stated in Jones on Mortgages (section 899), as follows: 'The rule that a discharge of debt is a discharge of the mortgage has no application where the debt is merely discharged by the statute of limitations, or by discharge in bankruptcy.' But section 2911 of the Civil Code provides as follows: 'A lien is extinguished by the lapse of the time within which, under the provisions of the Code of Civil Procedure, an action can be brought upon the principal obligation.'"

Both parties to the contract were in Massachusetts at the time it was made. When the time for payment of the note arrived they still resided in Massachusetts, and on breach of the obligation a cause of action on the note alone arose in Massachusetts, regardless of the fact that the remedy of foreclosure must be pursued in California, where the land subject to the mortgage was situated. Felton v. West, 102 Cal. 266, 36 Pac. 676. The note is the principal obligation, and the mortgage is an incident; and, although the note and mortgage are one inseparable contract, the statute which operates as a bar to the action on the debt deprives the mortgagee of the right to enforce the lien of the mortgage. San Jose Safe Deposit Bank of Savings v. Bank of Madera, supra; Puckhaber v. Henry, 152 Cal. 423, 93 Pac. 114, 125 Am. St. Rep. 75. We are therefore of the opinion that the point last discussed, which was raised for the first time upon application for rehearing, cannot prevail to change our conclusions, and that, in spite of the peculiarity of our action of foreclosure in California, the plea of the Massachusetts statute as a bar to the action on the note is available.

The judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

RANKIN v. SUPERIOR COURT OF CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO.

(S. F. 5,449.)

(Supreme Court of California. Jan. 6, 1910.)

1. Criminal Law (§ 977*) — Time for Pronouncing Judgment.

Pen. Code, § 1191, as amended in 1909 (St. 1909, c. 589, § 1), provides that the court must pronounce judgment within not less than two nor more than five days after the verdict or plea of guilty, but that to hear a motion for a new trial this time may be extended not more than 10 days, and it may be extended not more than 20 days to consider the question of probation under section 1203, and that, if defendant's present sanity is questioned under sections 1367–1373, the court may further extend the time until that is determined. Section 1202, as amended in 1909 (St. 1909, c. 589, § 2), requires judgment to be pronounced at the time fixed therefor unless cause to the contrary is shown, and that if not rendered within the time as fixed or extended, under section 1191, or if the court refuses to hear or neglects to determine defendant's motion for a new trial within the time as fixed or extended, then defendant shall be entitled to a new trial. Held that, under section 1191, the court may not fix a time for pronouncing judgment later than five days after the verdict; that, if a motion for a new trial is made, the court may extend the time for 10 days, and on the question of probation the court may extend the time 20 days, but that these two extensions are not cumulative, but that the latest date to which the court can extend the time, unless present insanity is involved, is not more than 25 days after verdict, and failure to render judgment within the proper time entitles defendant to a new trial, but does not oust the court of jurisdiction so as to require a dismissal.

2. PROHIBITION (§ 10*)—GROUNDS FOR RELIEF.

If a court should refuse a new trial in a criminal prosecution and render judgment against defendant after the authorized time has passed, the judgment would be reversed on appeal, if an appeal should be taken, but, as the judgment would be rendered by a court having jurisdiction of the subject-matter and of the person, it would not be void nor subject to collateral attack, and therefore, if the court is about to give judgment after the proper time has passed, it will not be acting without or in excess of its jurisdiction, and prohibition is not maintainable under Code Civ. Proc. § 1102.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Prohibition, Cent. Dig. §§ 37–56; Dec. Dig. § 10.*]

In Bank. Charles E. Rankin was convicted of grand larceny, and makes application for a writ of prohibition to the judge of the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco. Writ denied.

Charles H. Fairall, for petitioner.

PER CURIAM. The petitioner was convicted of grand larceny in the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco by a verdict returned on September 10, 1909. Judgment has not yet been pronounced on the verdict, and the superior court has set the 7th day of January, 1910, as the time for passing sentence. The petitioner, claiming that by this delay the court has lost jurisdiction to give judgment, asks for a writ of prohibition to restrain the superior court from pronouncing judgment, or further proceeding in the case.

Section 1191 of the Penal Code, as amended in 1909 (St. 1909, c. 589, § 1), provides that the court must pronounce judgment within not less than two nor more than five days after the verdict or plea of guilty; but that for the purpose of hearing and determining a motion for a new trial, or in arrest of judgment, this time may be extended not more than 10 days, that it may extend the time not more than 20 days to consider the question of probation under section 1203, and that, if the question of defendant's present insanity is raised under sections 1367 to 1373, the court may further extend the time until his sanity is determined. No question of his sanity is raised and no proceeding to determine such sanity has been initiated. The effect of this section is that the court has no authority to fix the time for pronouncing judgment for a day later than five days after the verdict; that, if a motion for new trial or in arrest of judgment is made, the court may for the purpose of deciding the same extend the time for 10 days, and that, where the question of probation is considered, the court may for that purpose extend the time 20 days. These two provisions for extension of time are not cumulative, and the latest date to which the court is authorized to extend the time for rendering judgment, where present insanity is not involved, is a day not more than 25 days after the date of the return of the verdict.

Section 1202 of the Penal Code, as amended in 1909 (St. 1909, c. 589, § 2), provides that, if at the time fixed for pronouncing judgment no sufficient cause appears why judgment should not be given, it must then be rendered, and that, "if not rendered or pronounced within the time so fixed or to which it is continued under the provisions of section eleven hundred and ninety-one of this Code, then the defendant shall be entitled to a new trial," and further, that "if the court shall refuse to hear a defendant's motion for a new trial or when made shall neglect to determine such motion within the time fixed for pronouncing judgment, or within the time to which the same is continued under the provisions of section eleven hundred and ninety-one of this Code, then the defendant shall be entitled to a new trial."

The purpose sought to be accomplished by the amendment of these and other sections of the Penal Code amended by the same Legislature evidently was to prevent the delays which sometimes ensued in the superior courts in criminal cases between the time the verdict was rendered and the time of passing sentence, and between the time of sentence and the time of filing in the appellate courts the record on appeal, in case an appeal was taken. For the latter end, bills of exceptions were practically abolished and a reporter's transcript of the evidence substituted therefor. Sections 1191 and 1202 were directed to the end of preventing delay in rendering judgment. For that purpose the power of the court to extend the time was abridged, and, to prevent the superior courts from arbitrarily ignoring or disobeying the law in that respect, it was declared that, if the time was extended beyond that authorized, the defendant should perforce be entitled to a new trial. If judgment was not pronounced within the time limited, a new trial was made imperative if the defendant so desired. He became "entitled" to it. This does not indicate a legislative intent that the lapse of time and failure of the court to render the judgment within the time fixed should oust the court of further jurisdiction to proceed in the case and render a dismissal necessary. On the contrary, it necessarily implies that the jurisdiction shall continue and that the court shall retain authority to order the new trial and proceed therewith to verdict and final judgment. If the court should refuse a new trial and render judgment against the defendant after the authorized time has passed, its action would be erroneous and the judgment would be reversed on appeal, if an appeal should be taken. But, as it would be a judgment rendered by a court having jurisdiction of the subject-matter and of the person, it would not be void, nor subject to collateral attack upon the ground of its untimely rendition. As the court, even if it does give judgment, as the petitioner alleges it to be about to do, will not be acting without, or in excess of its jurisdiction, prohibition is not maintainable. Code Civ. Proc. § 1102.

For these reasons, the application for an alternative writ of prohibition is denied.

BERNHEIM DISTILLING CO. v. ELMORE. (Civ. 658.)

(Court of Appeal, First District, California. Dec. 1, 1909.)

1. Corporations (§ 672*)—Actions—Foreign Corporations.

The failure of plaintiff, a foreign corporation, to allege compliance with the provisions of the Civil Code requiring the filing with the Secretary of State of a certified copy of its articles of incorporation, and also a designation of some resident on whom process might be served, was not a failure to allege a cause of action, and hence was not a ground of demurrer.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Corporations, Cent. Dig. § 2647; Dec. Dig. § 672.*]

2. Pleading (§ 406*)—Waiver.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 434, providing that, if no objection be taken either by demurrer or answer, defendant must be deemed to have waived the same, defendant by failing to plead in its answer that plaintiff, a foreign corporation, failed to file with the Secretary of State a certified copy of its articles, and also a designation of some resident on whom process might be served as required by the Civil Code, waived such failure.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Pleading, Cent. Dig. §§ 1355–1359; Dec. Dig. § 406;* Corporations, Cent. Dig. § 2645.]

3. Pleading (§ 106*)—Pleas in Abatement.

Pleas in abatement are dilatory pleas, and are strictly construed.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Pleading, Cent. Dig. § 219; Dec. Dig. § 106.*]

4. Pleading (§ 258*)—Amendments.

Where the trial was nearly concluded, the court did not abuse its discretion in refusing to permit defendant to amend its answer by pleading in abatement that plaintiff, a foreign corporation, had not complied with the Civil Code; such amendment not going to the merits.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Pleading, Cent. Dig. § 773; Dec. Dig. § 258.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Clara County; John E. Richards, Judge.

Action by the Bernheim Distilling Company, a corporation, against H. Elmore. From the judgment, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

A. H. Jarman, for appellant. C. L. Witten and R. V. Burns, for respondent.

COOPER, P. J. The only question attempted to be raised in this case is that plaintiff was a foreign corporation, and that prior to the commencement of the action it had not filed in the office of the Secretary of State a certified copy of its articles of incorporation and also a designation of some person residing within the state upon whom process might be served, as required by the provisions of the Civil Code.

The failure to allege this compliance with the requirements of the Code was not a failure to allege a cause of action, and therefore was not a ground of demurrer. South Yuba Water Co. v. Rosa, 80 Cal. 333, 22 Pac. 222. Defendant in its answer did not plead such failure upon the part of plaintiff, and thus waived it. Code Civ. Proc. § 434; Cal. Sav. & Loan Society v. Harris, 111 Cal. 133, 43 Pac. 525.

Nor did the court err in refusing leave to defendant to amend its answer by pleading such matter in abatement during the progress of the trial. Pleas in abatement are dilatory pleas, are strictly construed, and have never been favored. The amendment sought did not go to the merits. The trial had been nearly concluded, and the trial court properly exercised its discretion in denying the amendment sought, as it was not in furtherance of justice, but for the purposes either of defeating justice or delaying the action.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

We concur: HALL, J.; KERRIGAN, J.

On the issue of the existence of a parol contract of fire insurance in renewal of a prior written contract of insurance, the testimony that insurers customarily sent out expiration notices, and, that if a policy was to be dropped, they marked it on the expiration notice, did not justify a finding that an insurer sent to insured a request for the renewal of the insurance, and that the renewal slip delivered by insured was an acceptance of the request so as to create a contract of insurance, especially in view of the evidence that insurer usually went around for renewals a week or 10 days before a policy expired, and that if insurer would not renew the insurance because the line was full it would place the risk with some other insurer.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Frank J. Murasky, Judge.

Action by the American Can Company against the Agricultural Insurance Company of Watertown, New York. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed.

Goodfellow & Eells and T. C. Coogan, for appellant. Chickering & Gregory, for respondent.

COOPER, P. J. This appeal is from a judgment in favor of plaintiff upon an alleged parol contract of insurance. On April 1, 1905, the defendant executed its written contract, by the terms of which it insured plaintiff against loss by fire not to exceed $3,000 from April 18, 1905, at noon, until April 18, 1906, at noon, on certain personal property situate on certain described premises belonging to plaintiff. The property of plaintiff was not destroyed until about 10 o'clock p. m. in the great fire of April 18, 1906, and the plaintiff does not claim that defendant is liable under the terms of the written policy which expired at noon on said day. It is alleged and claimed by plaintiff, however, that the defendant orally agreed on the 17th day of April, 1906, to insure, and it orally insured, the said property. In plaintiff's brief it is said: "The essential and ultimate fact is that on April 17, 1906, an agreement was entered into effecting a contract of insurance." The court found in this regard: "That on April 17, 1906, the firm of Watson, Taylor & Sperry, acting as agents for the plaintiff, American Can Company, notified defendant that plaintiff desired to renew its said policy of insurance, and served upon the defendant a written notification to that effect, and thereupon defendant agreed to said renewal, and promised to execute a new policy of insurance which would embody the contract of insurance then and there entered into." It is also found that the plaintiff, within the time required by the policy, made out and delivered to the defendant proofs of loss duly verified, and that it has "performed all the conditions upon its part required to be performed by said contract of insurance, and that prior to the commencement of this action more than sixty days elapsed since said proof of loss as required by said contract of insurance was delivered to defendant by plaintiff."

A parol contract of insurance may be made and is enforceable; but as such contracts are rarely made, and are not made in the usual and ordinary course of business, the proof of such oral contract must be clear and convincing. In fact it is the universal custom of insurance companies to issue written policies, with full and minute specifications as to their liability and the exceptions that would make the policy void. The preliminaries, as in contracts for the sale of real estate, are usually only negotiations which are afterwards merged into the written contract. Hence it is at once apparent, even to the layman, that in the somewhat unusual claim that an oral contract of insurance was entered into, the only safe and sound rule is to require the proof to be clear and convincing to the effect that the contract was actually entered into, that each party understood it in the same light, and in regard to the same subject-matter. Kerr on Insurance, 52, § 33; Eng. & Am. Ency. of Law, vol. 13, p. 221; Cleveland Oil & Paint Mfg. Co. v. Norwich Union Fire Ins. Co., 34 Or. 228, 55 Pac. 435.

The only evidence in support of plaintiff's claim is that the witness Roy, who testified that he was at the times mentioned the chief clerk of Watson, Taylor & Sperry, who were and had been for some time the insurance brokers for the plaintiff; that Edward Brown & Sons were the agents of defendant, and Fred Brown was the clerk of Edward Brown

& Sons, with authority to accept business and issue covering notes, but not to make out or sign policies; that on the 17th day of April, 1906, he prepared slips for the renewal of the said policy which was to expire at noon on the following day, and also of two other policies in companies for which said Brown & Sons were agents—one in the Globe & Rutger's and one in the Delaware. There were nine of these slips, three for each intended policy, and the slips contained in effect a description of the risk and were prepared with a view of being pasted on the printed policies instead of filling up the blank space in the policy by writing; that usually he went around with such slips to the office of the company at any time within a week or 10 days before a policy would expire; that in many cases they did not have time to prepare slips, and then they would go out and get a covering note and send the slips in in a few days afterwards. The language of the witness as to what then took place is as follows: "I had those slips prepared. After I got ready to go home, about 20 minutes past 5 or half past 5, I stepped into Edward Brown & Sons' office on California street. They had a regular insurance office. So I stepped in behind the counter, as in fact I was accustomed to do, and Mr. Brown here (pointing to a person in the courtroom) was at his desk putting his things away, that is, Mr. Fred Brown; he had charge of the city department; so I said: 'Here, Fred, are some renewals for you,' and Fred says: 'All right.' As I turned around and went out I think he put them in a drawer of his desk. This was about all that was said about it." In cross-examination the witness testified: "I went in there late in the afternoon and was in a hurry. I rushed right into the office and threw these slips down. There were three for each company—nine papers. I just slapped them down one on top of the other on his desk and said: 'Fred, here are some renewals for you.' He said: 'All right.' Then I went right out. It was after business hours at that time and he was just closing up. I think he picked them up in his hand and put them in a drawer; don't think he took time to read them. I just turned around—I went in there in a hurry—I turned around and went out, and I had the impression that he just opened his drawer and put them in like he did before. Q. He did not take time to read and look over nine slips of paper? A. No, sir."

It is quite evident that these slips were only applications for the renewal of the three policies described therein. The answer of Fred Brown "All right" did not mean anything more than that he would take the matter up in due course. He did not even know what policies were referred to in the slips. He had the right to suppose that it would be sufficient if he looked into the matter during business hours of the next day, as it was the custom to bring such applications in a week or 10 days before the policy would expire. He had no authority to issue policies but only to receive applications. No application was made to him for a covering note and no such note was issued. The name of the plaintiff was not even mentioned, the rate of insurance, the time of payment of the premium, the property to be insured, were not either of them mentioned. Of course when the slips would come in the ordinary course of business to be examined it would be seen that there was among them an application for a new policy of insurance upon the property of plaintiff; but it does not follow that the defendant then and there orally agreed to insure the plaintiff's property or to renew the insurance thereon. No policy was ever issued and no covering note taken.

A contract is an agreement to do or not to do a particular thing. It must be by consent, which is free, mutual, and communicated by each to the other. The consent is not mutual unless the parties all agree upon the same thing in the same sense, and unless they do so agree there is no contract. How can it be said that the defendant agreed to issue a policy to plaintiff when the name of plaintiff was not even mentioned nor in any way communicated to defendant in the oral conversation? How can it be said that defendant agreed to issue a policy covering certain property when no reference was made in the conversation to any property? It could as well be said that if the applications, instead of being for renewals, had been for new policies from new customers, putting the applications in the desk and the answer being "All right" was an oral agreement to insure. It was not incumbent on defendant because it made a contract of insurance which would expire on April 18, 1906, to make another similar contract for another year, and Roy knew this, for in his testimony he said: "In case it should happen when we made applications to them, either for original insurance or for renewals or for reinsurance, and they could not do the business because the line of the company was full, in such case we would place the risk with some other company."

This case is similar to Taylor v. Phœnix Ins. Co., 47 Wis. 365, 2 N. W. 559, with the exception that the oral contract in this case is not near so clearly made out as it was in that case and there the court said: "We fail to find in the above testimony satisfactory evidence of the renewal of the policy in præsenti. The purport of the conversation on the subject between the plaintiff and Mr. Dean was that the policy should be renewed thereafter, not that it was then renewed. The plaintiff said to the agent that he wanted it renewed, and desired that it should be renewed before he left home. The agent assented. They then agreed upon the premium to be paid therefor. The agent said that there was nothing more for the plaintiff to do, but that he (the agent) had the description of the property to be insured in his office and promised to attend to the matter of the renewal. The plaintiff then directed the agent to renew the old policy the same as it was before, in the same company, for the same amount, and the agent promised to do so. That is all there is of the alleged parol contract of renewal. It seems to us that the whole conversation pointed unmistakably to some further act to be done to renew the policy, to renew in futuro, else why the talk about the agent having the description in his office and his promise to attend to the business, and why the closing direction to the agent to renew the old policy in the same company and for the same amount? And if the policy was then and there renewed the description ceased to be material and the promise was superfluous, as was also the final direction to the agent to renew. Indeed both the promise and direction tend strongly to prove—if they do not prove conclusively—that neither of the parties intended a renewal in præsenti, or supposed that they had made any contract than an executory oral contract that the company should renew the policy and the plaintiff should pay the premium at some early future time. There is no evidence whatever inconsistent with the hypothesis that the agent was to make a certificate of renewal, and the plaintiff was to pay the premium, as conditions precedent to the renewal, or to show that the parties intended to contract out of the usual course of the business of insurance." See, further, Idaho Forwarding Co. v. Firemen's Fund Ins. Co., 8 Utah, 41, 29 Pac. 826, 17 L. R. A. 586; Consumers', etc., v. German Ins. Co., 70 N. J. Law, 226, 57 Atl. 440; Whitman v. Milwaukee Fire Ins. Co., 128 Wis. 124, 107 N. W. 291, 5 L. R. A. (N. S.) 407, 116 Am. St. Rep. 25; Cleveland Oil & Paint Mfg. Co. v. Norwich Union Fire Ins. Co., 34 Or. 228, 55 Pac. 435; William Dinning v. Phœnix Ins. Co., 68 Ill. 414.

The case of Gold v. Sun Ins. Co., 73 Cal. 217, 14 Pac. 786, does not aid the plaintiff. That was an action to recover damages for failure to comply with an oral contract to issue a fire insurance policy. A demurrer to the complaint was overruled in the lower court, and the defendant failed to answer. Therefore the only question for the Supreme Court to pass upon was as to whether or not the facts stated in the complaint were sufficient to entitle the plaintiff to relief. The court held that the complaint was sufficient; that it stated the date, the amount of the original policy and the property which was insured; that the insurance company received a valuable consideration, and promised to renew the policy, and in consequence of such promise and such agreement the plaintiff had failed to procure other insurance upon the property; that at the time he suffered the loss he was under the belief that the defendant had complied with its contract and issued to it a policy of insurance as it had agreed to do. In that case there was no uncertainty about the time of the contract, or the parties, or the property to which it referred.

We conclude that the finding is not supported by the evidence, and the judgment and order are reversed.

We concur: HALL, J.; KERRIGAN, J.

On Rehearing.

PER CURIAM. On petition for rehearing the respondent calls our attention to the fact that in the opinion the court failed to refer to the first and primary ground upon which the respondent relied in support of the judgment of the trial court, that "prior to the expiration of the previous insurance the defendant company had sent to the plaintiff a notice that this policy would expire, and that it was the custom between the companies to make annotation upon such notice if the policy was to be dropped; that no such annotation notice was placed upon the expiry notice sent out in this case." The only testimony relied upon in support of such proposition is that of the witness Roy, who testified that the companies always send out expiration notices, and if the policy was to be dropped they mark it on the expiration notice; that he thought it was customary to do so; he could not say that such notice was sent in this particular case.

This testimony is not sufficient to support a finding, even if there had been such finding, to the effect that the company sent to the respondent a request for the renewal of the insurance, and that the renewal slip delivered was an acceptance of such request. Particularly is this so when the evidence referred to is considered in connection with the evidence of the same witness, that his company usually went around for renewals a week or 10 days before a policy would expire; and that if the company would not renew the insurance because the line was full, they would place the risk with some other company.

We know that in this particular case the request claimed to be a renewal request was not delivered until the close of business hours the day before the policy expired, and therefore Roy had not followed his usual custom of going around a week or 10 days before the policy expired to request a renewal. We cannot hold that because the witness Roy thought that it was customary for the companies to send out renewal notices, that this particular company in this particular case did send to this plaintiff a renewal notice. Proof of usage or custom is admissible only as an aid or instrument tending to aid interpretation. In fact in this case the complaint alleged, and the court found, that plaintiff notified defendant of its desire to renew, and the defendant agreed and promised to renew the policy. This appears to have been the theory upon which the case was tried. There is no allegation and no finding as to defendant's requesting and plaintiff agreeing to a renewal.

Rehearing denied.

PEOPLE v. JONES. (Cr. 189.)

(Court of Appeal, First District, California. Dec. 7, 1909. Rehearing Denied by Supreme Court, Feb. 5, 1910.)

1. FORGERY (§ 8*)—NAME USED.

By the express provisions of Pen. Code, § 470, "forgery" may be committed by signing the name of a fictitious, as well as of a real, person to the instruments therein enumerated.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Forgery, Cent. Dig. § 26; Dec. Dig. § 8.*

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, vol. 3, pp. 2900–2910; vol. 8, p. 7665.]

2. FORGERY (§ 7*)—NATURE OF INSTRUMENT.

The indorsement of a check is equivalent to an "order for the payment of money" within Pen. Code, § 470, enumerating the subjects of forgery.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Forgery, Cent. Dig. § 12; Dec. Dig. § 7.*]

3. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1043*)—APPEAL AND ERROR—RESERVATION OF GROUNDS OF REVIEW—EFFECT OF OBJECTIONS.

An objection to the admission of a book containing a relevant entry, among several that are irrelevant, is too general to be available on appeal.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 2654; Dec. Dig. § 1043.*]

4. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 369*)—EVIDENCE—OTHER OFFENSES.

Plaintiff was indicted for forging the indorsement of W. S. on a check, which he had obtained by representing that W. S. had had an accident. To get the check, he showed the maker of the check a book containing other subscriptions for the same purpose, in which the maker of the check also wrote his name, and the amount of the check, marking it paid. Admission of the book in evidence was objected to as tending to prove other crimes. Held, that the book was properly admitted, as the other entries had no tendency to prove any other offense without further evidence.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 822–824; Dec. Dig. § 369.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; W. S. Wells, Judge.

Daniel Jones was convicted of forgery, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Frank Thunen, for appellant. Attorney General Webb, for the People.

KERRIGAN, J. The defendant was tried and found guilty of the crime of forgery as charged in the information. He moved for a new trial and in arrest of judgment, which motions were denied. From the judgment, and from the order denying his motion for a new trial, he prosecutes this appeal.

It appears from the record that the defendant, in company with one John Lewis, on December 3, 1908, called at the place of business of Smith Bros., a corporation, and the defendant, acting as spokesman, represented that they were a committee for the collection of funds for the benefit of Walter Miller, who, they said, was either ill or had been injured. Upon this representation a check was drawn in favor of Walter Miller on the First National Bank of Oakland for the sum of $5, signed "Smith Bros. Inc. J. Frank Smith, Secretary President." Thereafter John Lewis, in the presence of the defendant, indorsed the name of Walter Miller on the back of the check, and received from the Forum Cafe, a corporation, the sum of $5 in payment thereof.

One of the contentions of defendant is that it is not shown, either in the information or by proof, whether Walter Miller was a real or fictitious person. The information is drawn under section 470 of the Penal Code, and charges that on or about December 3, 1908, the defendant, "Daniel Jones, with intent to prejudice, damage, and defraud Smith Bros., Inc., * * * did unlawfully * * * make and forge a certain indorsement of said check and order by then and there falsely indorsing thereon the name of Walter Miller," etc. Said section 470, as amended in 1905, reads as follows: "Every person who, with intent to defraud, signs the name of another person, or of a fictitious person, knowing that he has no authority so to do, to * * * any acceptance or indorsement of any bill of exchange, promissory note, draft, order * * * or other contract for money * * * is guilty of forgery." Section 476 provides as follows: "Every person who makes, passes or utters, or publishes, with intent to defraud any other person; or who, with like intention, attempts to pass, utter or publish * * * any fictitious bill, note or check, purporting to be the bill, note or check, or other instrument in writing for the payment of money or property, of some bank, corporation, copartnership or individual, when in fact there is not such bank * * * or individual in existence, knowing the bill * * * or other instrument in writing to be fictitious, is punishable by imprisonment in the state prison," etc. Appellant contends that a check by reference is a fundamental part of the indorsement, and that it bears such an intimate relation to the instruments specially named in section 476 (notes, bills, and checks) that it is covered by that part of the section which reads "or other instrument in writing for the payment of money"; that under the doctrine laid down in the case of People v. Chretien, 137 Cal. 450, 70 Pac. 305, the information should have been founded on section 476, instead of section 470. In that case the name of a person not in existence was forged to a deed. A deed is not included in section 476, but is set forth in section 470 as one of the instruments which may be the subject of forgery. There it was claimed that, the deed being fictitious, the defendant should have been prosecuted under section 476. The court, however, held that where an instrument uttered, issued, or passed was fictitious, and mentioned in section 476, the charging paper must be laid under that section; that where, however, as in the Chretien Case, the instrument is not enumerated in that section, but is named in section 470, although fictitious, the information or indictment must nevertheless be laid under section 470. And the court further held that where the charging paper is framed under section 470 it was unnecessary to allege the fictitious nature of the forged instrument. But, assuming that the act complained of here comes within section 476, still defendant's contention cannot be sustained, for after the decision in the Chretien Case section 470 was amended, so that the crime of forgery may be committed under that section by signing the name of a fictitious, as well as of a real, individual to any of the instruments therein enumerated. The indorsement of a check is equivalent to an "order for the payment of money," and therefore is included within section 470. It seems plain to us that the case falls within that section, and it was unnecessary either to allege or prove whether or not Walter Miller was a real or fictitious person.

When the defendant and Lewis called at the place of business of Smith Bros., Inc., and solicited a subscription for Walter Miller, the defendant handed John F. Smith, the secretary of that corporation, a certain book containing the names of individuals, firms and corporations, opposite to each of which names was written a sum of money, and also in many instances the word "Paid." The secretary wrote on the third page of the book "Smith Bros. $5 paid," returned the book to the defendant, and gave him a check payable to Walter Miller for $5. The defendant contends that the admission of this book in evidence tended to prove that he was guilty of other crimes, and that therefore its admission over his objection was prejudicial error. This book was found in the possession of the defendant at the time of his arrest, although he had tried to conceal it. The entry by Smith Bros. was clearly relevant and material as being part of the res gestæ, relating as it did to the procurement of the check. The objection went to this part of the book, as well as to the possibly inadmissible portions, and therefore it was too general, and defendant cannot now be heard to complain. Moreover, such irrelevant entries, unless supplemented by other evidence, would have no tendency to prove other offenses.

The assistant district attorney, in his closing argument, indulged in some vituperative language concerning the defendant. While we think this language transcended the proper limits of argument, still we believe it was not of such a grave character as to require the reversal of the judgment.

From the evidence it is quite clear that the defendant and Lewis were acting in concert from the beginning to the end of this transaction, and that they were fellow conspirators.

The instructions fully and fairly covered the law applicable to the case.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

FRITZ v. MILLS et al. (Civ. 686.)

(Court of Appeal, First District, California. Dec. 3, 1909. Rehearing Denied by Supreme Court Feb. 1, 1910.)

1. ESTOPPEL (§ 107*)—PLEADING.

A plaintiff whose cause of action is based on an estoppel must plead the facts constituting the estoppel; and, in an action by a vendee to specifically enforce a contract to convey land, the court cannot find that defendant was estopped to deny the execution of the contract, where plaintiff did not plead the facts.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Estoppel, Cent. Dig. § 297; Dec. Dig. § 107.*]

2. ESTOPPEL (§ 121*) — FINDINGS — SUFFICIENCY.

In an action by the vendee to specifically enforce a contract to convey land, a general statement by the court that defendant is estopped to deny the execution of the contract is only a conclusion of law, and insufficient as a finding of an estoppel, since the facts constituting the estoppel should have been found.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Estoppel, Dec. Dig. § 121.*]

3. VENDOR AND PURCHASER (§ 42*)—PART PERFORMANCE—ESTOPPEL.

The facts that a vendor has continued in force a mortgage on the premises which, under the contract, the vendee was to assume, and that the vendee had the use and occupation of the premises since the execution of the contract, are insufficient to show a part performance of the contract so as to estop the vendor from denying its execution, since to do so the acts of part performance must be done by the party seeking to enforce the contract in pursuance of the contract, with a design of carrying it into execution, and with the consent and knowledge of the other party.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Vendor and Purchaser, Dec. Dig. § 42.*]

4. SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE (§ 43*)—PART PERFORMANCE—STATUTE OF FRAUDS.

Nor did these facts show a part performance sufficient to take it out of the statute of frauds.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Specific Performance, Cent. Dig. §§ 125–139; Dec. Dig. § 43.*]

5. VENDOR AND PURCHASER (§ 42*)—ESTOPPEL TO DENY—EXECUTION OF CONTRACT.

A vendor was not estopped to deny the execution of a contract to convey by the fact that she, after a suit had been started for specific performance, tendered to the vendee a deed to the premises upon conditions different from those in the contract, which offer, her supplemental answer undertook to keep good.

6. JUDGMENT (§ 251*)—PLEADING—ESTOPPEL.

A vendee suing for specific performance, having pleaded the execution of a contract by the vendor, and tried the case on that theory, cannot recover upon the theory that the vendor was estopped to deny the execution of the contract.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Judgment, Cent. Dig. § 437; Dec. Dig. § 251.*]

7. SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE (§ 114*)—PLEADING—ESTOPPEL.

In an action for specific performance of a contract to convey land, plaintiff must allege that the consideration to be paid is adequate, or that the contract is as to defendant just and reasonable.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Frank J. Murasky, Judge.

Action by Charles Wesley Reed against Laura J. E. Mills and another, in which Mary A. Fritz, assignee of Reed, was substituted as plaintiff. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Reversed.

F. H. Dam, for appellants. Charles Wesley Reed, for respondent.

HALL, J. This is an appeal upon the judgment roll from a judgment enforcing against defendant Laura J. E. Mills a contract to convey land. The action was brought by Charles Wesley Reed, the vendee under the contract set out in the complaint, but before entry of judgment the cause of action was assigned by him to Mary A. Fritz, and she was thereupon substituted as plaintiff. Frederick J. Mills is the husband of Laura J. E. Mills, and is made a party defendant for this reason only. He has no other interest in the controversy. Hereafter in this opinion whenever we refer to the defendant we mean the defendant Laura J. E. Mills, and whenever we refer to the plaintiff we mean the original plaintiff.

It is alleged in the complaint that on the 9th day of April, 1906, defendant, "through her duly authorized agent, executed her agreement in writing, wherein the said defendant agreed to sell, and the plaintiff agreed to buy," the premises in controversy. The agreement is set out in hæc verba, and does not appear to be signed by defendant, but by "Center and Spader, by C. N. Gompertz, Agents." Defendant is not named in the instrument at all. Defendant in her answer denied that she, through her agents or otherwise or at all, ever executed the agreement set out in plaintiff's complaint, or any agreement to sell the premises described in plaintiff's complaint, or any part thereof. Upon the issue thus presented the court found that defendant did not, through her duly authorized agents, or otherwise or at all, execute the agreement set out in plaintiff's complaint, or any agreement wherein the defendant agreed to sell the premises described in plaintiff's complaint, or any part thereof, "but, that said defendant is nevertheless estopped, for the purposes of this action, to deny that she did not" execute the agreement set out in the complaint. The insertion of the word "not" in the sentence above quoted is doubtless the result of a clerical error; and, so treating it, the court found that defendant is estopped for the purposes of this action to deny that she executed the agreement set out in the complaint. The plaintiff in his complaint did not attempt to plead any estoppel, but on the contrary counted on a written contract alleged to have been executed by defendant through her duly authorized agent. Appellant insists that the finding as to an estoppel is outside the issues presented by the pleadings, and must be disregarded. That a plaintiff, whose cause of action is based upon an estoppel, must plead the facts constituting the estoppel is clearly the law. The rule is thus stated in Ency. of Plead. & Prac. (volume 8, p. 9): "Where an estoppel is relied upon, it must be pleaded with particularity and precision. In such plea nothing can be supplied by inference or intendment; and, where the matter relied upon is not thus specially and precisely alleged, it will be no estoppel. The estoppel must be pleaded fully and sufficiently in all respects, and with all necessary incidents. In short an estoppel must be certain to every intent." That a party, who has an opportunity to plead an estoppel, upon which his cause of action or defense depends, must do so is the recognized rule in this state. Clarke v. Huber, 25 Cal. 594; Davis v. Davis, 26 Cal. 39, 85 Am. Dec. 157; Etcheborne v. Auzerais, 45 Cal. 122; Newhall v. Hatch, 134 Cal. 269, 66 Pac. 266, 55 L. R. A. 673.

In Davis v. Davis, supra, defendant relied upon facts found in a special verdict as constituting an equitable estoppel against the plaintiff, but which had not been specially pleaded. The court said: "But equitable estoppels in pais generally, if not universally, are applied to prevent injury which would ensue to one from the acts or declarations of another, were he permitted to gainsay the truth of such acts and declarations. The principle is invoked and applied for the prevention of fraud, or that which is tantamount thereto, on the one side, and injury on the other; and it is but just, and is in accordance with the rules of pleading in equity cases, that the party relying upon an equitable estoppel in pais should inform the adverse party of the nature of the cause of action or defense which he will be obliged to meet. To do this he must plead it with the same fullness and particularity as is required in cases involving like subjects of inquiry, in suits of equity." The case of Blum v. Robertson, 24 Cal. 128, supports the same principle. It was there held that a defendant sued in ejectment, relying upon part performance of an oral agreement for the sale of the demanded premises, must both allege and prove such equitable defense. The court said: "It is not enough that a defendant may have such a defense in fact. He cannot avail himself of it without pleading it, in which case his answer must, in substance at least, possess the elements and essential qualities of a bill in equity, on which the court could, upon proper proofs, pronounce a decree for his present protection or final relief." Furthermore, the general statement that defendant is estopped, in the absence of any finding as to the facts constituting the estoppel, is but the statement of a conclusion of law, and cannot be deemed a finding of fact at all. By such a finding we are left entirely at sea as to what facts the court considered as constituting the estoppel. The rule is that the facts constituting the estoppel must be pleaded. See authorities above quoted. By the same rule the facts constituting the estoppel must be found.

Respondent frankly admits that his complaint was not drawn upon any theory of an estoppel, or that the case was tried upon any such theory by plaintiff, and that it was not until the findings were served upon him, after the trial was concluded, that he learned that the theory of an estoppel would be the basis of the judgment. In his brief he says: "This theory of an estoppel is not our theory, but we have to support it." In the effort to support it he invokes the rule that under some circumstances omissions and defects in the complaint may be aided or supplied by matters set out in the answer, and calls our attention to some matters alleged in the answer.

Defendant pleads several separate defenses. The first is a denial of the execution of the agreement. In another defense or partial defense she alleges the expenditure by her since the alleged execution of the alleged contract of certain sums of money in order to continue in force a mortgage on the premises, which by the terms of the alleged contract was to be assumed by the purchaser. In this connection she also alleged that ever since the 9th day of April, 1906 (the date of the alleged contract), plaintiff has enjoyed the use and occupation of said premises. This, however, falls far short of stating facts sufficient to constitute such part performance of an oral contract to sell land as to take the contract out of the statute of frauds, or to estop a seller from denying the execution of the contract. It does not necessarily follow from the fact that plaintiff enjoyed the use and occupation of the premises from the date of the contract that he entered into possession in pursuance of the contract, or that he entered into such possession with the knowledge or consent of the defendants. Such use and occupation is suggestive as evidence. The simple allegation thereof is not sufficient as a pleading. To estop the seller, or to take the contract out of the statute of frauds "the acts of part performance must be done by the party seeking to enforce the contract, and must be done in pursuance of the contract, and with a design of carrying the same into execution, and must be done with the consent and knowledge of the other party." Foster v. Maginnis, 89 Cal. 264, 26 Pac. 828. See, also, Anson v. Townsend, 73 Cal. 415, 15 Pac. 49.

Again in a supplemental answer defendant pleaded that on the 10th day of December, 1907 (which was long after the action had been commenced), she tendered to plaintiff a properly executed deed of the premises, upon condition that he pay to her $1,771.76 in cash, which he refused to do, and also refused to accept said deed. We fail to see in this any element of estoppel that would prevent defendant from denying the execution of the contract sued on. Plaintiff took no action thereon to his detriment, or in any way in reliance thereon changed his attitude with regard to the contract. He refused the tender, and justifies his refusal upon the ground that the amount demanded of him was not warranted by the terms of his alleged contract.

Respondent lays stress upon the fact that, after pleading in the supplemental answer the tender of the deed, made on December 10, 1907, the said defendant "has been and now is ready and willing to make and keep the said offer and tender good." There might be some force in respondent's contention upon this point if the judgment of the court simply enforced the keeping of this offer. For it is probable that an appellant would not be heard to complain of a judgment that in effect was an acceptance of his own offer, solemnly made by a pleading filed with the court. The judgment in this case does not appear to be such, however. The offer pleaded by defendant clearly contemplated the payment to her of the sum of $1,771.76 cash in hand upon the acceptance of her deed, leaving the purchaser to take care of the mortgage for $5,000 then being foreclosed, and the costs and expenses incident to such foreclosure, and other liens, if any. The decree of the court directs the payment into court of a stated sum, and directs the payment therefrom of various sums and charges, some of which are as yet undetermined in amount, and to be fixed by the court hearing the foreclosure proceedings, and finally directs that whatever balance shall be left out of the sum deposited shall be paid to defendant for her deed. It is thus quite impossible to determine whether such balance will equal $1,771.76 or not.

We find nothing in any of the separate defenses pleaded by defendant that constitutes an estoppel of her right to deny the execution of the contract in suit.

Plaintiff having pleaded that defendant executed a written contract to sell the land, and tried the case upon that theory, cannot be allowed to recover upon the theory of an estoppel. A plaintiff must recover, if at all, upon the cause of action pleaded, and not upon some other, neither pleaded nor relied upon at the trial. Kredo v. Phelps, 145 Cal. 526, 78 Pac. 1044; Schirmer v. Drexler, 134 Cal. 134, 66 Pac. 180.

No attempt is made in the complaint to allege that the consideration to be paid under the alleged contract is adequate, or that the contract is as to defendant just and reasonable.

In an action to enforce the specific performance of a contract for the sale of land, such an allegation is essential to the statement of a cause of action. Flood v. Templeton, 148 Cal. 374, 83 Pac. 148; Stiles v. Cain, 134 Cal. 170, 66 Pac. 231; Herzog v. Atchison, etc., R. R. Co., 153 Cal. 497, 95 Pac. 898, 17 L. R. A. (N. S.) 428; Kaiser v. Barron, 153 Cal. 788, 96 Pac. 806; White v. Sage, 149 Cal. 616, 87 Pac. 193. For this reason the complaint does not support the judgment.

Some other points are made for a reversal. There appear to be some contradictions and inconsistencies in the findings, which will probably not appear if the case be retried, for which reason we do not discuss the other points raised by appellant.

For the reason above set forth, however, the judgment must be reversed, and it is so ordered.

We concur: COOPER, P. J.; KERRIGAN, J.

PERREAU v. PERREAU. (Civ. 705.)

(Court of Appeal, First District, California. Dec. 6, 1909.)

1. Trusts (§ 95*) — Constructive Trusts — Fraud.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1971, providing that no trust of real estate can be created otherwise than by operation of law or a conveyance in writing, oral declarations, representations, or promises, made by a son who had purchased with his own money real estate of which his parent had been regularly divested prior to the purchase without the fault of the son, will not impress a trust thereon in favor of the parent or the other children on the parent's death.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trusts, Dec. Dig. § 95.*]

2. Trusts (§ 100*) — Constructive Trusts — Fraud.

A mortgage of an incompetent mortgagor for whom a guardian had been appointed was foreclosed. The guardian was a party defendant, and was served with process, and permitted a default judgment and a sale. The purchaser at the sale conveyed the property to a son of the mortgagor. There was nothing to show that the son had any money of the incompetent with which he could have paid the mortgage or redeemed, or that he had any knowledge of the mortgage or the foreclosure proceedings prior to his purchase. The guardian relied on the son, who agreed to protect and preserve the property of the incompetent. This promise was made after the appointment of the guardian and before foreclosure proceedings. Held not to show that the son was guilty of any fraud in the purchase of the property which would impress it with a trust in favor of the mortgagor or the other children on the mortgagor's death.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trusts, Cent. Dig. § 151; Dec. Dig. § 100.*]

3. Trusts (§ 371*) — Constructive Trusts — Fraud.

The facts constituting a fraud or a fraudulent breach of duty so as to make the wrongdoer a trustee of real estate must be clearly alleged, and cannot be left to depend on conjecture and inference in the pleading.

Action by Howard J. Perreau, administrator of Eliza Ann Perreau, deceased, against William E. Perreau. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Z. N. Goldsby, for appellant. Johnson & Shaw, for respondent.

HALL, J. Plaintiff brought this action to obtain a judgment, decreeing that defendant held title to a certain piece of real estate as trustee for the estate of Eliza Ann Perreau, deceased. To plaintiff's second amended complaint defendant demurred upon the ground that the same stated no cause of action. This demurrer was sustained, with leave to plaintiff to file a third amended complaint, which he failed to do, whereupon judgment was entered for defendant. From this judgment plaintiff has appealed, and the only question presented by the record is as to the correctness of the ruling of the court sustaining defendant's demurrer to the second amended complaint.

It appears from the complaint: That Eliza Ann Perreau in her lifetime was the owner in fee of a certain described piece of land situate in the city of Oakland. That on the 18th day of January, 1897, she mortgaged the same to the Oakland Bank of Savings to secure the sum of $700. She was subsequently, by the superior court of Alameda county, adjudged to be insane, and was thereupon committed to the Hospital for Insane, and thereafter in 1899, by the same court, Mary C. Garrett, a daughter of said insane person, was duly appointed guardian of her person and estate, and duly qualified as such. Thereafter, on the 26th day of July, 1901, the said Oakland Bank of Savings brought an action against the said Eliza Ann Perreau and Mary C. Garrett, as her guardian, to foreclose said mortgage. In this action judgment by default was taken against the defendants therein on December 4, 1901. The property was regularly sold under this judgment to the Oakland Bank of Savings on the 13th day of January, 1902, for the sum of $814.74, and upon the expiration of the time for redemption a deed to said premises was regularly executed to said Oakland Bank of Savings. The value of the property is alleged to be $5,000. On the 28th day of August, 1902, defendant, for the consideration of $814.74, obtained a conveyance of said property from said Oakland Bank of Savings to himself. The allegation in the complaint as to this conveyance is qualified by many vituperative adjectives and adverbs as to the fraudulent purposes and intent of defendant, which can have no force as allegations of facts in the absence of allegations of facts that would preclude a son from purchasing property for his own benefit that had once belonged to his mother, but of which she had previously been divested of all interest by deed given upon sale, under judgment given upon regular foreclosure proceedings.

No attempt is made in the complaint to impeach the regularity or validity of the foreclosure proceedings, or the title acquired by the bank thereunder, so far as the bank is concerned. It is alleged in the complaint that said Eliza Ann Perreau died intestate on the 18th day of December, 1903, leaving surviving her as her only heirs at law five adult children, including plaintiff, defendant, and Mary C. Garrett, who had been her guardian, and thereafter, on the 22d day of April, 1907, plaintiff was appointed administrator of her estate. As to defendant, it is further alleged, apparently in an attempt to charge him with some duty to account to his mother or her estate for the property conveyed to him by said bank, "that long after the said sale of said mortgaged premises, and the conveyance thereof to said bank, and after the conveyance thereof by said bank to said defendant," he represented to the children of said mortgagor other than himself that said mortgage had not been foreclosed and "did then and there willfully, intentionally, and fraudulently conceal and keep from said mortgagor and from said other children of (said) mortgagor any and all knowledge or information of the said foreclosure and sale to the said bank and the said conveyance by said bank to said defendant." It is further alleged that defendant "concealed said facts for the purpose and with the intent of deceiving, misleading, and defrauding said mortgagor, and in the event of her death of defrauding her estate and heirs at law, * * * that at the same time it was mutually understood and agreed by and between the said children of said mortgagor * * * and the said defendant that he, the said defendant, should and would control and manage the property of said mortgagor, and the whole thereof, in and for the best interests of the said mortgagor during her lifetime, and of her estate in the event of her death, and of all parties interested therein."

It will be observed that the representations and agreements alleged in this paragraph of the complaint occurred long after the sale to the bank and after the conveyance by said bank to defendant and apparently before the death of the said mortgagor. At this time, so far as any allegations in the complaint are concerned that we have thus far considered, the said mortgagor had been divested of all right, title, and interest in the premises, and without fault or dereliction of duty on the part of defendant. It is not alleged or suggested in the complaint that he had any knowledge of or was connected with the foreclosure proceedings prior to his purchase from the bank. After this it is alleged that he concealed from the other children the fact of the foreclosure. How he could do this, as to Mary C. Garrett, who was the guardian of the mortgagor, and as such a party to the foreclosure suit, and necessarily served with process therein, it is difficult to understand. She it was who, as guardian, represented the mortgagor, and as such guardian was primarily charged with the duty of caring for and protecting the property of her ward. No mere oral declarations, representations, or promises, made by defendant after he had acquired by purchase with his own money the property of which plaintiff's intestate had been regularly and without fault of defendant divested prior to his purchase, could impress a trust thereon. Code Civ. Proc. § 1971; Smith v. Mason, 122 Cal. 426, 55 Pac. 143.

This brings us to the consideration of the only allegation in the complaint that charges or attempts to charge defendant with any duty in respect to the property of his mother. Quite out of its proper chronological order in the complaint, and after the allegations that we have heretofore examined, we find in paragraph 12 of the complaint this allegation: "That, after the said Eliza Ann Perreau was adjudged an insane and incompetent person, the said other children and heirs at law of the said Eliza Ann Perreau (now deceased), and each of them, and at all times thereafter until after the death of said Eliza Ann Perreau, trusted and confided the said property hereinbefore described, and all the property rights and interests of said Eliza Ann Perreau in her lifetime, and of her estate after her death, to him, the said defendant, William E. Perreau, and he, the said William E. Perreau, promised and agreed at all times that he would care for, attend to, protect, and preserve the said property, and the whole thereof, for and on behalf of the said Eliza Ann Perreau, during her life, and in and for the best interests of her estate after her death, and for the mutual interests of the said children and heirs at law, and of all of them, after the death of their said mother." The allegations of this paragraph, considered as matters upon which to predicate a charge of fraud, are in several respects quite general and vague. It is alleged that the "other children and heirs at law of Eliza Ann Perreau" trusted and confided the property to defendant. This action, it must be remembered, is brought by the administrator of the estate of decedent. The only one of her children who had authority to represent her or to entrust and confide her property to any one was Mary C. Garrett, her guardian. In the face of a general demurrer, it may perhaps be conceded that the allegation sufficiently informs the court in connection with the other allegations of the complaint that at all times after Eliza Ann Perreau had been adjudged an incompetent her guardian trusted and confided her property to defendant. The allegation that he "promised and agreed at all times that he would care for, attend to, protect and preserve the said property" is also somewhat vague and indefinite, both as to when he made the promise and as to the person to whom he made it. But, applying the same liberal construction, we may assume that it sufficiently alleges a promise made to the legal representative of the incompetent, to wit, her guardian, and that it was made after the appointment of such guardian and before the foreclosure proceedings.

Thus conceding that the allegations of this paragraph sufficiently charge defendant with a duty in regard to the property of the said mortgagor, we look in vain for any direct or sufficient allegation of any fraudulent dereliction of such duty. It is not alleged that he had any notice of the foreclosure proceedings prior to the conveyance of the property to him. It does not even appear from any allegations of the complaint that he had any knowledge of the existence of the mortgage prior to his purchase of the property from the bank. Although Mary C. Garrett, as the guardian of the incompetent, was a party to the action, and must necessarily have been served with process, she did not, so far as the complaint charges, give notice thereof to defendant, but apparently without any action whatever permitted judgment to be taken by default and the property to be sold thereunder. It does not appear that defendant had any money of the incompetent with which he could have paid the mortgage or redeemed from the sale. Mary C. Garrett, as guardian, is the only person who had any authority to raise money on the property itself. It does not even appear that defendant had any money of his own prior to his purchase with which he could have paid the mortgage or redeemed from the same.

There are no allegations of facts in the complaint that directly or at all charge defendant with any dereliction of duty that resulted in the foreclosure, sale, and conveyance to the bank. It is not even alleged in general terms that he was guilty of any act of omission, wrongful or otherwise, that resulted in the divesting of the mortgagor's title. The facts constituting fraud or a fraudulent breach of duty must be alleged. The existence of facts constituting fraud cannot be left to depend upon conjecture and inference in a pleading. Albertoli v. Branham, 80 Cal. 631, 22 Pac. 404, 13 Am. St. Rep. 200; Applegarth v. McQuiddy, 77 Cal. 408, 19 Pac. 692; People v. McKenna, 81 Cal. 158, 22 Pac. 488. The bank having acquired a perfect title as against the mortgagor without fault of defendant, no reason exists why defendant could not subsequently purchase with his own money for his own benefit the property.

The court did not err in sustaining defendant's demurrer, and, plaintiff having declined to further amend his complaint, judgment was properly entered against him.

The judgment is affirmed.

WOODS v. BANK OF HAYWARDS. (Civ. 569.)

(Court of Appeal, First District, California. Feb. 17, 1909. Rehearing Denied by Supreme Court April 17, 1909.)

1. FIXTURES (§ 15*)—TERMINATION OF LEASE—TRADE FIXTURES.

A bank, in possession of a building as a tenant, constructed at its own expense a brick vault, on which was placed a steel safe which was necessary in the conduct of its business. The safe could be removed, and the pieces reassembled and used again for the same purpose, without injury to the safe or to the freehold. Held, that the safe was a trade fixture within Civ. Code, § 1019, authorizing a tenant to remove a trade fixture, and the bank, before the termination of the tenancy, could remove it.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Fixtures, Cent. Dig. §§ 23–29; Dec. Dig. § 15.*]

2. FIXTURES (§ 33*)—TRADE FIXTURES—TERMINATION OF LEASE.

Where a tenant at the close of his term renews his lease, he should reserve his right to remove the fixtures he could sever under the original tenancy, as otherwise his right to remove is determined, and he is in the situation as if the landlord, being seised of the land, together with the fixtures, had leased both to him.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Fixtures, Cent. Dig. §§ 64, 65; Dec. Dig. § 33.*]

3. FIXTURES (§ 33*)—TRADE FIXTURES.

Where a tenant remained in possession of the premises after the term at an increased rent, as a tenant from month to month, the tenancy was an extension of the term of the lease, which governs the rights of the parties, save as modified as to the monthly rent; and the tenant, authorized by the lease to remove a trade fixture, may do so during the tenancy from month to month.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Fixtures, Cent. Dig. §§ 64, 65; Dec. Dig. § 33.*]

4. LANDLORD AND TENANT (§ 91*)—TENANCY AFTER EXPIRATION OF ORIGINAL TERM.

Where the lessor notifies the lessee before the beginning of a new tenancy that the terms of the original tenancy will be changed in a specified respect, and the tenant assents to the change, the terms of the original lease are applicable, except as to the change.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; F. B. Ogden, Judge.

Action by Jesse H. Woods against the Bank of Haywards. From a judgment for defendant, and from an order denying a new trial, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Dudley Kinsell, for appellant. Powell & Dow, for respondent.

KERRIGAN J. This action was commenced to obtain an injunction, perpetually restraining the defendant, a tenant of the plaintiff, from removing a vault from the premises described in the complaint. The court denied the injunction, and rendered judgment in favor of the defendant. Plaintiff appeals from the judgment, and also from the order denying his motion for a new trial.

In 1891 the Bank of Haywards, defendant, went into possession of the premises under a written lease, which provided that the bank might at any time remove any improvements erected or placed by it upon the demised premises, including vault, fixtures, and furniture. Shortly after the defendant entered into possession, it constructed in the building situated upon said premises, at its own expense, a brick vault or arch, the foundation of which rested upon the basement floor of the building, and on the top of which there was placed a steel structure or safe 8 feet in height, 6 feet 10 inches in width and 8 feet in depth. Each surface was made of sheets of steel three-eighths of an inch thick, fastened together with rivets, and as an entrance thereto there was a neck or vestibule 7 feet in height, 3 feet in width and 18 inches in depth, leading from a steel door to the main interior of the safe. The vestibule and door were made of sheets of steel similar to those described, and fastened together in like manner. Around and over this safe there were erected brick walls and a roof, in such manner, however, as to leave between them and the steel safe a vacant space of not less than 12 inches. In 1903 another lease was made to the defendant by Lucinda F. Prowse, the predecessor in interest of plaintiff, wherein it was provided that defendant might remove its vault, fixtures, and furniture at any time during the existence of the lease. At its termination the defendant remained in possession by permission of the plaintiff (who had in the meantime become the owner of the premises), at an increased rent as a tenant from month to month. The defendant, at the time of the commencement of this action, was about to vacate the premises, and threatened to remove the safe, claiming a right to do so. first, on the ground that the safe is personal property; and, secondly, that even if it be not, it is a trade fixture, removable at any time during the term of the lease or any extension thereof, and in this connection defendant claims that its present tenancy from month to month is merely an extension of its preceding term.

In one of the findings of the court the steel part of the vault is described as a "separate and distinct article of personal property," and under this finding defendant claims in effect the right to remove it, even after the termination of the tenancy. We think that the steel structure is not a thing separate from the vault; but that it is an essential part of it—the steel lining thereof; in other words, that the whole structure, comprising the brickwork, steel lining, vestibule, and door constitute what is referred to in the lease as the vault. The steel structure was not built independent of and unattached to the brickwork in order to have it regarded as a separate and distinct article of personal property. It was so made—as are all such vaults—to keep its contents dry, and to afford them better fire protection. However that may be, the court found upon uncontroverted evidence that the whole structure had been built by the bank at its own expense; that it had ever since been used by the bank, and that it was a necessity in the conduct of the bank's business; that the parts composing the steel structure could be removed, the pieces reassembled, and used again for the same purpose, without injury to the safe or to the freehold. The court having thus found, the steel structure may be regarded —as we believe it should be—as a trade fixture.

Section 1019, Civ. Code, provides that "a tenant may remove from the demised premises, any time during the continuance of the term, anything affixed thereto for purposes of trade * * * if the removal can be effected without injury to the premises, unless the thing has, by the manner in which it is affixed, become an integral part of the premises." In Moody v. Aiken, 50 Tex. 65, a safe was placed in a brick foundation, and incased in brick walls and a roof of iron and cement. It did not touch any of the walls of the vault, nor was it fastened or attached thereto. Held to be a removable fixture. In Dostal v. McCaddon, 35 Iowa, 318, a safe inclosed in a brick and stone vault, erected and used for carrying on a banking business, was denominated a trade fixture, and held removable during the life of the lease. See, also, section 1019, Civ. Code; 19 Cyc. 1041; Wiggins v. Ohio, 142 U. S. 396, 12 Sup. Ct. 188, 35 L. Ed. 1055.

Defendant, as we have seen, did not vacate the premises at the end of the term specified in the lease of 1903, but remained in possession as a tenant from month to month; and the real question in the case is whether a new lease was thereupon created, or whether such tenancy from month to month constitutes an extension of the term of the old lease. If it constituted a new lease, the case is governed by the rule laid down in Taylor's Landlord and Tenant, at section 552, where it is said: "If a tenant, at the close of his term, renews his lease, and acquires a fresh interest in the premises, he should take care to reserve his right to remove such fixtures as he had a right to sever under the old tenancy. For when his continuance in possession is under a new lease or agreement, his right to remove is determined, and he is in the same situation as if the landlord, being seised of the land, together with the fixtures, had demised both to him." See, also, Marks v. Ryan, 63 Cal. 110; Wadman v. Burke, 147 Cal. 354, 81 Pac. 1012, 1 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1192. We, however, with defendant believe that its continued occupancy of the premises must be regarded as an extension of the lease of 1903, and that the parties are deemed to have assented to the terms of that lease, save as modified in respect to the monthly rent. One of the terms of the old lease thus surviving was the right of the defendant to remove its vault at any time during the existence of the lease. Section 1945, Civ. Code, provides: "If a lessee of real property remains in possession thereof after the expiration of the hiring, and the lessor accepts rent from him, the parties are presumed to have renewed the hiring on the same terms and for the same time not exceeding one month when the rent is payable monthly, nor in any case one year." In 18 Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law (2d Ed.) p. 200, the rule is thus stated: "If the landlord notifies the lessee before the beginning of a new tenancy that the terms of the original tenancy will be changed in a certain respect, such as that an increased rent will be required, to the extent of such change the terms of the original lease do not apply, as it will be held that the tenant assented to the change; but the original lease is applicable, in all other respects." See, also, Id. p. 408; Jones on Landlord & Tenant, §§ 213, 337, 717; 24 Cyc. 1379; Coatsworth v. Ray (Sup.) 52 N. Y. Supp. 498; 32 Am. Dig. 883, § 796; Wood's Landlord & Tenant, p. 28; Rand v. Purcell, 58 Ill. App. 228. Here it appears that the tenant held over, not after notice, but by permission of the landlord at an increased rent; this slight difference, however, in circumstances cannot affect the application of the rule just stated. In Zippar v. Reppy, 15 Colo. 260, 25 Pac. 164, it is held that where a lessee upon the expiration of his term continues in possession by consent of the lessor, with no alteration of the agreement between them, save an increase in the rent, he becomes a tenant at the increased rent; but, as to all other matters, the terms expressed in the former lease will govern. The defendant held over after the end of the term fixed in the lease of 1903, plaintiff consenting, with no change in the terms of the tenancy except as to the monthly rent; and, under the authorities cited, we are of opinion that the parties are presumed to have continued the old lease and assented to its terms, except as to the time and the amount of rent.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

RICHARDS v. BLAISDELL (VAN NEST et al., Interveners). (Civ. 715.)

(Court of Appeal, Second District, California. Dec. 2, 1909. Rehearing Denied by Supreme Court Jan. 31, 1910.)

1. EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS (§ 521*)—FOREIGN ADMINISTRATION—ALLOWANCE OF CLAIMS—CONCLUSIVENESS.

The allowance of a claim against the estate of a decedent by an administrator in one jurisdiction is not only not conclusive against an administrator in another, but is not even evidence of the debt on which the claim is based.

8. EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS (§ 521*)—FOREIGN ADMINISTRATION—ALLOWANCE OF CLAIM AGAINST DECEDENT'S ESTATE—CONCLUSIVENESS.

This is true whether the proceeding to establish a claim against the estate of a decedent is a proceeding in rem, having for its res the the assets of the estate within the jurisdiction where presented as distinguished from the entire estate or in personam against the executor or administrator in the jurisdiction in which it is brought, and payable only out of the assets in that jurisdiction.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Curtis D. Wilbur, Judge.

Action by V. W. A. Richards against Robert P. Blaisdell, administrator, in which Rachel E. Van Nest and others intervened. From a judgment for plaintiff, and an order denying a motion for a new trial, defendant and interveners appeal. Reversed.

Sam L. Baker and W. C. Batcheller, for appellants. Cryer & Tuttle, for respondent.

TAGGART, J. This is an action on a claim reduced to judgment against an executor in the probate court in Minnesota, the testator's domicile, and rejected by the ancillary administrator with the will annexed in this state. Judgment was for plaintiff, and defendants and interveners appeal from the judgment, and from an order denying their motion for a new trial.

William K. Blaisdell died testate in the state of Minnesota, being a resident of that state at the time of his death. He left estate in Minnesota and also in California, that in the latter state consisting of real property only. Letters testamentary on his will were issued by the probate court of the state of Minnesota to the person named as executor therein. Thereafter letters of administration, with the will annexed, on his estate were granted to the defendant Robert P. Blaisdell in the state of California. Plaintiff presented his claim to the executor in Minnesota, who refused to approve or allow the same; whereupon the matter of such allowance and the exceptions of the executor to the claim were heard before the probate court having jurisdiction of the estate, and an order of allowance made by that court. This order, under the laws of the state of Minnesota, has the same force and effect as a judgment of a court of general jurisdiction.

After the rendition of this judgment and also after the time for presentation of claims in California had expired, the plaintiff presented to the administrator c. t. a. in California his claim in the following language: "Jan. 9, 1904. To amount of claim allowed and entered by the probate court of Hennepin county, Minnesota, by a certain judgment duly given, made and entered, as appears by the authenticated record of said judgment which is attached (and said probate court of Hennepin county, Minnesota, being a court of record and of general probate jurisdiction)—$2448." Annexed to this claim were copies of the several papers which composed what may be designated the judgment roll in the proceeding in the Minnesota court, to wit: The original demand—a promissory note for $1800, with interest, the objections thereto, filed by the executor, and the judgment or order allowing the claim. It was also accompanied by an affidavit showing that plaintiff was a resident of Minnesota at all times when the administration in this state had been pending and had never been in the state of California, and had no knowledge of the proceedings being taken, or of the notice to creditors of said estate given in California. The claim was also verified, the verification reading as follows: "That said claim is due and unpaid, and there are no offsets against the same, and no credits thereon." The claim was rejected by the local administrator, and hence this action. Defendant and interveners plead that the claim and original demand were both barred by the statute of limitations, to wit: By sections 1493, 1499, 353, and 339 of the Code of Civil Procedure, that the testator was released from the original demand by a discharge in bankruptcy, and that the action is barred because the original indebtedness was secured by a mortgage on real estate in Minnesota, which security was not exhausted, and the claim being rendered void by the provisions of sections 726 and 1497, Code of Civil Procedure. The indebtedness of the testator on the original demand was also denied, and evidence was introduced upon all the issues so raised, except that relating to the mortgage, evidence of which was refused admission.

On the issues so raised the trial court found in favor of plaintiff, setting out in full the instruments and orders attached to the claim, and found that the order of the probate court of Minnesota allowing the claim had the force and effect of a judgment, that no decree of distribution had been entered in the California administration at the time plaintiff's claim was presented, and that the affidavit of plaintiff attached to the claim made a satisfactory showing to the court that plaintiff did not have notice to present his claim by reason of absence from the state of California; that the promissory note in question was not scheduled in the bankruptcy proceedings by said William K. Blaisdell, and plaintiff had no knowledge of the bankruptcy proceedings until after the order had been made discharging Blaisdell from all his provable debts. The conclusion of law of the trial court, based upon these findings, "that the certified copy of the record of such allowance of said claim in Minnesota duly verified constitutes a valid claim against the estate of William K. Blaisdell in California," is challenged by appellants, who also raise the same question of law upon their objection to the admission of the Minnesota record in evidence.

Under the Code, "The effect of a judicial record of a sister state is the same in this state as in the state where it is made, except that it can only be enforced here by an action or special proceeding, and except, also, that the authority of a guardian or committee, or of an executor or administrator, does not extend beyond the jurisdiction of the government under which he was invested with his authority." Section 1913, Code Civ. Proc. In its general provisions the section cited declares merely the rule at common law based upon comity. This is stated in Chitty on Contracts (11th Am. Ed., vol. 2, p. 1177): "But the rule may now be taken to be, that if a question has been decided by such a court (a foreign court having jurisdiction), in a proceeding in personam, between parties properly brought before it, this will preclude an inquiry in our courts between the same parties into the merits of the case upon the facts so found." Banister v. Campbell, 138 Cal. 455, 459, 71 Pac. 504, 506.

Independent of the effect of the exception in the section, which restricts the jurisdiction of executors and administrators to the territory of the government which invested them with authority, it appears to be the settled rule that the allowance of a claim by an administrator in one jurisdiction is not only not conclusive against an administrator in another, but it is not even evidence. The laws and courts of a state can only affect persons and things within their jurisdiction. Consequently, both as to the administrator and the property confided to him, a judgment in another state is res inter alios acta. It cannot be even prima facie evidence of a debt, for if it have any effect at all it must be as a judgment, and operate by way of estoppel. And this is true whether the person appointed administrator be the same or a different person in both jurisdictions, and is true, also, in an action against any other person having assets of the deceased in a jurisdiction other than that in which the letters were granted. Cherry v. Speight, 28 Tex. 503, 516; McLean v. Meek, 18 How. 16, 15 L. Ed. 277; Johnson v. Powers, 139 U. S. 156, 159, 11 Sup. Ct. 525, 35 L. Ed. 112; Stacy v. Thrasher, 6 How. 44, 61, 12 L. Ed. 337.

In Stacy v. Thrasher the United States Supreme Court considers the question of how the "faith and credit" clause of the Constitution of the United States and act of Congress are affected by such a construction, and says: "The answer is that it (the foreign allowance of, or judgment against, an administrator) is evidence, and conclusive by way of estoppel, first, between the same parties; second, privies; and on the same matter where the proceeding is in rem. But the parties to these judgments are not the same. Neither are they privies. The term privity denotes mutual succession or relationship to the same rights of property." The argument to sustain the view of privity seems to be this: "That the judgment against the administrator is against the estate of the intestate, and that his estate, wheresoever situate, is liable to pay his debts; therefore the plaintiff having once established his claim against the estate by the judgment of a court should not be called on to make proof of it again. This argument assumes that the judgment is in rem and not in personam, or that the estate has a sort of corporate entity and unity. But this is not true either in fact or in legal construction. The judgment is against the person of the administrator, that he shall pay the debt of the intestate out of the funds committed to his care. If there be another administrator in another state, liable to pay the same debt, he may be subjected to a like judgment upon the same demand, but the assets in his hands cannot be affected by a judgment to which he is personally a stranger. A judgment may have the 'effect' of a lien upon all the defendant's lands in the state where it is rendered, yet it cannot have that effect on lands in another state by virtue of the faith and credit given to it by the Constitution and act of Congress."

The Massachusetts court says the doctrine of the Supreme Court of the United States appears to be that there is no privity between executors or administrators appointed in different jurisdictions, and the only exception is in the case where executors are appointed in different states by the same will. To support the exception, the case of Hill v. Tucker, 13 How. 458, 14 L. Ed. 223, which is relied upon by respondent here, is cited. Considering the question here before us and applying to it that which it declares to be the general rule of the United States court to a judgment obtained against an ancillary administrator with the will annexed in Vermont, which it was sought to enforce against the executor of the domicile holding letters in Massachusetts, the Supreme Court of the latter state says: "But it is said that they are in privity with the testator and that this creates a privity of estate between them. It is true that the executor is in privity with the testator in respect to the estate which he takes, which is merely the estate in Massachusetts and within the jurisdiction of its courts; and the administrator is in privity with the testator in respect to the estate in Vermont which he can administer upon. But as the privity relates to different property and different matters and is limited to different jurisdictions, it does not aid the plaintiff. There is no privity between the estate in the hands of the executor and that in the hands of the administrator." Low v. Bartlett, 8 Allen, 259.

The one case cited by respondent which is in direct conflict with the decision in Low v. Bartlett is that of Latine v. Clements, 3 Kelly (Ga.) 426. In that case the Georgia court bases its decision on the following reasoning: The executor derives his powers from the will, his duties are not imposed by law and his powers are not derived from the ordinary, but are delegated to him by the testator; an administrator de bonis non is the successor and privy of the executor and necessarily of the testator, and therefore, "all this is eminently true of the administrator with the will annexed." The decision also discusses the matter of privity in the manner following: After quoting from Greenleaf the same definition of "privity" upon which the United States and Massachusetts courts predicate their conclusions, to wit: "The term 'privity' denotes mutual and successive relationship to the same rights of property," the learned judge writing the opinion says: "The authority to act flows, in either case, from the testator. Now, the executor is in privity with the testator; so is the administrator with the will annexed, and if both are in privity with the common testator, it is difficult to imagine that they are not in privity with each other." The reasoning in the United States and Massachusetts decisions seems to be more in harmony with the decision of our own court and the language of our statute. The decisions in the other cases cited by respondent in support of the action of the trial court, are all to be distinguished from the case before us, if they are not, by reason of the premises upon which based, inapplicable in this state. Hill v. Tucker, 13 How. 458, 14 L. Ed. 223, was a Louisiana case in which it was held that where the same person was appointed executor in Virginia and Louisiana, a judgment obtained against him as executor in Virginia was admissible in evidence in Louisiana to show that the demand was prosecuted to judgment in Virginia, for the purpose of meeting a plea of the statute of limitations upon the original cause of action. It also appeared that the reason why the action was permitted in Louisiana was because the estate was exhausted in Virginia without payment of the claim.

Hopper v. Hopper, 125 N. Y. 400, 26 N. E. 457, 12 L. R. A. 237, rests upon the case of Hill v. Tucker, and holds that a New Jersey executor becomes in effect a domestic executor in the state of New York when he also takes out letters testamentary in the latter state, and that as such he may be sued by a nonresident creditor. The court says it would not be idle for the nonresident creditor to sue in the ancillary jurisdiction as, under the authority of Hill v. Tucker, while the judgment obtained will not be conclusive, it might be prima facie evidence to answer a plea of the statute of limitations. The New York court expressly declines to decide the question, whether such a creditor would be entitled to be paid in the New York administration, or be relegated to New Jersey to await the return to the domiciliary administration of the balance left after the payment in full of the New York creditors from the New York assets.

Garland v. Garland, 84 Va. 181, 189, 4 S. E. 334, which also relies on Hill v. Tucker, holds that a decree against the domiciliary executor of a decedent may be enforced against an administrator de bonis non in any jurisdiction. In Turley v. Dreyfus, 33 La. Ann. 885, the same person named as executor obtained letters testamentary in two states, and it was held that a judgment obtained against him as executor in one state could be enforced against the administrators de bonis non who succeed upon the death of the executor to the administration in the other jurisdictions. This case is much weakened as an authority by the fact that upon another hearing of the matter the chief justice dissents from this part of the decision, and holds that the judgment obtained in the other jurisdiction (Tennessee) was not binding upon the executor or real estate in Louisiana, 35 La. Ann. 514. The Wisconsin case cited rests upon such a peculiar state of facts as to render it of no assistance in determining the question before us. In Carpenter v. Strange, 141 U. S. 87, 11 Sup. Ct. 960, 35 L. Ed. 640, the action was against the same person acting as executrix, and if not sufficiently distinguished by that circumstance alone, it is by the fact that the action was one to establish a constructive trust, rather than an action on a creditor's claim against the estate. See Elizalde v. Elizalde, 137 Cal. 634, 66 Pac. 369, 70 Pac. 861. In support of the view adopted as between administrators in different states, see, also, Churchill v. Boyden, 17 Vt. 319, 322; Rosenthal v. Renick, 44 Ill. 202; McGarvey v. Darnall, 134 Ill. 367, 25 N. E. 1005, 10 L. R. A. 861; Smith v. Goodrich, 167 Ill. 46, 47 N. E. 317; Hatchett v. Berney, 65 Ala. 39, 49; Durston v. Pollock, 91 Iowa, 668, 60 N. W. 221; Brodie v. Bickley, 2 Rawle (Pa.) 431; Barry's Appeal, 88 Pa. 131; Aspden v. Nixon, 4 How. 467, 497, 11 L. Ed. 1059.

The decisions which are rested upon the doctrine of privity between the executor in one jurisdiction and the administrator c. t. a. in another are the natural deductions from the rules of succession and administration at common law. By the common law the title to the personal property vested in the executor, while that of the real estate vested in the heir. At first it was held under the English rule that the executor of the domicile was charged with the collection of the personal assets from all parts of the world, and the corresponding duty of paying all the debts of the estate was imposed upon him. Either in person or by representative he was required to act in every jurisdiction in which personal assets of the decedent were to be found. His powers were derived from the will, and those of the administrator c. t. a., who acted in his behalf, were also derived from the will through him, and, as the Georgia court said, it is difficult under such conditions to imagine that they are not in privity with each other. But even in England this rule was relaxed until the executor in the domicile was held responsible only for such of the estate as was there located and such as otherwise came into his possession, and the ancillary administrator came to be entitled to and chargeable with all the personal property having its situs within his jurisdiction. Some of the litigation in the cases examined arose through the attempt of nonresident creditors in one jurisdiction to subject the real estate of the heir in another to the payment of their debts, while in others the contest arose between the personal representatives in the different states. The question of privity became of importance and the rights of the respective parties were determined, as we have said, with relation to the common-law rules of succession. Owing to a failure to always distinguish between the right of action of one executor or administrator as against another executor or administrator, and the right of such executor or administrator against the heirs in another jurisdiction, the decisions even in common law are not all in harmony. These rules evolved under the common-law system have never prevailed in this state, where all the property, real and personal, descends to the heir, subject only to the right of the personal representative, under statutory authority, to administer thereon. Here the executor or administrator takes possession of all the estate of the deceased for the purpose of administration. Section 1581, Code Civ. Proc., and section 1384, Civ. Code. All property is chargeable with the decedent's debts, there being no priority between the personal and real property in its application to this purpose. Section 1516, Code Civ. Proc.; Murphy v. Crouse, 135 Cal. 14, 66 Pac. 971, 87 Am. St. Rep. 90. This local administration is provided for the protection of local creditors and claimants. No state should allow property to be taken from its borders until debts due its own citizens have been satisfied. Our statute provides for administration upon the estate of any nonresident who has died leaving property in this state. To obtain such letters it is not necessary to show that there are creditors or that the property requires care to preserve it, and the law provides a mode for ascertaining whether there are any local creditors after the administration is begun. The administration, though called ancillary to distinguish it from the administration of the last residence of the decedent, is wholly independent of it. Only the surplus remaining after full administration can be remitted to the domiciliary representative for distribution. See section 1667, Code Civ. Proc. Whether there are any local creditors can only be determined by giving the notice to creditors required by the law of this state. McCully v. Cooper, 114 Cal. 263, 46 Pac. 82, 35 L. R. A. 492, 55 Am. St. Rep. 66.

In holding that the will of a resident of California cannot be admitted to probate in this state as a "foreign will" after it has been probated in another state, our Supreme Court declares: Every state has plenary power with respect to the administration and disposition of the estates of deceased persons as to all property of such persons found within its jurisdiction. By the comity under which full faith and credit is to be given to judicial proceedings of sister states, it was never intended that the state should part with any of its sovereign rights, with any of its rights of primary jurisdiction, nor with any rights of its subjects, to have the will of a fellow resident originally proved in the county of his residence, where, presumptively, he is the best known, and where they may the better litigate all questions touching the validity of the solemn instrument offered for probate. Estate of Clark, 148 Cal. 108, 112, 113, 82 Pac. 760, 762, 1 L. R. A. (N. S.) 996, 113 Am. St. Rep. 197. In the decision of this case the court says: "It would be said with exact truth that the full faith and credit which is accorded to the adjudications of sister states is a full faith and credit consonant with complete jurisdiction and control of the sovereign state over all its inhabitants, and over all the property within its boundaries." Other cases tend to assert for, and afford to, the local creditor the same protection and preference over foreign creditors that the Clark Case does to the persons locally entitled to the estate of the deceased upon distribution. See Estate of Apple, 66 Cal. 432, 6 Pac. 7; Estate of Ortiz. 86 Cal. 306, 24 Pac. 1034, 21 Am. St. Rep. 44; Fox v. Tay, 89 Cal. 339, 24 Pac. 855, 26 Pac. 897, 23 Am. St. Rep. 474. In one instance this is extended far enough to declare that a foreign domiciliary executor has no power against an ancillary administrator with the will annexed, in this state, to sell and assign certificates of stock in a national bank located in this state, notwithstanding the certificates of stock were in the possession of the deceased and came into the hands of the foreign executor. Murphy v. Crouse, supra. An inspection of the sections of the Code of Civil Procedure relating to probate matters justifies no distinction between an executor or administrator c. t. a., and a general administrator in respect to the effect of the allowance of, or a judgment establishing, a probate claim in a foreign state.

Considering the effect of section 1913, Code Civ. Proc., upon the judgment of the Minnesota court in the light of the rule declared by the cases above reviewed, if it be held that the exception therein as to executors and administrators has no bearing, we are still of the opinion that the judgment is not only not conclusive upon the California administrator c. t. a., but that it cannot be the basis of an action against him, or even evidence to establish the indebtedness. This is the result whether we accept the implied view of some of the cases that a proceeding to establish a claim against an estate is a proceeding in rem having for its res the assets of the estate within the jurisdiction where presented as distinguished from the entire estate, or the theory of the United States Supreme Court, that an action to establish a claim is in personam against the executor or administrator in the jurisdiction in which brought, which can be made payable only out of the assets of the estate in that jurisdiction. It is to be borne in mind that the original indebtedness is not presented here. The claim is based upon the judgment, and the right to present the original indebtedness is not before us. This distinction is drawn because the issues made by the pleadings, the defenses interposed to the claim, and the evidence introduced might be construed to have also submitted to the trial court defenses admissible only upon the theory that it was the original indebtedness which was under consideration. These, however, were presented on the issue that the claim was illegally allowed in Minnesota.

If this matter were considered by us upon the theory that is advanced by respondent to sustain the judgment, to wit: That by reason of the provisions of section 1356, Code Civ. Proc., a privity exists between the executor in Minnesota and the administrator in California, the plaintiff has failed to establish his right to recover against the assets in the latter state. If there be privity it must be in the enforcement of the provisions of the will; by these the payment of debts is charged upon the personal property first, and only when this is found insufficient to pay the debts is resort to be had to the real estate, and by our Code the property of a testator is to be applied to the payment of his debts in the order in which his will directs, if there be sufficient property of the kind indicated to pay his debts. Civ. Code, § 1359. There is neither averment nor finding that the personal property in the domicile has been exhausted, nor that any personal property exists in or has been removed to California. On the contrary, it is found that all the estate in California is real estate. Cherry v. Speight, 28 Tex. 517; Hill v. Tucker, 13 How. 458, 14 L. Ed. 223.

The other points made on the appeal as to the admissibility of the evidence relating to the knowledge of plaintiff of the bankruptcy proceeding, the mortgage on the Minnesota property, and the sufficiency of the showing of want of knowledge of the probate proceeding in California to stay the bar of the statute of limitations, and of the affidavit attached to the claim, need not be considered. We cannot, however unnecessary it may be to the decision, refrain from saying that an affidavit, "that said claim is due and unpaid, and there are no offsets against the same, and no credits thereon," is not merely defective, but entirely lacks some of the most important elements of the statutory requirement that it shall state, "that the amount is justly due, that no payments have been made thereon which are not credited, and that there are no offsets to the same, to the knowledge of the affiant." Code Civ. Proc. § 1494.

Judgment and order reversed.

GRANGERS' UNION v. ASHE et al.

(Civ. 673.)

(Court of Appeal, First District, California. Dec. 9, 1909.)

1. VENUE (§ 66*) — CHANGE — AFFIDAVIT OF MERITS.

An affidavit of merits for a change of venue, reciting that deponent had fully and fairly stated the case to his counsel, "and after such statement I am advised and verily believe that I have a good defense on the merits to this action," did not show that deponent was advised by his counsel that he had a good defense, and was therefore defective.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Venue, Cent. Dig. § 113; Dec. Dig. § 66.*]

2. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 177*) — QUESTIONS NOT RAISED AT TRIAL.

Where an affidavit of merits on an application for change of venue was drawn on the theory that the deponent had employed counsel, and had stated the facts to him, and there was no intimation below that deponent was himself an attorney, or that he relied on his own judgment, his affidavit, otherwise defective for failure to show that he had been advised by his counsel that he had a good defense, could not be sustained on appeal, on the theory that deponent, being an attorney, did not need to rely on the advice of other counsel.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Dec. Dig. § 177.*]

3. VENUE (§ 58*)—CHANGE OF VENUE—AFFIDAVIT.

Where, in an action against a firm, it appeared from the verified complaint that there were other defendants members of the firm when the action was commenced than those referred to by deponent in an application for a change of venue, who were alleged to reside in the city of San Francisco, so that it did not appear that all of the defendants were nonresidents of the county in which the action was brought, the application was properly denied.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Venue, Cent. Dig. §§ 88–90; Dec. Dig. § 58.*]

4. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 912*)—ORDERS—PRESUMPTIONS OF REGULARITY.

All presumptions are in favor of the regularity of a trial court's order denying an application for change of venue.

COOPER, P. J. The order made by the trial court, denying appellant's motion for a change of the place of trial, may be justified. The motion was made by Gaston M. Ashe, who states in his affidavit of merits that he has fully and fairly stated the case to John T. Thornton, Esq., his counsel, "and after such statement I am advised, and verily believe, that I have a good defense on the merits to this action." The affidavit does not show that appellant was advised by his counsel that he had a good defense, and it is therefore and for that reason defective. Jensen v. Dorr, 9 Cal. App. 18, 98 Pac. 45.

Nor can the affidavit be held sufficient in this court on the theory that appellant is himself an attorney at law, and therefore not under the necessity of relying upon the advice of other counsel. No such theory was intimated in the court below. The affidavit was drawn entirely upon the theory that appellant had employed counsel, and that he had stated the facts to such counsel. Not having intimated in the court below that he was an attorney at law, nor that as such attorney he made the affidavit relying upon his own judgment, he will not now be allowed to ask this court to take judicial notice of the fact that he is such attorney, for the purpose of reversing an order otherwise properly made by the trial court.

It may be further said that the complaint shows that John Doe, whose true name is unknown to the plaintiff, was one of the partners doing business under the firm name of Ruinart Stock Farm. The affidavit does not state that there are no others than R. Porter Ashe and Gaston M. Ashe who are members of said partnership, nor that said John Doe is a fictitious defendant, nor that the defendants all resided in the city and county of San Francisco at the time of the commencement of the action. In fact it appears from the verified complaint that there were other defendants members of the said copartnership at the time said action was commenced. All presumptions are in favor of the regularity of the order made by the trial court.

The order is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. LEWIS. (Cr. 203.)

(Court of Appeal, First District, California. Dec. 9, 1909.)

CRIMINAL LAW (§ 729*)—MISCONDUCT OF PROSECUTING ATTORNEY—CORRECTION BY COURT—EFFECT.

On a trial of a husband for assault with intent to murder his wife, living apart from him, the misconduct of the district attorney in stating in his argument that the wife refused to live with the husband because of his conviction of a felony, where there was no evidence that the wife lived apart from her husband on that ground, was not reversible error, where on objection the statement was withdrawn, and the court, at the district attorney's request, directed the jury to consider the husband's conviction of felony only in weighing his testimony.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 1692; Dec. Dig. § 729.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; F. B. Ogden, Judge.

J. C. Lewis was convicted of assault with intent to murder, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Geo. Ingraham, for appellant. Attorney General Webb, for the People.

KERRIGAN, J. The defendant was charged by information with the crime of assault with intent to commit murder, the information also setting up a prior conviction. To the latter charge he pleaded guilty, but went to trial on the other, and was convicted. From the judgment, and from an order denying his motion for a new trial, he prosecutes this appeal.

The principal point urged by the defendant for a reversal of the judgment is misconduct on the part of the prosecuting officer. The assault for which the defendant was being tried was committed on his wife, who was living apart from him; and it appears from the record that just prior to the assault the defendant called on her and besought her to live with him again, but she refused to do so. The defendant offered himself as a witness at the trial, and upon his cross-examination admitted that he had been convicted of a felony. In the course of his argument to the jury the assistant district attorney stated that the defendant's wife had refused to live with him because he had been convicted of a felony. There was no evidence in the case that she had refused to live with him upon this ground, and upon objection by the defendant the prosecuting officer, in the presence of the jury, was immediately so informed by the court. The district attorney withdrew this statement, and requested the court to direct the jury to disregard it, whereupon the court instructed the jury in substance that the only use they could make of the testimony given by the defendant that he had been convicted of a felony was in weighing the credibility of his testimony; that the assertion of the district attorney that the defendant's wife had refused to live with him because of his conviction of a felony was without any evidence to support it, and that therefore it was to be wholly disregarded by the jury.

There are a number of cases in this state (many of which are cited by the defendant in his brief) to the effect that it is error sufficient to reverse a judgment for the prosecuting officer against objection to state facts pertinent to the issue, but not in evidence, or to argue on the assumption that such facts are in evidence when they are not.

While there was no evidence in this case that the wife's refusal to live with the defendant was because of his conviction of a felony, yet it is plain, we think, in view of the circumstances above adverted to and the triviality of the entire matter, that the statement was not so serious as to come within the doctrine of those cases.

In the oral argument before this court counsel for defendant contended that the trial court erred in its rulings on the admission of certain evidence. We have carefully examined these rulings, and also the sufficiency of the evidence to support the verdict, and find these points to have less merit than the point first considered.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

PEOPLE v. OSBORN. (Cr. 123.)

(Court of Appeal, Second District, California. Dec. 10, 1909. Rehearing Denied by Supreme Court Feb. 7, 1910.)

1. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1035*)—APPEAL—OBJECTION AND EXCEPTION—NECESSITY.

A conviction cannot be reversed on appeal because of alleged misconduct of the trial judge, in the absence of a specific objection and exception taken thereto in the trial court.

2. FALSE PRETENSES (§ 49*)—EVIDENCE.

Evidence held to warrant a conviction of obtaining money by false pretenses.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see False Pretenses, Cent. Dig. § 62; Dec. Dig. § 49.*]

3. FALSE PRETENSES (§ 38*) — STATUTES — AMOUNT RECEIVED—"GRAND LARCENY."

Pen. Code, § 487, defines "grand larceny" to include the taking of property of another exceeding $50 in value, and section 532 declares that every person who knowingly, and by false or fraudulent pretense, defrauds another of money, etc., is punishable in the same manner and to the same extent as for larceny of the money or property so obtained. Held that, where defendant was accused of obtaining by false pretenses a loan of $1,000, the state was not bound to show that defendant received the full amount alleged, but proof that she received an amount in excess of $50 was sufficient to sustain a conviction.

4. FALSE PRETENSES (§ 43*)—EVIDENCE.

Where it was claimed that defendant procured a loan from prosecutor by false pretenses, on condition that she should procure insurance on a house, which she pretended to mortgage as security, evidence that defendant procured witness to introduce her to an insurance agent, saying that she wanted to procure insurance on a house, that defendant was present when the policy was issued, and that it was subsequently delivered to prosecutor in performance of the condition was admissible.

6. FALSE PRETENSES (§ 44*)—EVIDENCE.

Where, in a prosecution for false pretenses in obtaining a loan by falsely representing defendant's ownership of certain real estate, which she offered as security, there was no evidence that she had any claim or interest in the property when the representations were made, or for a period of years before that, evidence that at some time prior to 1905 she claimed to own some interest in the property was properly excluded.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles Monroe, Judge.

K. B. Osborn was convicted of false pretenses, and she appeals. Affirmed on rehearing. Former opinion withdrawn.

C. W. Pendleton and Henry W. Nisbet, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and George Beebe, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

ALLEN, P. J. Appellant was tried by a jury, and found guilty of obtaining money under false pretenses. A motion for a new trial was denied, from which order and the judgment of conviction appellant appeals. This court in a former opinion filed reversed the judgment and order denying a new trial upon the ground of misconduct upon the part of the trial judge amounting to an irregularity in the proceedings. Upon the application for a rehearing our attention is called for the first time to the fact that no exception was reserved at the time to the comment by the court upon the questions of fact forming the basis for such claim of irregularity. There is an exception appearing in the record in connection with the incident involved in the question of misconduct; but it appears that this exception was taken to the ruling of the court upon the admissibility of certain evidence, and not to the language of the court used in connection with the ruling. The trial court is always entitled to know the true character of the objection and the reasons, if any, existing in the minds of the attorneys why and for what the objection is urged, to the end that the court may intelligently consider the effect of what has been said by the court, and thus be afforded an opportunity to correct any irregularity, either by instruction or otherwise. In the absence of a specific objection and exception based upon misconduct, an appellate court is not authorized to pass upon the merits of the controversy. People v. Abbott, 101 Cal. 645, 36 Pac. 129; People v. Ah Fook, 64 Cal. 382, 1

Pac. 347; People v. Trask, 7 Cal. App. 104, 93 Pac. 891.

What is said in connection with the one specification above referred to applies with equal force to the other matters specified as error and based upon alleged misconduct and irregularity. The record discloses that many things were said, and suggestions made by the court, during the progress of the trial, which might have been omitted. But appellant is not in a position, having reserved no exception thereto at the time, to ask a consideration of the effect of such alleged misconduct.

Eliminating, then, from consideration all questions of misconduct not excepted to at the time, we find upon an examination of the record evidence tending to show the following facts: Appellant represented to one Larkin that she was the owner of a certain house and lot bearing number 1217 West Forty-Fifth street, Los Angeles, and took Larkin to view said premises, and stated to him that the title to same was standing in the name of one Watts as trustee for her, and that she desired to procure from Larkin a loan of $1,000 upon said property. As a matter of fact, the house shown by defendant to Larkin was situated on lot 142, Normandie avenue tract, and was not owned by defendant, and she had no interest therein, and no title was held thereto by Watts or any other person for her use or benefit. Larkin, believing her representations to be true, agreed to make the loan of $1,000 if appellant would procure a policy of insurance upon the dwelling as part of the security. It is shown that this property so shown to Larkin was worth at least $2,000, and that Larkin, relying upon the representations of appellant, delivered his check to an abstract company, with instruction to deliver the same to defendant whenever the trustee, Watts, should execute and deliver as security for the loan a deed of trust for the house and lot and, in addition, a policy of insurance covering the cottage. The instruction to the abstract company was in writing, but there is evidence tending to show that when the same was signed by Larkin such instruction contained no designation as to the lot number. It does appear, however, that without Larkin's knowledge some one inserted in the instruction a description of the property as lot No. 35, Noramndie avenue tract. About the time of the transaction appellant had entered into a contract to purchase, for $600, an unimproved lot situate a block or so distant from No. 1217 West Forty-Fifth Street, the same being lot 35, Normandie avenue tract, upon which contract of purchase she paid $10, and no more, and represented to the seller that she was buying it for Watts. Appellant, after making arrangements with Larkin for the loan, caused a deed of trust to be executed in the name of Watts for lot 35, Normandie avenue tract, being the vacant lot, and caused to be issued and delivered to Larkin a policy of insurance upon the cottage known as 1217 West Forty-Fifth street. Larkin, believing that the description in the deed of trust executed to him covered the property shown to him as 1217 West Forty-Fifth street, accepted the same as security for his loan, and the abstract company applied the $1,000 represented by Larkin's check to the payment of the $590 due from appellant on account of the purchase of lot 35, and some other minor expenses, and gave appellant a check for the balance, $383.70, which check was payable to Watts, and, bearing the indorsement of Watts and appellant, was subsequently paid by the bank upon which it was drawn.

That every representation made by appellant in relation to the property was false, and known by her to be false, and the same were made by her to Larkin for the purpose of defrauding him, is established beyond question. In fact there was no evidence offered at the trial on the part of defendant tending to rebut any evidence offered in support of the allegations of the information. The theory upon which the defense appears to have been conducted was that defendant, at the time of committing the acts complained of, was insane. The verdict of the jury was adverse to appellant upon this contention, and the evidence fully warranted its conclusion in that regard.

A great number of errors are assigned in appellant's brief, the major portion of which are directed to claimed error on account of the action of the trial court in refusing certain instructions, notably among which was the refusal upon the part of the court to charge the jury, in effect, that a conviction could not be had unless the full sum of $1,000, alleged to have been obtained, was in fact actually received by defendant. We see no error in refusing this charge. That she did receive $590 of the money, or, at least, the full benefit thereof, in the purchase of lot 35, is unquestioned, and there are strong circumstances tending to show that she received all of the remainder of the money, or the benefit thereof. Aside from this, it is not incumbent upon the state to show that the full amount alleged to have been received was in fact actually obtained by reason of the false representations. Proof of receiving an amount in excess of $50 would be sufficient to sustain a verdict of guilty under the information in this case. Sections 487, 532, Pen. Code. We have examined carefully the instructions refused, and feel satisfied that, in so far as they are applicable or proper, the same were embodied in the instructions actually given by the court upon its own motion.

Error is claimed by reason of the admission in evidence of the policy of insurance covering the cottage. It is in evidence that defendant procured a witness to introduce her to an insurance agent, saying at the time that she wanted to procure insurance on a house; evidence that she was present when the policy was issued, and that this policy was subsequently delivered to Larkin, the complaining witness. This, in connection with her agreement with Larkin to procure a policy, was sufficient to connect her with the transaction, and were facts and circumstances sufficient to warrant the court in admitting in evidence the policy of insurance so issued and delivered.

We think there was no impropriety in giving the following instruction: "Rulings have been made by the court in your presence, and questions have been asked of witnesses by the court. From these things, or from anything that has occurred in the trial, you are not to infer what the opinion of the court may be as to the guilt or innocence of the accused. With the court's opinion you have nothing whatever to do, and if you have even any suspicion of what the court may think in the matter, you have no right to consider it any more than you would have a right to consider the opinion of anybody else. The question of the guilt or innocence of the defendant is for you alone, regardless of what anybody else may think about it."

We see no prejudicial error in the action of the court denying to defendant the right to show that at some time prior to 1905 the defendant claimed to own some interest in the house situated on lot 142, and which had been moved thereon from some other lot. There is nothing in any of the evidence which could have the effect to show any facts from which it could be inferred that defendant had any claim or interest in the property at the time the representations were made, nor, in fact, for a period of years preceding.

Many other errors are assigned, but, in our opinion, they are without merit, and, considering the record all together, that there is no prejudicial error appearing therein warranting a judgment of reversal.

The judgment and order are therefore affirmed.

We concur: SHAW, J.; TAGGART, J.

Ex parte HAYDEN. (Cr. 151.)

(Court of Appeal, Second District, California. Dec. 9, 1909.)

1. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 13*) — "CONFIDENCE OPERATOR."

Pen. Code, § 647, subd. 4, declares every person known to be a "confidence operator," either by his own confession, or by his having been convicted of such offense, and having no visible or lawful means of support when found loitering around any steamboat landing, railroad depot, or broker's office, etc., to be a vagrant. Held, that the state's police power was sufficiently broad to warrant legislation looking toward the suppression of "confidence operators," which term implies as its fixed meaning one engaged in swindling operations, in which advantage is taken of confidence reposed by the victim in the swindler.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Dec. Dig. § 13.*

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, vol. 2, p. 1421.]

2. CONSTITUTIONAL LAW (§ 206*) — "VAGRANTS"—DEFINITION—PRIVILEGES AND IMMUNITIES OF CITIZENS.

Pen. Code, § 647, subd. 4, defining "vagrants" to include confidence operators having no visible means of support when found loitering around certain public places, was not unconstitutional as abridging the privileges or immunities of citizens.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Constitutional Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 625–648; Dec. Dig. § 206.*

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, vol. 8, pp. 7267–7269.]

3. VAGRANCY (§ 1*) — EVIDENCE — "CONFESSION."

Pen. Code, § 647, subd. 4, provides that every person known to be a confidence operator, either by his own confession, or having been convicted of such offense, and having no visible means of support when found loitering around certain public places, shall be deemed a vagrant. Held, that the word "confession" as so used had reference to an admission or declaration as to the party's status as distinguished from his confession of guilt of a particular crime, and was not the equivalent of a "statement" or "declaration," and hence the section does not justify a conviction, or declare the offense established by the confession of the party, but only provides that his admission of the truth of one of the elements, of the offense, to wit, his calling, is sufficient to establish such element.

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, vol. 2, pp. 1417–1419; vol. 8, p. 7610.]

4. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 273*)—PLEA OF GUILTY—CORPUS DELICTI.

In a prosecution for vagrancy, defendant's plea of guilty not only established the character of his calling, but all the elements of the offense.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 631; Dec. Dig. § 273.*]

Habeas corpus on petition of Thomas L. Hayden. Writ denied. Prisoner remanded.

Hugh J. Crawford, for petitioner. J. D. Fredericks, Dist. Atty., and Arthur L. Veitch, Deputy Dist. Atty., for respondent.

PER CURIAM. The petitioner was arrested upon a complaint charging him with the crime of vagrancy, in that, being known to be a confidence operator by his own confession, and having no visible or lawful means of support, he was found willfully and unlawfully loitering about and around a broker's office. He entered a plea of guilty, and was accordingly sentenced to imprisonment, from which by this writ he seeks relief. The affidavit of complaint charges the offense in the language of the statute. Section 647, Pen. Code.

It is claimed upon the part of petitioner that being a confidence operator is not made an offense under our Penal Code, and therefore a confession in relation thereto cannot be made an offense. The term "confidence operator" has a settled and fixed meaning in our language, and implies that the one to whom it applies is one engaged in swindling operations in which advantage is taken of confidence reposed by the victim in the swindler. That such persons are a menace to the safety of the public must be unquestioned, and that the police power is broad enough to warrant legislation looking toward their suppression should be conceded. It is certainly within the legislative power to provide that one having no visible means of support, and who admits that he is a swindler, and is found lounging about places of public assemblage, thereby becomes a vagrant. We see nothing in the enactment of the section of the Penal Code referred to in any wise abridging privileges or immunities of citizens, nor doing or seeking to do aught than to protect well-disposed and orderly citizens from the depredations of the idle and vicious.

It is further insisted that the statute makes the confession the offense, and not the act of the party, and that the record discloses a judgment pronounced without proof of the corpus delicti otherwise than by the confession of the accused. We do not interpret the section in the manner above stated. It undertakes to and does define vagrancy and the various acts or omissions forming its constituent elements. It is the confidence operator against whom the subdivision of the section is directed. The term "confession" is restricted to acknowledgment of guilt, and is not the equivalent of "statement" or "declaration." People v. Strong, 30 Cal. 156. The section referred to does not justify the conviction, or declare the offense to be established, by the confession of the party, but does declare that his admission of the truth of one of the elements entering into the offense, to wit, his calling, is sufficient to establish that element. Thus, where there is an "admission of a fact, or a bundle of facts, from which guilt is directly deducible, or which within and of themselves import guilt, it may be denominated a confession, but not so with the admission of a particular act or acts or circumstances which may or may not involve guilt, and which is dependent for such result upon other acts or circumstances to be established." State v. Porter, 32 Or. 135, 49 Pac. 964. It is manifest that the word "confession" as used in the section has reference to an admission or declaration as to the party's status as distinguished from a confession of his guilt of a particular crime. When presented for trial the subject-matter of the inquiry is as to his calling, his idle loitering, the absence of visible means of support. If the illegitimate character of his calling is established, either by proof of former conviction or by his own admission, that element is established. The plea of guilty entered by him comprehends more than the mere fact that he has admitted the character of his calling, and goes to the extent of a plea of guilty to all of the elements entering into the offense. We do not desire to be understood as saying that one may be convicted upon his confession alone without other proof of the corpus delicti. The plea of guilty in this case removes from consideration such question.

Writ denied, and prisoner remanded.

HAMBERGER v. POLICE COURT OF CITY OF FRESNO et al. (Civ. 663.)

(Court of Appeal, First District, California. Dec. 13, 1909. Rehearing Denied by Supreme Court Feb. 10, 1910.)

1. PROHIBITION (§ 3*)—GROUNDS—ABSENCE OF OTHER REMEDY.

Prohibition will not issue to an inferior tribunal or officer acting in excess of jurisdiction, unless the aggrieved party be without a plain, speedy, and adequate remedy at law, under the express provisions of Code Civ. Proc. § 1103.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Prohibition, Cent. Dig. §§ 4–19; Dec. Dig. § 3.*]

2. PROHIBITION (§ 3*)—EXISTENCE OF OTHER REMEDY.

An appeal lies to the superior court both upon questions of law and fact from a judgment of a police court in a civil action under the express provisions of Code Civ. Proc. § 974. Section 975 provides an expeditious method of settling the statement if the appeal be upon questions of law alone, and upon such appeal the superior court may review all orders affecting the judgment appealed from. Held that, where a judgment sought in a police court was a money judgment for goods sold, an appeal from an adverse judgment is a remedy in the ordinary course of law plain, speedy, and adequate, and prohibition will not lie.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; Geo. E. Church, Judge.

Prohibition by A. Hamberger against the Police Court of the City of Fresno and another. A demurrer to the complaint was sustained, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Rehearing denied by Supreme Court; Beatty, C. J., dissenting.

Carter & Carter and Earl A. Bagby, for appellant. Ernest Klette, for respondents.

HALL, J. Plaintiff brought this proceeding in the superior court of the county of Fresno for the purpose of securing a writ to issue out of said court, prohibiting the police court of the city of Fresno and the judge thereof from proceeding with the trial of an action then pending in said police court, upon an account against plaintiff herein for $121.65 for goods sold to said plaintiff. Defendants filed a general demurrer to plaintiff's complaint, and the court sustained the same, and entered judgment denying plaintiff's application for a writ of prohibition. From the judgment plaintiff has appealed, and the only question presented by the appeal is as to the correctness of the ruling of the court sustaining the demurrer.

The ruling of the court was clearly correct. The writ of prohibition will not issue to an inferior tribunal or officer, acting without or in excess of the jurisdiction of such tribunal or officer, unless the aggrieved party be without a plain, speedy, and adequate remedy in the ordinary course of law. Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1102, 1103; Levy v. Wilson, 69 Cal. 105, 10 Pac. 272; Powelson v. Lockwood, 82 Cal. 613, 23 Pac. 143; Murphy v. Superior Court, 84 Cal. 592, 24 Pac. 310; Strouse v. Superior Court, 147 Cal. 227, 81 Pac. 515; McAneny v. Superior Court, 150 Cal. 6, 87 Pac. 1020.

An appeal lies to the superior court, both upon questions of law and fact, from any judgment rendered by a police court in a civil action. Code Civ. Proc. §§ 974, 975. If the appeal be upon questions of law alone, an expeditious method of settling the statement is provided (Code Civ. Proc. § 975), and upon such appeal the superior court may review all orders affecting the judgment appealed from. In the case at bar the judgment sought against appellant in the police court was an ordinary money judgment for goods sold. That an appeal from such a judgment is a remedy in the ordinary course of law, plain, speedy, and adequate cannot be doubted. Holbrook, etc., v. Superior Court, 106 Cal. 589, 39 Pac. 936; Powelson v. Lockwood, 82 Cal. 613, 23 Pac. 143; Murphy v. Superior Court, 84 Cal. 592, 24 Pac. 310; Strouse v. Police Court, 85 Cal. 49, 24 Pac. 747; Broder v. Superior Court, 103 Cal. 124, 37 Pac. 191; Grant v. YOUNGER v. SPRECKELS. (Civ. 687.)

(Court of Appeal, First District, California. Dec. 15, 1909. Rehearing Denied by Supreme Court Feb. 10, 1910.)

1. VENUE (§ 68*)—CHANGE OF PLACE OF TRIAL—RESIDENCE OF DEFENDANT.

Affidavits on application for change of venue to the county of the residence of defendant which averred that defendant was at the commencement of the action, and had been for many years prior thereto, a resident of such county, and that he had during such times been registered as a voter therein, and had never resided or been registered as a voter at any other place for the past 45 years, were sufficient to require a change of venue, notwithstanding an opposition affidavit averring that defendant was residing in the dwelling house on his ranch in the county at the time the action was commenced.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Venue, Cent. Dig. § 121; Dec. Dig. § 68.*]

2. VENUE (§ 28*)—"RESIDENCE."

"Residence" within the statute providing for the place of trial depends on intention as well as fact, and is the place where one remains when not called elsewhere on business, pleasure, or for other temporary purposes, and the place of residence within the statute is the fixed home of a party as understood by himself and his neighbors and friends.

3. VENUE (§ 28*)—RESIDENCE.

The mere inhabitancy of a summer home at certain seasons or at certain times does not make the person inhabiting the house a resident of the county in which the house is situated, for though one may abide at times in a place for pleasure, health, or repose, it does not become his domicile unless it is his intention to remain there.

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Cruz County; Lucas F. Smith, Judge.

Action by Jeannie H. Younger, as executrix of Charles B. Younger, deceased, against Claus Spreckels. From an order denying the motion of defendant to change the place of trial on the ground of his residence, he appeals. Reversed.

Charles S. Wheeler, for appellant. Charles B. Younger, for respondent.

COOPER, P. J. In this case the trial court denied the defendant's motion for a change of the place of trial upon the ground that the place of residence of the defendant at the time of the commencement of the action was the county of Santa Cruz and not the city and county of San Francisco.

In our opinion the court erred in its conclusion. The affidavits filed by defendant and in his behalf stated positively that the defendant at the time the action was commenced was, and for many years prior thereto had been, a resident of the city and county of San Francisco, and that he has always during said times been registered as a voter in said city and county of San Francisco, and has never resided or been registered as a voter at any other place for the past 45 years. The only affidavit in opposition to the above is that of plaintiff's attorney, which states that for more than 20 years defendant has been the owner and in possession of a piece of real property situate in Santa Cruz county known as the "Aptos ranch"; that there is upon said ranch a dwelling house which, when occupied, is occupied by defendant and his family as a residence. "That said Spreckels remained and resided in and occupied said dwelling house on said ranch at the time of the commencement of this action, and at the time he was served with summons herein he was served with such summons at said dwelling house. That said defendant, at the time of making his affidavit of residence herein, made such affidavit while domiciled in said residence as aforesaid. * * * That for many years last past said Spreckels has been in the habit of frequently returning to said dwelling house in said county of Santa Cruz in seasons of repose." The above affidavit on behalf of plaintiff does not show, nor does it state, that defendant was not a resident of the city and county of San Francisco at the time the action was commenced. Neither does it state that he was a resident of the county of Santa Cruz. The purport of the affidavit is that the defendant was residing in the dwelling house on the ranch at the time the action was commenced. This is entirely consistent with the affidavit of defendant that among other properties he owns the Aptos ranch, and "that he has at various times sojourned on the same as a summer resort, but at no other times and for no other purposes."

Within the contemplation and meaning of the statute a person can have but one bona fide residence. Residence depends upon intention as well as fact; and in its ordinary acceptation it is the place where one remains when not called elsewhere on business, pleasure or for other temporary purpose. The mere inhabitancy of a summer home or country house at certain seasons of the year or at certain times would not make the party inhabiting said house a resident of the county in which such house is situated. The material question is the animo manendi. Although one may abide at times in a place for pleasure or health or repose it does not become his domicile unless it be his intention to remain there. The place of residence within the meaning of the statute is the fixed home of a party as understood by himself and his neighbors and friends. The affidavits show that the house of the defendant was in San Francisco.

Respondent's contention that the subsequent affidavit of merits filed by defendant was not properly filed and cannot be considered cannot be supported by the record. The certificate of the judge to the bill of exceptions shows that "defendant's further affidavit on motion for change of the place of trial, and further affidavit of merits, and the affidavits of Frank Harrold, W. W. Montague, and James D. Phelan, are copies of papers used on the hearing in this court of the motion of said defendant for a change of the place of trial of said action, and that said bill of exceptions contains all the papers used on the hearing of said motion in this court." Not only this, but the opinion of the trial judge, which appears in the record, denying the motion, shows that he placed his denial upon the ground that in his opinion there was sufficient evidence to show that defendant was a resident of the county of Santa Cruz within the meaning of the statute at the time the action was commenced.

The order is reversed.

We concur: KERRIGAN, J.; HALL, J.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; James M. Troutt, Judge.

Action by Rachel Jacobs against All Persons Interested, including Louis Jacobs and others. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant Jacobs and others appeal. Reversed and remanded.

Mastick & Partridge, for appellants. Tum Suden & Tum Suden, for respondent.

HALL, J. Plaintiff brought this action under the McEnerney act (St. 1906 [Extra Sess.] c. 59), so called, to quiet her title to a certain piece of real estate situate at the corner of Broderick and Sutter streets, in the city and county of San Francisco. Plaintiff alleged and claimed that she was the owner of the premises in suit in fee. The appellants appeared in the action, and, while admitting plaintiff to be the owner of the premises for and during her natural life, denied that she was the owner thereof in fee, and set up a claim of title in remainder in each of them to an undivided interest in said premises. In their several answers defendants set up their chain of title, in which they allege that on and prior to the 31st day of December, 1900, one Jacob Jacobs was the owner in fee simple of the premises in suit, and on said day made a deed of said property, by which he conveyed a life estate therein to plaintiff, and remainder therein, after the expiration of said life estate, to his three sons, Gustav Jacobs, Albert Jacobs, and Leopold Jacobs, from whom appellants in turn deraigned such title as they claim. The court found that on and prior to the 31st day of December, 1900, one Jacob Jacobs was the owner in fee simple of the premises in suit, and that he on that day, by a deed of grant, conveyed the same and the whole thereof to the plaintiff in fee simple, and that ever since said day she has been and now is the owner and entitled to the possession thereof in fee simple. Judgment was entered accordingly for plaintiff, and the three defendants who appeared, within 60 days after the rendition and entry thereof, appealed. Appellants attack the sufficiency of the evidence to support the finding upon which the judgment is predicated.

It seems to be conceded by both parties that on and prior to December 31, 1900, the property in suit was community property of Jacob Jacobs, who acquired it while the husband of plaintiff. On that day he executed the deed referred to in the findings, and subsequently, and before the beginning of this action, died. By the terms of the deed Jacob Jacobs, in consideration of love and affection, did "give, grant, alien and confirm unto the said party of the second part and to her heirs and assigns forever" certain described lands, including the premises in suit. "To have and to hold all and singular the said premises, together with the appurtenances, unto the said party of the second part, her heirs and assigns forever, in manner following, viz: To the said party of the second part during the remainder of her natural life, and upon and at the time of her death the title to all of said property shall pass to and be vested in Annie Newman, Leah Levy, Jennie Levy, Phoebe Jacobs, Gustav Jacobs, Albert Jacobs and Leopold Jacobs as her successors in interest in manner and subject to the restrictions as in their certain separate deeds to each made and executed by myself and the said party of the second part herein to them and to each of them." This deed was upon a printed form; the portion in italics being written. It was delivered to plaintiff. The deeds referred to in the deed to plaintiff were dated and signed by plaintiff and her husband, but were never delivered to the grantees named therein, but were always retained by plaintiff without delivery to any one. There are three of these deeds, each by its terms not to take effect until the death of both of the parents of the grantees therein, and each conveying a different portion of the premises described in the deed to plaintiff. (The seven "remaindermen" in the deed to plaintiff are children of plaintiff and Jacob Jacobs, now deceased.) In one of the undelivered deeds the three sons are named as grantees; in another two of the daughters are the grantees, and in the third the two other daughters are the grantees. The defendants Louis Jacobs and Alexander Jacobs are also children of plaintiff and Jacob Jacobs, now deceased, and all the appellants deraign whatever interest they have in the premises in suit from the three sons named as "remaindermen" in the deed to plaintiff.

The contention of respondent is that by the premises or granting clause of the deed to plaintiff a fee was conveyed to her; that the provision of the habendum clause, purporting to limit the estate granted to her to a life estate, is subsequent thereto and in conflict therewith, and is therefore of no effect; that the premises or granting clause must prevail over any inconsistent provision in the habendum clause. This view evidently was adopted by the trial court. Appellants' contention is that the entire deed must be read and construed together to arrive at the intention of the grantor; that so reading and construing the deed, it is clear that the grantor only intended to convey to the grantee, his wife, a life estate and no more.

Before taking up the discussion of the effect of the deed to plaintiff it is well to dispose of some matters discussed in the briefs as to the effect of the deeds signed by plaintiff and her husband. As to these deeds it is clear to us that they never became effectual as independent grants to transfer anything to the grantees named therein for want of delivery. Nevertheless they are parts of the deed under which plaintiff claims, and may be read as a part of such deed. A deed may refer to another document sufficiently identified with the same effect as if the document referred to was set forth in full in the deed. Burnett v. Piercy, 149 Cal. 179, 86 Pac. 603; Estate of Willey, 128 Cal. 1, 60 Pac. 471; Jackson v. Ireland, 3 Wend. (N. Y.) 99. In Burnett v. Piercy, supra, a trust deed referred to a deed then prepared to be executed by the trustee. The court said: "By this trust clause the deed to be executed by Crockett was referred to, and all its conditions and limitations were thereby incorporated into, and made parts of, the terms of the trust upon which Crockett held the land." In Jackson v. Ireland, supra, a deed conveyed land to the grantees to have and to hold "in the manner mentioned in the said last will and testament of Thomas Ireland, deceased." It was held that the estate granted by the deed must be determined by the terms of the will thus referred to. While we do not deem it very important to the determination of the case, it is clear to us that the three deeds referred to in the main deed must be considered as a part thereof. We now take up the matter as to what estate was conveyed to plaintiff by the deed from Jacob Jacobs.

It is very truly said in Eldridge v. See Yup Co., 17 Cal. 45, that: "Much curious learning is to be found in the books as to the effect of deeds, and many subtle and unsubstantial distinctions, and technical and arbitrary rules laid down touching their construction and operation." It is, however, the tendency of the courts in the later decisions to adopt such construction as will effectuate the manifest intention of the parties. The entire deed must be read to get at the intention of the grantor. Effect, if possible, must be given to the habendum clause, as well as to the granting clause. Effect must be given to both consistent with the evident purpose and intent of the grantor. The very purpose and object of the habendum clause is to limit, enlarge, and make clear the estate granted by the premises. "Whether a life estate or an estate in fee is conveyed must be determined by considering the deed as a whole." 2 Devlin on Deeds, § 858. In the deed under consideration the words in the habendum clause limiting the estate granted to plaintiff were written, and thus evidently selected with a special view to effectuate the purpose of the grantor. On the other hand, the words in the premises relied on by plaintiff are the printed words (with only the necessary blanks to be filled to indicate the sex and number of the grantees) usually found in the forms for gift deeds. The limitation to a life estate in the plaintiff is clear and distinct in the habendum clause. "A clear and distinct limitation in a grant is not controlled by other words less clear and distinct." Civ. Code, § 1067. Reading the deed in question as a whole, we cannot doubt that the grantor intended thereby to convey to his wife, the grantee, a life estate only, and that the deed should be given this effect and no more.

To construe this deed as conveying a fee simple to plaintiff in the face of the clear and distinct limitation to a life estate contained in the habendum clause would be to defeat the manifest intention of the grantor by the application of "subtle and unsubstantial distinctions, and technical and arbitrary rules." This should not be done. Faivre v. Daley, 93 Cal. 664, 29 Pac. 256.

A deed very similar to the one now under consideration was before the court in Barnett v. Barnett, 104 Cal. 298, 37 Pac. 1049. The grant was to the grantee "and to his heirs," while the habendum limited the estate to the grantee "for and during his natural life, and to the issue and heirs of the body of the said party of the second part." Notwithstanding the grant was to the grantee "and to his heirs," the court found no difficulty in giving full effect to the limitation to a life estate in the habendum clause. True, in the Barnett Case the words "and assigns forever" were struck out of the printed form, while they were not in this, but such words add nothing to the effect of the other words not struck from the granting clause. Indeed, as is clearly pointed out in the Barnett Case, the use of the word "heirs" in the granting clause of a deed is not necessary to the conveyance of a fee. Under the statutes of this state the use of the word "heirs" is quite unnecessary to the grant of a fee. Its use adds nothing to the legal effect of a grant to a named grantee. The rules to be followed in construing a deed are very clearly laid down in Barnett v. Barnett, supra. What was there said is entirely pertinent to the facts of this case. The court in part said: "The intention of the parties to the grant is to be gathered from the instrument itself, and determined by a proper construction of the language used therein, but for the purpose of ascertaining this intention the entire instrument, the habendum as well as the premises, are to be considered; and, if it appear from such consideration that the grantor intended by the habendum clause to restrict or limit or enlarge the estate named in the granting clause, the habendum will prevail over the granting clause. * * * 'It is in such case to be considered as an addendum or proviso to the conveyancing clause, which by a well-settled rule of construction must control the conveyancing clause or premises, even to the extent of destroying the effect of the same.' Bodine v. Arthur, 91 Ky. 53 [14 S. W. 904] 34 Am. St. Rep. 162." To the same effect is Burnett v. Piercy, 149 Cal. 179, 86 Pac. 603. In this case John C. Piercy and his wife, Mary, conveyed in trust to Crockett to convey, by deeds already prepared to be executed by Crockett. By this deed Crockett conveyed certain property to "Mary Piercy, her heirs and assigns." It is manifest that by this granting clause an estate in fee as clearly appeared to be conveyed as such estate appears to be conveyed in the case at bar, yet the court had no difficulty in construing subsequent provisions in the deed as limiting the estate conveyed to a life estate. These limitations were not nearly so express as in the case at bar. To the same effect is Pavkovich v. S. P. R. R. Co., 150 Cal. 39, 87 Pac. 1097, where the court said: "The doctrine that where the habendum, or other subsequent clause is repugnant to the premises, the premises must prevail applies only where the two are irreconcilable. And it does not apply where it appears from the whole conveyance, or from the language of the subsequent clause, that the grantor intended thereby to qualify the granting clause, or where the grantee will receive an estate of value even if the granting clause be modified as may be necessary to give effect to all parts of the deed."

In other jurisdictions we find that the courts have not hesitated to give controlling effect to the habendum clause in deeds similar to the one in the case at bar. In Henderson v. Mack, 82 Ky. 379, the granting clause was to the grantee, "his heirs and assigns," and the habendum was: "To have and to hold the same, with all the appurtenances thereof, to the second party, his heirs and assigns forever, with covenant of general warranty, during his natural life, and after his death to go to and belong absolutely to Belle Mack, she paying the unpaid purchase money as aforesaid." It was held that the grantee, the party of the second part, took a life estate with remainder in fee to Belle Mack. In all essential particulars, indeed, the case just cited was identical with the deed in the case at bar, even to repeating in the habendum clause "to the second party, his heirs and assigns, forever." In Carson v. McCaslin, 60 Ind. 335, the granting clause was to "Hervey McCaslin, and his heirs and assigns forever," and the habendum was, "To be held by the said Hervey McCaslin for and during his natural life," with contingent remainder to his wife if she survive him. She did survive him, and it was held that Hervey McCaslin took a life estate only, with remainder to his wife. In Caldwell v. Hammons, 40 Ga. 342, the grant (in consideration of marriage) was to Martha Gray, "and to her heirs and assigns," of a described tract of land, "to hold the same during her lifetime, and then to revert to my heirs, both of her and my former wife." The grantor died without issue of Martha, but leaving issue by his former wife. In an action for waste against the grantee, brought by the heirs at law of the grantor, it was held that Martha Gray took a life estate only. This case was decided under the Georgia Code of 1861, § 2656, which is as follows: "If two clauses in a deed be utterly inconsistent, the former must prevail, but the intention of the parties from the whole instrument should, if possible, be ascertained and carried into effect." This section of the Georgia Code is but an epitome of the Code law of this state, including section 1070, Civ. Code, and the correlated sections dealing with the interpretation of contracts, which are made applicable to the interpretation of grants by section 1066, Civ. Code.

It is clear that plaintiff did not take a fee simple by the deed from her husband, but a life estate only, and that under the evidence she is not the owner of the whole of the property in suit in fee simple. Neither did plaintiff acquire any title by adverse possession. The possession of a life tenant is not adverse to the interest of the remaindermen or reversioner. 1 Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law, 807. For the reasons above set forth the finding to the effect that Jacob Jacobs conveyed the premises described in the complaint to Rachel Jacobs, the plaintiff, and that she has been ever since, and now is, the owner thereof in fee simple, is not sustained by the evidence.

We have discussed the case without regard to the possible effect of section 172, Civ. Code, as amended in 1891 (St. 1891, c. 220), upon the right of a husband, without the written consent of his wife, to make a gift in remainder of any portion of the community property, for though it does not expressly appear from the record that the property in suit was acquired by the husband prior to such amendment, counsel upon both sides seem to have treated the case as though such were the fact. The right of a husband to make a gift of such community property not intended as a fraud upon his wife is established by Spreckels v. Spreckels, 116 Cal. 339, 48 Pac. 228, 36 L. R. A. 497, 58 Am. St. Rep. 170.

The judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded for further proceedings.

SMITH v. SUPREME LODGE A. O. U. W.

(Civ. 709.)

(Court of Appeal, First District, California. Dec. 16, 1909.)

1. JUDGMENT (§ 17*)—PROCESS TO SUPPORT—PUBLICATION OF SUMMONS—ATTACHMENT.

Where defendant, a nonresident, was served with summons by publication and mailing, and no writ of attachment issued, a judgment taken by default was void for want of jurisdiction in the court over the person of defendant, since the court had no jurisdiction to proceed until it had brought under its jurisdiction property belonging to defendant within the state.

2. JUDGMENT (§ 135*) — MOTION TO VACATE JUDGMENT.

Where a default judgment had been rendered against a nonresident served with summons by publication and without writ of attachment, a motion to vacate the judgment was the proper remedy.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Judgment, Cent. Dig. §§ 246, 247; Dec. Dig. § 135.*]

3. JUDGMENT (§ 164*)—OPENING DEFAULT—RELIEF AWARDED—QUASHING SERVICE.

The court, on vacating a personal judgment by default, based on service by publication and mailing, without attachment of property, properly refused to set aside and quash the service of summons, since, the service of summons and the issuance and levy of attachment being independent proceedings, plaintiff may supplement his process by attachment.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Judgment, Cent. Dig. § 324; Dec. Dig. § 164.*]

4. ATTACHMENT (§ 143*) — NONRESIDENT DEFENDANTS — ALLOWANCE AFTER VACATED JUDGMENT.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 537, which provides that a plaintiff may attach property of the defendant as security for any judgment recovered when the defendant is a nonresident, etc., after a judgment had been vacated and set aside because no attachment had issued, and the court was without jurisdiction, the plaintiff could still procure the issuance and levy of a writ of attachment.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Attachment, Cent. Dig. § 395; Dec. Dig. § 143.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; George A. Sturtevant, Judge.

Action by Mary Jane Smith against the Supreme Lodge Ancient Order of United Workmen. From an order denying a motion to set aside and vacate the judgment and to vacate and quash the service of summons, defendant appeals. Reversed, with directions to vacate and set aside the judgment, and affirmed as to the order denying the motion to quash the service of summons.

D. S. Hirshberg, for appellant. Wilson T. Hume, for respondent.

HALL, J. Plaintiff brought this action to recover the sum of $2,000, upon the death of her husband, Michael H. Smith, in accordance with the terms of a certificate issued to said Michael, by defendant, through a subordinate lodge located at Gold Hill, in the state of Nevada. The only service of summons was by publication and mailing. The affidavit for the order showed defendant to be a foreign corporation, with its principal place of business in the state of Pennsylvania, and without any managing or business agent, cashier, or secretary within the state of California, and without any appointed agent or person upon whom service of summons could be had within said state. There was no writ of attachment issued, and of course no seizure or attachment of any property of defendant. Plaintiff, however, took judgment by default on the 27th day of July, 1908, against defendant for the sum of $2,000. Thereafter, on the 16th day of October, 1908, defendant, appearing only for the purpose of its motion, gave notice of its intention to move the court to set aside and vacate the judgment, and to vacate and quash the service of summons. This motion was denied, and thereupon defendant appealed from such order. It was proven without conflict upon the hearing of the motion that defendant was not doing business in the state of California, and had not done any for 20 years last past. The contention of appellant is that, in the absence of any attachment or seizure of property of defendant within this state, the court obtained no jurisdiction in a purely personal action to render a personal judgment against a defendant not within the state, by service of summons by publication and mailing a copy to defendant addressed to its residence in another state.

This contention is sound. That a judgment so obtained in such a case is void for want of jurisdiction in the court over the person of defendant is the doctrine laid down in the much-cited and leading case of Pennoyer v. Neff, 95 U. S. 714, 24 L. Ed. 565. Notwithstanding the publication of summons, jurisdiction to proceed is not obtained until the court has brought under its jurisdiction, by attachment or other proper procedure, property belonging to the defendant within the state. This is the rule established not only in Pennoyer v. Neff, supra, but also in several cases decided in this state. Belcher v. Chambers, 53 Cal. 635; Anderson v. Goff, 72 Cal. 65, 13 Pac. 73, 1 Am. St. Rep. 34; Brown v. Campbell, 100 Cal. 635, 35 Pac. 433, 38 Am. St. Rep. 314; De la Montanya v. De la Montanya, 112 Cal. 101, 44 Pac. 345, 32 L. R. A. 82, 53 Am. St. Rep. 165; Eureka, etc., Co. v. California Ins. Co., 130 Cal. 153, 62 Pac. 393; Johnson v. Miner, 144 Cal. 785, 78 Pac. 240; First National Bank, etc., v. Eastman, 144 Cal. 487, 77 Pac. 1043, 103 Am. St. Rep. 95; Jameson v. Simonds Saw Co., 2 Cal. App. 582, 84 Pac. 289.

The issuance and levy of the writ of attachment is an essential step to be taken before jurisdiction is acquired to render any judgment at all. And when jurisdiction is thus acquired the judgment can only be enforced against property previously attached. See cases above cited. That a motion to vacate the judgment is the proper remedy is established by De la Montanya v. De la Montanya, supra. The court should have granted defendant's motion to the extent of vacating and setting aside the judgment.

The action of the court, however, was right in refusing to set aside and quash the service of summons. The service of summons and the issuance and levy of an attachment are both requisite to confer jurisdiction, but "the proceeding for the publication of summons is distinct and separate from the proceeding in attachment. The judgment against a nonresident is dependent upon both these proceedings, but neither of the proceedings is dependent upon the other." Johnson v. Miner, 144 Cal. 785, 78 Pac. 240.

The judgment being vacated and set aside, the plaintiff, if so advised, may yet procure the issuance and levy of a writ of attachment (Code Civ. Proc. § 537), provided property can be found upon which to make such levy.

The order appealed from is reversed, and the court directed to enter an order vacating and setting aside the default of defendant and the judgment entered thereon, but denying its motion to quash the service of summons.

PEOPLE v. LEAVENS. (Cr. 198.)

(Court of Appeal, First District, California. Dec. 15, 1909.)

1. False Pretenses (§ 8*)—Elements of Offense—Evidence.

To justify a conviction of obtaining money by false pretenses by the sale of fraudulent certificates of stock represented by accused to be owned by him, the prosecution must prove that accused obtained the money on the representation that he was the owner of the stock which he sold, and that such representation was false.

2. Criminal Law (§ 511*)—Accomplice—Evidence—Sufficiency.

On a trial for obtaining money by false pretenses by the sale of fraudulent certificates of stock which accused represented that he owned, the bookkeeper of the corporation testified that he and accused conspired to procure the issuance of the fraudulent certificates, and that accused should sell them and divide the proceeds; that the certificates were issued in the name of a third person; that accused indorsed the third person's name on the back of the certificates; and that there was no consideration paid for the issue of the certificates. The buyer of the certificates and his clerk testified that accused obtained the money from the buyer by representing himself to be the owner of the stock, and gave a fictitious name, which he signed to the certificates, etc. Held, that the testimony of the bookkeeper, who was an accomplice, was sufficiently corroborated to justify a conviction within Pen. Code, § 1111, providing that a conviction cannot be had on the testimony of an accomplice unless he is corroborated by other evidence tending to connect accused with the commission of the offense.

3. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 508*)—TESTIMONY OF ACCOMPLICE.

The actual commission of an offense may be established by the evidence of an accomplice.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 1111; Dec. Dig. § 508.*]

4. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 511*)—TESTIMONY OF ACCOMPLICE—CORROBORATION.

Under Pen. Code, § 1111, providing that a conviction cannot be had on the testimony of an accomplice, unless he is corroborated by other evidence tending to connect accused with the commission of the offense, evidence outside of that of the accomplice need not be sufficient to establish the guilt of accused, but it must in some way tend to implicate and connect him with the crime.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 1127-1137; Dec. Dig. § 511.*]

5. CRIMINAL LAW (§§ 543, 1153*)—APPEAL—ADMISSION OF DEPOSITIONS TAKEN AT PRELIMINARY EXAMINATION — DISCRETION OF COURT.

In admitting in evidence on the trial the deposition of a witness taken at the preliminary examination, on the ground that the witness could not be found within the state, much is left to the discretion of the trial court, based on the facts, and its ruling will not be disturbed unless the discretion has been abused.

6. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1169*)—HARMLESS ERROR—ERRONEOUS ADMISSION OF EVIDENCE.

Where there was sufficient evidence of the nonresidence of a witness, whose deposition was taken at the preliminary examination, to justify the court in admitting the deposition in evidence on the trial, regardless of telegrams sent to the witness and his answer thereto, the error in admitting the telegrams, because hearsay, was not prejudicial.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 3137-3143; Dec. Dig. § 1169.*]

7. FALSE PRETENSES (§ 38*)—INFORMATION—EVIDENCE—VARIANCE.

There is no variance between the allegation in an information for false pretenses that accused procured money from prosecutor and the proof that he procured money by means of a check which prosecutor drew.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see False Pretenses, Cent. Dig. §§ 50-53; Dec. Dig. § 38.*]

8. FALSE PRETENSES (§ 38*)—INFORMATION—EVIDENCE—SUFFICIENCY.

Where the information for false pretenses charged that the money procured by accused was the property of two persons, and that accused intended to defraud both, evidence that the money was the property of one of the two, and that the intent was to defraud him, was sufficient.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see False Pretenses, Cent. Dig. §§ 50-53; Dec. Dig. § 38.*]

9. FALSE PRETENSES (§ 39*) — FRAUDULENT INTENT—EVIDENCE.

A fraudulent intent in false pretenses may be presumed from the proof of the fraudulent acts or pretenses made by accused with knowledge of their falsity.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Frank J. Murasky, Judge.

M. B. Leavens was convicted of false pretenses, and he appeals. Affirmed.

D. S. Truman, for appellant. Attorney General Webb, for the People.

COOPER, P. J. The defendant was charged in the information with the crime of obtaining $1,442.75 in lawful money of the United States from one Norwood on the 6th day of February, 1909, knowingly, designedly, and by falsely and fraudulently representing to said Norwood that he, the defendant, was then and there the owner of $5,000 of the capital stock of the Sandstorm Mining Company, a corporation organized under the laws of the state of South Dakota and doing business in the state of Nevada. The jury returned a verdict of guilty as charged, whereupon judgment was entered to the effect that defendant be imprisoned in the state prison at San Quentin for the term of 18 months. He made a motion for a new trial, which was denied, and this appeal is from the judgment and the order.

It is not claimed that there is an insufficiency of evidence in the record to sustain the verdict, but it is contended—and is the main contention here—that there is not sufficient evidence outside of the evidence of one Chaney, an accomplice, to justify the verdict. The evidence of Chaney is to the effect that in February, 1908, he was the bookkeeper of the corporation, and resided in the town of Goldfield, in the state of Nevada, where the corporation was doing business, to wit, mining, and that the defendant also lived in the said town; that he and defendant entered into an agreement, or conspiracy, whereby he, as such clerk or bookkeeper, was to take up canceled certificates of stock of said corporation to the amount of $5,000, and issue new certificates in lieu thereof, and by certain false statements to procure the signatures of the president and of the secretary of the corporation to said fraudulent certificates, and then affix the seal of the corporation thereto; that defendant should then take these said fraudulent certificates to San Francisco and sell the same, the proceeds to be divided equally between the two; that the witness did procure the issuance of said certificates for 5,000 shares of said stock, and procured the names of the president and of the secretary thereto, and when so issued affixed the seal of the corporation in the proper place; that at the suggestion of the defendant the stock was issued in the name of J. C. Culver, and that defendant indorsed the name of J. C. Culver on the back of the certificates; that witness did not know any one by the name of J. C. Culver; that there was no consideration paid for said certificates, and that they were issued without the knowledge or consent of the board of directors, the president, or any officer of the corporation. The said certificates were then delivered to defendant, and he immediately left for San Francisco.

It appears from the evidence of Norwood, who was a stockbroker doing business in San Francisco, and of Simpson, his clerk, in effect that about February 6, 1908, the defendant came into the office of Norwood, and desired to sell the stock, introducing himself under the fictitious name of Stewart; that Norwood asked defendant how he came by the stock, and defendant replied as follows: "He said he had a 5,000-share certificate that he had bought when the stock was low, and had sent it up to a friend of his, a Mr. Culver, to have it cut up into 1,000-share pieces so that he could sell it more easily. Mr. Culver for some reason had put it in his own name, and indorsed it and sent it down to him. * * * I asked him if he knew this was Mr. Culver's signature, and he said he did. I asked him if he was ready to witness it, and he said he was, and he signed it in my presence and the presence of Mr. Simpson 'A. F. Stewart.' * * * I asked him if he knew Mr. Culver's signature and would witness it, and he said he did and would witness it, and thereupon signed the five certificates. * * * Defendant wrote the signature 'A. F. Stewart,' which appears on the back of the check in my presence, and at the time I gave him the check the words 'sig. O. K.' were placed there in my presence by my clerk, Mr. Simpson. This was done at Mr. Leavens' request. He said he was unacquainted, and wanted to know how he could get his money for the check." The witness further testified that he gave the defendant a check for $1,442.75 on the Bank of British North America, where his bank account was kept; that this check was made payable to "A. F. Stewart," and indorsed by defendant "A. F. Stewart," and was paid by the bank and charged to the account of Norwood; that he believed and relied on the representations of defendant that he was the owner of the stock; that his name was A. F. Stewart, and, acting upon such belief, he paid the defendant for the stock; that he subsequently bought other stock which was genuine, and delivered such genuine stock to his customer in lieu of the stock purchased of defendant.

The record fails to show why Norwood purchased other stock, or by what means he knew or discovered that defendant was not the real owner of the 5,000 shares which he had purchased from defendant. In fact there is no evidence that defendant was not the owner of the 5,000 shares at the time he sold them to Norwood, except the evidence of Chaney, the accomplice, as hereinbefore stated. It seems that the district attorney or prosecuting officer might easily have procured other testimony if it existed to show that the stock was not issued by the authority of the corporation, or that it was fraudulent; but we must take the record as we find it, and determine whether or not the evidence other than the evidence of the accomplice tends to connect the defendant with the commission of the offense charged.

Our Code (Pen. Code, § 1111) provides: "A conviction cannot be had on the testimony of an accomplice unless he is corroborated by other evidence which in itself, without the aid of the testimony of the accomplice, tends to connect the defendant with the commission of the offense; and the corroboration is not sufficient if it merely shows the commission of the offense or the circumstances thereof."

The crime charged here is obtaining money by false pretenses. It was necessary for the prosecution to prove that defendant obtained the money, and not only that he obtained the money, but that he obtained it upon the representation that he was the owner of the stock which he sold to Norwood, and that such representation as to his ownership was false. The evidence of Norwood and of his clerk Simpson clearly shows that defendant obtained the money from Norwood; that he obtained it by representing himself to be the owner of the stock. He further represented and stated that his name was Stewart, and signed such name to each of the five certificates of stock. He had the stock in his possession purporting to be indorsed by J. C. Culver. The accomplice Chaney in his testimony said that he delivered the stock to defendant, and that defendant indorsed the name of Culver on the certificates. It was part of the plan and a part of the conspiracy that defendant should come to San Francisco and dispose of the stock. Now it is evident from the very inception of the general plan that money was to be obtained from some one by a false representation. It began in Goldfield, Nev., by Chaney willfully procuring the certificates from the corporation, with the consent and acquiescence of the defendant. The name of Culver was used at the suggestion of defendant. The defendant indorsed the name of Culver on the back of the certificates. He came to San Francisco as a part of the plan to dispose of the stock. The crime was commenced in Nevada, and every step from the first conversation between defendant and the accomplice up to the final act of obtaining the money was tainted with fraud. Every act, no matter whether performed by Chaney or by defendant, was in furtherance of the common design and in aid of the common purpose. The fact that defendant had the stock in his possession tended to connect him with the crime. The fact that he wrote the name of Stewart instead of his true name tended to connect him with the crime. Honest men do not introduce themselves under an alias and sign fictitious names to muniments of title to property. There is not a word to contradict the evidence of Chaney as to why the certificates of stock were purloined. The transactions which followed, as narrated by Norwood and his clerk, tend to connect the defendant with the commission of the offense. The actual commission of an offense may be established by the evidence of the accomplice, but the law, in order to protect innocent men from being convicted, provides that the evidence of the accomplice alone shall not be sufficient to justify a conviction, but that there must be other independent evidence which "tends to connect the defendant with the commission of the offense." The evidence outside of that of the accomplice need not be sufficient to establish the guilt of the defendant, but it must in some way tend to implicate the defendant and connect him with the transaction and with the crime. This is sufficient. People v. Ames, 39 Cal. 404; People v. Kunz, 73 Cal. 313, 14 Pac. 836; People v. Barker, 114 Cal. 617, 46 Pac. 601; People v. Bunkers, 2 Cal. App. 197, 84 Pac. 364, 370.

It is next claimed that the court erred in admitting in evidence the deposition of Chaney taken at the preliminary examination, for the reason that it was not made to appear that he could not with due diligence be found within the state and produced at the trial. The evidence shows without conflict that Chaney was not a resident of the state; that he was not present at the trial; that he could not be found or had not been found at his former address in Oakland. In such case much is left to the discretion of the trial court, based upon all the facts and circumstances, and it is only in case of an abuse of such discretion that this court would be justified in reversing a criminal case where the judgment was otherwise correct. People v. Witty, 138 Cal. 576, 72 Pac. 177; Renton v. Monnier, 77 Cal. 450, 19 Pac. 820; People v. Melendrez, 4 Cal. App. 399, 88 Pac. 372. Conceding that the telegram sent to Chaney at Kansas City, Mo., and his answer thereto were hearsay, and not admissible as preliminary to the introduction of the deposition, the error was harmless. There was sufficient evidence as to the residence of Chaney without the state, and the fact of his not being present, to justify the court's action in admitting the deposition regardless of the telegram.

There is no variance between the allegations of the information and the proof. The allegation is that the defendant procured money from Norwood, and the proof is that he did procure money, but it was procured by the means or use of a check or written request which Norwood made upon the bank for the payment of the money. There may be a difference between getting money directly by handing the coin over in hand and giving a request in writing to a third party who complies with the request and hands it over, but the effect is the same, and the distinction is highly technical. An appeal that depends upon such question for reversal is devoid of merit. The defendant obtained the money, and obtained it from Norwood, no matter what means were used in finally conveying the money from Norwood to the defendant. People v. Whalen, 154 Cal. 472, 98 Pac. 194.

Nor is there any merit in the contention that the evidence does not show that the money obtained was the property of the Sandstorm Mining Company. The information states that the money was the property of Norwood and of the Sandstorm Mining Company, and that the intent was to cheat and defraud both; but it was sufficient to prove that the money was the property of one of the parties named, to wit, of Norwood, and that the intent was to cheat and defraud Norwood. People v. Hines, 5 Cal. App. 122, 89 Pac. 858; People v. Gibbs, 98 Cal. 664, 33 Pac. 630.

It is claimed that the court erred in refusing the defendant's requested instruction numbered 1, which reads as follows: "The jury is instructed that in this case, as in case of all other crimes, the burden of proving every element of the crime beyond a reasonable doubt is on the state, and that a fraudulent intent is not to be presumed by you on the part of the defendant in this case if you should find that this defendant did make to H. H. Norwood false pretenses as alleged in the information here, and even if you should find that at the time the defendant knew such pretense or pretenses to be false and untrue." The instruction is to the effect that a fraudulent intent cannot be presumed or inferred upon proof of fraudulent acts or pretenses, the party making such pretenses knowing them to be untrue. If a fraudulent intent cannot be presumed or inferred from such proof, it is difficult to understand how it can be proved. The intent was to be presumed from the facts, and it would be difficult to understand how the intent could be proven in any other way except by proving the facts which would raise a reasonable inference as to the intent.

Other instructions are complained of, but the objections to them are equally devoid of merit. The defendant appears to have had a fair trial, and the instructions of the court as given were full and clear, and covered all the material issues in the case.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

THORPE v. NORTH MONETA GARDEN LANDS WATER CO. et al. (Civ. 716.)

(Court of Appeal, Second District, California. Dec. 15, 1909.)

1. Appeal and Error (§ 78*)—Final Judgment—Denial of Application of Intervention.

An order denying an application of intervention is final as to the intervener, and justifies an appeal without waiting for judgment between the other parties.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 464; Dec. Dig. § 78.*]

2. Appeal and Error (§ 151*)—Party Aggrieved.

One denied the right to intervene in an action is not aggrieved by the judgment in the action, and his appeal therefrom will be dismissed.

3. Appeal and Error (§ 1011*)—Findings—Conclusiveness.

It is the province of the trial judge to determine the weight of conflicting evidence, and his findings thereon will not be disturbed on appeal.

4. Appeal and Error (§ 1048*) — Harmless Error—Cross-Examination.

The exclusion of questions objectionable as not constituting proper cross-examination is not reversible error.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 4145; Dec. Dig. § 1048.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; N. P. Conrey, Judge.

Action by Spencer G. Thorpe against the North Moneta Garden Lands Water Company, in which John G. Orth applied for leave to file a complaint in intervention. From a judgment for plaintiff against defendant, defendant and John G. Orth appeal. Appeal of John G. Orth dismissed, and judgment affirmed.

H. T. Gordon and Harris & Swanwick, for appellants. Herbert J. Goudge and C. L. Chandler, for respondent.

SHAW, J. Plaintiff as indorsee thereof brought suit to recover from defendant upon a promissory note described in the complaint and alleged to have been made and delivered by defendant to one W. J. Williams. By a second count it was alleged that on August 22, 1906, defendant was indebted to W. J. Williams in the sum of $4,073.85 for money loaned to defendant, which defendant agreed to pay on or before one year thereafter, with interest at 7 per cent. per annum until paid, compounded half yearly, which indebtedness, it was alleged, had been assigned to plaintiff. Defendant filed its answer, denying all the allegations of the complaint, except the alleged incorporation of defendant and an intermediate indorser of said note. At the trial the issues thus joined were found in favor of plaintiff and judgment was rendered against defendant, from which, and an order denying defendant's motion for a new trial, defendant appeals.

The record also contains what purports to be an appeal by John G. Orth from this judgment so rendered against defendant. Orth's purported appeal is based upon the ground that, prior to the trial, he applied to the court for an order making him and said Williams, to whom the note was made, parties to the action, and permitting Orth to file a complaint in intervention. At the hearing of the motion the court made an order denying the application; "and Orth," says his counsel, "prosecutes this appeal from the judgment for the purpose of reviewing the action of the court in denying his right to intervene." So far as disclosed by the record, Orth is a stranger to the action, and his rights are in no wise affected by the judgment against the defendant. The order denying his application was, in effect, a final judgment as to him and his right to be heard at all. Upon the making of the order he was entitled to an immediate appeal therefrom, free and unhampered by the subsequent proceedings in the action or final judgment rendered against the defendant. Dollenmayer v. Pryor, 150 Cal. 1, 87 Pac. 616; People v. Pfeiffer, 59 Cal. 90; Donner v. Palmer, 45 Cal. 180; State v. Parish Judge, 27 La. Ann. 184. We are fully aware that a contrary view was held in the case of Wenborn v. Boston, 23 Cal. 321, but, as said by Mr. Justice Shaw in the first case above cited, that decision must be regarded as overruled by these later cases. Orth is not a party aggrieved by the judgment against defendant, and his purported appeal therefrom is dismissed.

The appellant North Moneta Garden Lands Water Company contends for a reversal upon the ground that the finding of the court to the effect that defendant made and delivered the promissory note to Williams, as alleged in the complaint, the consideration thereof, as found by the court, being an indebtedness of the corporation due to said Williams in the sum of $4,073.85 for money advanced and loaned to defendant by Williams, is unsupported by the evidence. There is no merit whatever in this point. The evidence in support of the finding is clear and positive. The most that can be said is that there is a substantial conflict of evidence upon the issue. Where such conflict exists, it is, as has been so often stated, the peculiar province of the trial judge to determine the weight and credibility to be accorded to such conflicting testimony. "It is not for an appellate court to intimate as to the truth or falsity of any of the evidence." Anglo-Californian Bank v. Cerf, 147 Cal. 396, 81 Pac. 1081. Hence the extended argument of counsel for appellant, wherein they attack the evidence offered on behalf of plaintiff in an endeavor to show that it should be discredited, is an idle, though laborious, effort.

We perceive no error in the rulings of the court in excluding certain questions asked witness Williams on cross-examination. These questions relate to transactions in the corporate stock of defendant had between Williams and Orth. Appellant fails to point out wherein the evidence sought to be elicited thereby could, under any theory of the case, be relevant or material. Moreover, they were objectionable as not constituting proper cross-examination.

Judgment and order affirmed.

CRITTENDEN et al. v. SAN FRANCISCO SAVINGS UNION et al. (L. A. 2,329.)

(Supreme Court of California. Jan. 22, 1910.)

1. Costs (§ 244*)—Costs on Appeal—Modification of Judgment — Necessity of Award.

Under Supreme Court rule 23 (144 Cal. xlix, 78 Pac. xi), providing that, "in all cases in which the judgment or order appealed from is reversed or modified and the order of reversal or modification contains no directions as to the costs of the appeal, the clerk will enter * * * a judgment that appellant recover the costs of appeal," appellant who succeeds in having the judgment modified is entitled to costs of the appeal, though the order of the court fails to so state.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Costs, Cent. Dig. § 941; Dec. Dig. § 244.*]

2. Costs (§ 244*)—Costs on Appeal—Effect of Failure to Mention Costs.

Where under such rule two judgments were involved in the appeal, and only one is modified, and the order is silent as to costs, appellant is entitled to costs only as to the judgment modified.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Costs, Cent. Dig. § 941; Dec. Dig. § 244.*]

3. Costs (§ 244*) — Costs on Appeal — Construction of Award.

Though the subject-matter of the action was transferred by appellant after appeal taken and brief filed and he appeared no more in the case, it cannot be said that the word "appellant" in the judgment of remittitur in relation to costs referred to the transferee rather than to the original appellant.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Barbara County; Samuel E. Crow, Judge.

Action by James L. Crittenden and another against the San Francisco Savings Union and others. From an order striking from the files memoranda of costs, plaintiffs appeal. Reversed, with directions.

Richards & Carrier and James L. Crittenden, for appellants. Canfield & Starbuck, for respondents.

SHAW, J. In the action of Kate M. Bell and James L. Crittenden v. San Francisco Savings Union et al., the defendant, San Francisco Savings Union, upon a cross-complaint, obtained judgment for the foreclosure and sale of the land which was the subject of the suit for the purpose of paying a large sum of money to the San Francisco Savings Union out of the proceeds thereof. Teresa Bell moved for a new trial. So also did Crittenden and the oil company. These motions were denied. Crittenden and the oil company appealed from the judgment. Teresa Bell also appealed from parts of the judgment, and both of said appeals were presented in one transcript numbered L. A. 1,913, filed in this court on May 17, 1906. Crittenden and the oil company also appealed from the order denying their motion for a new trial, and so also did Teresa Bell, the two appeals last mentioned being embodied in one transcript numbered L. A. 1,927, filed in this court on June 18, 1906. In this court these appeals were all submitted together and the opinion disposing of them is reported in the 153d volume of California Reports at pages 64 to 77, 94 Pac. 225.

The conclusion of that opinion is as follows: "The order denying both motions for a new trial is affirmed. The cause is remanded to the lower court, with directions to modify the judgment by deducting from the amount directed to be paid to the San Francisco Savings Union the sum of $16,679.85, and, as so modified, the judgment will stand affirmed." Nothing was said in the opinion, or in the order of modification, concerning the costs of appeal. The appeals from the judgment, embraced in case No. 1,913, was therefore governed by rule 23 of this court providing that: "In all cases in which the judgment or order appealed from is reversed or modified, and the order of reversal or modification contains no directions as to the costs of appeal, the clerk will enter upon the record, and insert in the remittitur, a judgment that the appellant recover the costs of appeal." 144 Cal. xlix, 78 Pac. xi. In the attempt to obey this rule the clerk entered upon the record and inserted in the remittitur in each case, 1,927 as well as 1,913, a judgment that the appellant recover costs of appeal. This, of course, is to be construed as including the plural and to give costs to all the appellants. In accordance with these two judgments of the Supreme Court, the two appellants filed in the court below two memoranda of costs on appeal under section 1034, Code Civ. Proc., one for $256.85 as the costs in case No. 1,913, the other for $1,168.30 as the costs in case No. 1,927. The court on the respondents' motion struck both of said memoranda from the files, and from this order the present appeal is taken.

The orders denying a new trial were the only orders presented for review on the appeals embraced in case No. 1,927, being the appeals from the order denying the motions for a new trial. That order having been affirmed, the appellants were not entitled to the costs of those appeals. The appeals from the judgment were embraced in No. 1,913 and under the rule aforesaid, upon the modification of the judgment, the appellants were entitled to the costs upon that appeal. Teresa Bell filed no memorandum of costs in either case, and her rights and the particulars of her appeal are not involved. The appeal of Crittenden and the oil company from the judgment was taken more than 60 days after the rendition of the judgment, and hence they could present for review upon that appeal the judgment roll alone.

Under these circumstances, the clerk had no authority or power to enter the judgment in favor of the appellant for costs in case No. 1,927. No order having been made by this court, except that manifested by the aforesaid rule, his power was limited by the rule which authorized him to enter the judgment for costs only in case No. 1,913, the appeals from the judgment alone. If this clerical error had been called to the attention of the court, the unauthorized judgment would doubtless have been vacated. Now that it is called to our attention an order to that effect will be made. The order, striking from the files the memoranda of costs on appeal No. 1,927 from the order denying a new trial, while erroneous upon the record as it stood at that time, was not a legal injury to the appellants, for the judgment then appearing to have been given in that case was itself unauthorized. This error alone would be insufficient to justify a reversal of the order. The appellants were, however, entitled to the costs of appeal from the judgment and it was error to strike that memorandum of the costs in case No. 1,913, from the files.

The respondent upon the hearing in the court below filed an affidavit showing that, after the taking of the appeals and filing of the transcript in No. 1,913, all the interest of Crittenden and the oil company in the lands involved in the action were sold in pursuance of the judgment appealed from to Teresa Bell as administratrix of the estate of Thomas Bell, deceased, and that a deed was made to her in pursuance of said sale on April 8, 1907. At the latter date the appellants' brief had been filed but the appeal had not been called for hearing in the Supreme Court. The appellants, Crittenden and the oil company, filed no reply brief, and did not appear in this court at the time of the hearing. Upon this it is contended by the respondent here that those appellants have no right to recover the costs in case No. 1,913. The argument is that, as they had no interest in the property at the time the appeals were argued or at the time the opinion was filed, the word "appellants" in the opinion and in the judgment and remittitur must be construed as applying only to the person or persons who at that time were interested in and were prosecuting the appeals; that is, to Teresa Bell alone. They further say a transfer by a party to an action of his interest in the subject-matter thereof carries to and vests in the transferror all interest in the costs theretofore incurred, and hence that these appellants have no right to such costs.

We do not think the manner in which the appeals were presented and the time at which the sale of the interest took place would justify the construction of the word "appellant" contended for by the respondents. As to the other point, it does not appear that there was any substitution of parties, and there is nothing to show that the right to those costs was transferred to Teresa Bell, or that these appellants abandoned the appeal. They may have been content to submit it upon their opening brief. Where a transferee pending a suit permits it to be prosecuted in the name of the original parties, there is no rule of law that prevents those parties from recovering costs of suit. That is a matter of contract between the two with which the adverse party has no concern. Furthermore, the judgment of this court as to the costs in 1,913 is still in force, and it is binding upon the superior court and upon the parties to the action.

This conclusion, of course, does not prevent the respondents, upon the going down of the remittitur upon this appeal, from further contesting the items of costs by showing, if they can, either that they were not incurred or that the items are too large.

For the reasons given, the order is reversed, with directions to the court below to strike from the files the memorandum of costs on the appeal in case No. 1,927 from the order denying a new trial, and for further proceedings, if any are instituted, to retax the costs of the other appeal. The appellants herein shall recover the costs of this appeal.

2. MARRIAGE (§ 50*)—EVIDENCE.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1963, subds. 28, 30, 33, enumerating as disputable presumptions that things have happened according to the ordinary course of nature and the ordinary habits of life, that a man and woman deporting themselves as husband and wife have entered into a lawful contract of marriage, and that the law has been obeyed, testimony that a man and woman lived together as husband and wife, that they always called one A. their child and their daughter, and that she called them father and mother, was sufficient prima facie evidence of the marriage and of the legitimacy of A.

3. DESCENT AND DISTRIBUTION (§ 71*)—PROOF OF HEIRSHIP—EVIDENCE.

That two men called each other brother, that each spoke to the other by his first name, and that their conversation and conduct indicated relationship, and was consistent with the fact that they were brothers, sufficed to establish the fact of such relationship.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, San Joaquin County; Frank H. Smith, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of William Hartman, deceased. From an order distributing the estate and from an order denying a new trial, the California Conference Association of the Seventh Day Adventists appeals. Affirmed.

E. E. Perlin, for appellant. O. B. Parkinson, for respondent. Aylett R. Cotton, for executor.

SHAW, J. The record presents two appeals, one from an order distributing the estate of William Hartman, deceased, and the other from an order denying a new trial of the matter.

By the provisions of his will the deceased left the sum of $2,000 to the Stockton Branch of the California Conference Association of the Seventh Day Adventists, and the entire residue of his estate to the said California Conference Association of the Seventh Day Adventists. The petition for distribution stated these facts, and asked distribution accordingly. The last-named body is an eleemosynary or charitable corporation, and it includes the so-called Stockton Branch, named as the recipient of the $2,000 legacy. Hartman executed said will more than 30 days before his death. He died on February 8, 1904. Annie Hartman Burns appeared and filed a counter-petition for distribution, alleging that she is the daughter of Peter Hartman, deceased, and that Peter was a brother of the testator, William Hartman; that she is an heir of the testator; that the gift of the entire estate to said charitable corporation is void, under section 1313 of the Civil Code, except as to one-third thereof, and asking that the two-thirds be distributed to her as the only heir. The corporation appeared and denied her relationship to the testator. The court found that she is a niece of the testator, as alleged, and his only heir at law. Distribution was made accordingly of two-thirds to her and one-third to said corporation, $2,000 thereof being for the use of the Stockton Branch. The corporation is the appellant.

The main question presented is the sufficiency of the evidence to support the finding that Annie Hartman Burns is a niece of the testator. We think there was evidence justifying that conclusion. A brief statement of the facts which the evidence tends to prove will show its sufficiency. William Hartman came to San Joaquin county prior to 1864 and continued to reside there until his death. So far as known, he never married and left no children. He was a native of Hanover, Germany, and was naturalized in 1866. In 1864 he boarded at a hotel in Stockton, Cal., kept by Jacob Byer, now of Lancaster, N. Y. He told Byer at that time that he came from Lancaster, but did not say whether it was in New York or Pennsylvania. In 1862 Peter Hartman lived at Lancaster, N. Y. He and one William Hartman were together there at that time, in presence of E. J. Silvernail. They called each other brother, and by their first names, William and Peter. William talked of going to California, and was trying to persuade Peter not to enlist in the army of the United States. Peter enlisted and in July, 1862, he and Silvernail's father, who had enlisted in the same company, were both injured by lightning, and were sent home to Buffalo on furlough. Silvernail and William Hartman met the two injured soldiers at Buffalo. Again Peter and William addressed each other as brothers and William helped Silvernail to take his father from the train. Many years afterwards Silvernail, in behalf of his father, who was applying for a pension, ascertained from an army comrade that William Hartman was in Stockton, Cal., and wrote to him to get his affidavit as to the injury of the elder Silvernail, reminding him of the occurrence at Buffalo in 1862, and stating to him that the elder Silvernail was an army comrade of Peter Hartman, his brother. The letter was addressed to William Hartman at Stockton, Cal. William answered the letter, saying that he well remembered helping to carry Silvernail, the elder, from the train at Buffalo in 1862. Again, about 1897, Silvernail sent another letter to William Hartman addressed to Stockton, Cal., and William wrote another letter to Silvernail and at that time made affidavit to the facts. This affidavit and the two letters were sent to the pension office at Washington and were not produced. Silvernail, on being shown a photographic copy of the signature of William Hartman to his will, testified that it was in the same handwriting as the signatures to said letters and affidavits. The elder Silvernail could not read, and the witness had read the letters and affidavits more than once. He described William Hartman as he remembered him, and his description was similar to that of the testator. No other William Hartman had even been known to reside in San Joaquin county. Annie Hartman Burns testified that she was the daughter of Peter Hartman and Mary Hartman, who were husband and wife; that she was born on January 22, 1868, at East Aurora; that her father died at Cowlesville, N. Y., in 1879; that her mother died in 1903; that she had no living brother, sister, or other relative to her knowledge; that her father had told her he had a brother named William Hartman who had gone to California at the time of the Civil War, and who lived there; that he had received letters from William Hartman; that he several times spoke of having a brother William, in California. East Aurora, Cowlesville, and Lancaster are towns in western New York a few miles apart.

There was no contradictory evidence except a statement in William Hartman's will as follows: "I have no living relatives to inherit anything from my estate" (see Pearson v. Pearson, 46 Cal. 628), and the testimony of John C. Miller, his executor, that frequently the testator said he had no living relatives, and that the testator never had spoken to the witness about having had a brother. The evidence of the relationship of Annie Hartman Burns was clearly sufficient to identify her as the niece of the testator. It does not appear that Peter ever wrote William Hartman, and it might well be that William was not aware that Peter left a surviving daughter. At most, these declarations by the testator would only create a conflict in the evidence, which the court below decided in favor of the niece, a decision which concludes this court.

The testimony that Peter Hartman and Mary Hartman lived together as husband and wife, that they always called Annie their child and their daughter, and that she called them father and mother is sufficient prima facie evidence of their marriage and of her legitimacy. Code Civ. Proc. § 1963, subds. 28, 30, 33. So also the fact that William and Peter Hartman called each other brother, that each spoke to the other by his first name, and that their conversation and conduct indicated relationship, and was consistent with the fact that they were brothers, suffices to establish the fact of such relationship. The presumptions of legitimacy and from the identity of name supply the fact that they were legitimate children of the same father. Lee v. Murphy, 119 Cal. 368, 51 Pac. 549, 955; Garwood v. Garwood, 29 Cal. 520; Carleton v. Townsend, 28 Cal. 221. Evidence of eye witnesses to the marriage ceremony, and to the births, can seldom be obtained to prove relationship and legitimacy, in such cases, and for that reason and others the law accepts secondary evidence and indulges in presumptions, where better evidence is not produced.

The appellant is not interested in the question whether or not there are other collateral relatives. If Mrs. Burns is an heir, it cannot take more than one-third of the estate. If there are other kin, they alone have a right to attack the distribution of the two-thirds to her as sole heir. The declarations of Peter Hartman to his daughter, made in the lifetime of William Hartman, that he had a brother William in California, were properly admitted in evidence to prove the relationship. The appellant on this point cites the rule given in Taylor on Evidence and in some of the decisions on the question. Taylor states it as follows: "Before, however, a declaration can be admitted in evidence, the relationship of the declarant with the family must be established by some proof other than the declaration itself." 1 Taylor on Ev. 640. To this Mr. Wharton adds: "For it would be a petitio principii to say that the declarations are receivable because he is a member of the family, and he is a member of the family because his declarations are receivable." 1 Wharton, Ev. § 218. On the other hand, however, it seems absurd to require, as a foundation for the admission of the declaration, proof of the very fact which the declaration is offered to establish. The preliminary proof would render the main evidence unnecessary. There are statements in the cases which seem to recognize a rule thus rigid and absurd. Wise v. Wynn, 59 Miss. 588, 42 Am. Rep. 381; Anderson v. Smith, 2 Mackey (D. C.) 281; Blackburn v. Crawford, 70 U. S. 187, 18 L. Ed. 186. But for the most part the statements to this effect in the opinions mean no more than that the declarations of persons not of kin, either to the claimant or to the person from whom descent is claimed, cannot be admitted to prove kinship. See Rulofson v. Billings, 140 Cal. 459, 74 Pac. 35; Est. of James, 124 Cal. 661, 57 Pac. 578, 1008. In Estate of Heaton, 135 Cal. 387, 67 Pac. 321, the rule for which appellant contends was referred to only to say that it was not applicable to the case. The question was not involved nor decided. In the present case it was sufficiently shown that Peter Hartman was a member of the family within the meaning of the rule. Annie Hartman Burns, his daughter, is the claimant, and she testified to the relationship between herself and Peter Hartman. On this question the latest edition of Greenleaf on Evidence says: "It is sometimes said that where, for example, the question is whether A. is B.'s heir, the declarant must appear to be related to B., and not merely to A. This seems erroneous, however, since all relationship is mutual, and the question whether A. is related to B. or a member of B.'s 'family' is also and just as much a question whether B. is related to A. or a member of A.'s family, and on this point a person claiming to belong to A.'s family is competent to speak; the circumstance that the estate to be claimed is in A.'s or B.'s family being immaterial." 1 Greenl. on Ev. (16th Ed.) § 114c. Mr. Wigmore treats the question at greater length, as follows: "It follows in applying the foregoing principle that, where an alleged relationship between Doe and Roe is to be testified to, a relation of Doe may speak to it, because it concerns the relationships of Doe's family, while a relation of Roe may equally speak to it, because it concerns the relationships of Roe's family. Hence all that is required of the declarant is a connection with either one or the other, but not with both. This truth, however, has been obscured by what must be regarded as erroneous rulings. The question being whether Doe is related to Roe (for example, so as to share in Roe's inheritance), the argument has been that it would be idle to require merely that the declarant should be shown to be related to Doe alone, because then any family could connect itself with any other by its members' mere assertion of the relationship. But the proper way to approach the question seems to be a different one, and is as follows: Any member of Doe's line may declare as to the relationships (i. e., memberships) of that family, and any member of Roe's line may declare as to the relationships (i. e., memberships) of that family; and the qualifications of the declarant as such member must, of course, be shown beforehand, like the qualifications of any witness (ante, section 1486). Thus, before declarations of a supposed member of Doe's family can be admitted, the declarant's membership in Doe's family—for example, that he is Doe's son—must be shown. But that is the whole effect of this requirement. The further question, if any, is whether a declaration of Doe's son that Doe is related to Roe (for example, is Roe's cousin) is a declaration as to Doe's family at all—i. e., whether it is not for the case in hand solely a declaration about Roe's family relationships, as to which Doe's son is by hypothesis not yet shown to be a qualified declarant. Now the state or condition of relationship must always in effect, though not in form, be double or mutual; i. e., the fact that Doe is cousin to Roe is also the fact that Roe is related as cousin to Doe. Hence a statement of Doe's son that Doe is cousin to Roe, though in one form an assertion of Roe's relationships, is also equally a declaration that one of the relations of Doe (i. e. one of the members of Doe's family) is Roe, for example, that one of the grandsons of Doe's grandfather is Roe. It is therefore a declaration upon which Doe's son is qualified to speak. The doubt then can only be as to whether it should make any difference that in the case at hand it is Roe's descendants who are seeking Doe's estate, or Doe's who are seeking Roe's estate. This surely cannot affect the evidential value of the declarations; for that must depend on the circumstances at the time of making, and no one has ever contended that, apart from the lis mota and kindred limitations (ante, sections 1483, 1484), it makes any difference whether a parent belongs to a poor or obscure branch of the family or to a rich and notorious one. Moreover, it is usually at a later day only that it has become apparent which branch would have a pecuniary interest in connecting itself with the other. The difference, then, is a matter of the form of the statement only, and such assertions as the above must be treated as in substance declarations as to Doe's family relationships. Whether it is Doe's or Roe's family that now happens to be seeking the inheritance is immaterial." 2 Wigmore on Ev. § 1491.

The following cases are in accord with this doctrine: Sitler v. Gehr, 105 Pa. 577, 51 Am. Rep. 207; Fowler v. Simpson, 79 Tex. 614, 15 S. W. 682, 23 Am. St. Rep. 370; Louder v. Schluter, 78 Tex. 105, 14 S. W. 205, 207; De Leon v. McMurray, 5 Tex. Civ. App. 283, 23 S. W. 1038; Brown v. Lazarus, 5 Tex. Civ. App. 84, 25 S. W. 71. The confusion seems to have arisen from the idea that such declarations were competent as admissions against interest. They do not derive their evidential value or competency from that consideration. They are admitted from reasons of necessity because otherwise it would frequently be impossible to prove the kinship of members of a family after those who knew the facts are dead. Their evidential value comes not from their being admissions against the interest of the person making them, but, as Wigmore points out, from "the probability that the 'natural effusions' (to use Lord Eldon's often-quoted phrase) of those who talk over family affairs when no special reason for bias or passion exists are fairly trustworthy." 2 Wigmore on Ev. § 1482. "The evidence is in its nature of an unsuspicious kind. It is generally brought from remote times, when no question was depending or even thought of, and when no purpose would apparently be answered." Rex v. Eriswell, 3 T. R. 720. Such declarations are safeguarded against the possibility of their being declarations in the interest of the party making them by the requirement that they must appear to have been made before any controversy over the property arose. To satisfy the rule that the best evidence must be produced and to show necessity, it is made a condition of their admission that the declarant is dead at the time they are offered, or out of the jurisdiction; and they are sometimes excluded when it appears that there are living persons whose testimony on the subject could be produced.

The orders appealed from are affirmed.

SHAW v. SOUTHERN PAC. R. CO. et al.

(Sac. 1,737.)

(Supreme Court of California. Jan. 25, 1910.)

1. DAMAGES (§ 147*)—INJURIES—PLEADING.

In an action for personal injuries, damages from loss of profits in business are special, and the facts must be particularly alleged.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Damages, Dec. Dig. § 147.*]

2. DAMAGES (§ 159*)—EVIDENCE—ADMISSIBILITY.

In an action for personal injuries, the complaint alleged that plaintiff had become unable to do any labor, and he testified that his business was that of loading railway cars, doing the work by contract and having several men in his service; that he was a good hand at the work and prior to his accident able to give his full time to it, and do all parts of it himself; and that he made a certain amount a month on his contracts, but that, after his injury, he was required to work on a salary; and that, if he had been able to perform labor as before, he could get a larger salary. Held, that it was proper to admit such testimony, the court having instructed that in fixing the damages the jury could take into consideration the inability of the plaintiff to perform labor, caused by the injuries received from the defendant's negligence, but that they could not award the plaintiff any damages to compensate him for the loss of his business, trade, or calling.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Damages, Cent. Dig. §§ 429–453; Dec. Dig. § 159.*]

3. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1004*)—REVIEW—DAMAGES.

A judgment can be reversed for excessive damages only when it appears that the amount allowed is so plainly unjust and oppressive as to suggest passion, prejudice, or corruption on the part of the jury.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 3944–3947; Dec. Dig. § 1004.*]

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Tulare County; W. B. Wallace, Judge.

Action by J. H. Shaw against the Southern Pacific Railroad Company and another. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, and from an order denying a motion for a new trial, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Power & McFadzean, for appellants. Lamberson & Lamberson and H. T. Miller, for respondent.

SHAW, J. This is an action for damages for bodily injuries to the plaintiff, alleged to have been caused by the negligence of the defendants. The defendants appeal from the judgment and from an order denying their motion for a new trial.

The complaint alleges that by reason of the improper and negligent operation of its cars by the employés of the defendants, while the plaintiff was lawfully in one of its freight cars occupied in loading the same with boxes of grapes, the said boxes were caused to fall upon the plaintiff, "crushing, bruising, and wounding him," and that "by reason of said injuries plaintiff has become and is unable to do or perform any labor, and has become sick, bruised, sore and disabled, * * * and has suffered and is now suffering great bodily and physical pain, * * * and has been permanently crippled and will continue to suffer from said injuries during the remainder of his lifetime." The damages thus caused are alleged to be in the sum of $10,000.

Upon the trial the plaintiff testified that before the accident his physical condition was good, and that he was able to do the work that he was engaged in doing, and all parts of it. Over the objection of the defendants he was then permitted to testify that his business was that of loading railroad cars with fruit, doing the work by contract on a large scale and having from 10 to 25 men in his service; that he was a good hand at the work; that prior to the injury he was able to give his full time to the work and to do all parts of it himself and made from $150 to $300 a month on his contracts; that after the injury he did not make any money out of it because he was unable to superintend it correctly and do the work; that he was now working on a salary of from $80 to $100 a month; and that, if he was able to perform labor as before, he could get a larger salary. If this evidence had been allowed to go to the jury for the purpose of establishing, as the measure of the damages to the plaintiff, the loss of the profits he would have made if he had continued in the business in which he was engaged prior to the injury, it would have been outside of the issues. A loss of profits does not always result from such an injury. Damages from such loss of profits are special in their nature, and the facts must be particularly alleged in order to admit evidence thereof and justify a recovery therefor. Treadwell v. Whittier, 80 Cal. 579, 22 Pac. 266, 5 L. R. A. 498, 13 Am. St. Rep. 175. The complaint does not allege a loss of profits. The allegation is merely that he was rendered unable to labor and was permanently crippled.

But the evidence was properly submitted to the consideration of the jury for a different purpose. In Treadwell v. Whittier, supra, the allegation was similar, although not so specific. It was there decided that it was proper to instruct the jury to consider the loss arising from the fact that the injury received rendered the plaintiff less capable of attending to his business than before, and that such loss was not special damage, but was provable and recoverable under general allegations of permanent disability. It is practically conceded in the case at bar that under such allegations it would be proper to prove the business or occupation in which the plaintiff had been previously engaged, and its nature, and that the injury rendered him less capable, or wholly incapable, of continuing such occupation or business. The authorities are in practical unanimity to that extent. The real point of the objection, therefore, is that while the jury may consider the work the plaintiff previously did and was able to do, or the business he was able to and did carry on, they may consider it only in a general way, and that, when they come to determine what his financial loss has been from the deprivation of his former bodily ability and vigor, they must rely on their common knowledge as to the value of such occupation or business to a man of his strength and capacity, and that they cannot have the aid which would come from proof of the amounts he had been accustomed to receive therefrom. Evidence of what a plaintiff had usually earned before his injury, either as wages or in business on his own account, would be the most accurate, satisfactory and valuable data from which to determine the value of the time and labor he has lost by being rendered unable to continue such occupation or business. For example, if he had previously made $5,000 a year by his personal efforts, and afterwards by reason of his injury could make no more than $1,000, his damage from the deprivation of bodily strength would be much greater than if he had previously been able to make only $2,000 a year. The rule contended for would drive the jury from the actual facts of the case to their own surmises and experience as a criterion for decision as to the value of his time and labor. The authorities sanction the more accurate method. In C. R. L. & P. Co. v. Posten, 59 Kan. 453, 53 Pac. 466, the court says: "In order that the jury may intelligently estimate the loss the plaintiff has sustained, it is necessary that they should be informed with reference to his business affairs, and while they may not, as compensation for the loss of his time, include speculative profits, or profits on invested capital, it is for them to say what loss has resulted to his business because of his being incapacitated from attending to it, and to award him as damages the value of his time and labor to himself in the transaction of his own business. This is the same compensation, and for precisely the same reasons, that a clerk or agent doing the same work for wages might recover for his loss." In I. & G. N. Ry. Co. v. Irvine, 64 Tex. 533, the court says: "If the hand of a carpenter or other mechanic be cut off by the negligence of another, it would surely be admissible, in an action to recover damages therefor, for him to state what his business was, what he was accustomed to make in its pursuit, and the effect which the hurt had upon his capacity to pursue that business." And it was said that the same rule applied where plaintiff was in mercantile business on his own account, in order "to show how far the hurt had disabled him to follow his ordinary occupation." In New J. Co. v. Nichols, 33 N. J. Law, 437, 97 Am. Dec. 722, upon this question the opinion declares that "evidence of the nature and extent of the plaintiff's business and the general rate of profit he has realized therefrom, which has been interrupted by the defendant's wrongful act, is properly received, not on the ground of its furnishing a measure of damages to be adopted by the jury, but to be taken into consideration by the jury to guide them in the exercise of that discretion which, to a certain extent, is always vested in the jury." In 1 Sedgwick on Damages, § 180, the rule is thus stated: "The most trustworthy basis of damages, in such a case is the amount which the injured party has earned in the past. This is, however, only evidence from which the jury will be enabled to say what the services of such a man as the plaintiff are worth, and the jury should distinctly understand that it is not to be taken as the necessary and legal measure of damages." It is the loss occasioned by the particular man who was injured that is to be ascertained, if possible, and not the loss which an average man would sustain from a similar injury. The standard of an average man is resorted to only where the specific evidence as to the actual loss to the particular man is wanting, and where experience teaches that there will be some loss from the injury. The following authorities are of similar effect to those above quoted: Smith v. C. & A. Ry. Co., 119 Mo. 253, 23 S. W. 784; Schmitz v. St. L., etc., Co., 119 Mo. 277, 24 S. W. 472, 23 L. R. A. 250; Bartley v. Trorlicht, 49 Mo. App. 219; Frobisher v. Fifth Ave. T. Co., 81 Hun, 544, 30 N. Y. Supp. 1102; Hamilton v. Great Falls, etc., Co., 17 Mont. 352, 42 Pac. 860, 43 Pac. 713; Luck v. Ripon, 52 Wis. 200, 8 N. W. 815; Bloomington v. Chamberlain, 104 Ill. 268; Chicago, etc., Co. v. Meech, 163 Ill. 314, 45 N. E. 290; Chicago, etc., Co. v. Anderson, 182 Ill. 298, 55 N. E. 366; Wade v. Le Roy, 20 How. 34, 15 L. Ed. 813; Chatsworth v. Rowe, 166 Ill. 116, 46 N. E. 763; North Chicago, etc., Co. v. Brown, 178 Ill. 191, 52 N. E. 864; Bailey v. Centerville, 108 Iowa, 20, 78 N. W. 831; Falangan v. Baltimore & O. R. Co., 83 Iowa, 643, 50 N. W. 60; Goodhart v. Penna. R. Co., 177 Pa. 1, 35 Atl. 191, 55 Am. St. Rep. 705; Birkel v. Chandler, 26 Wash. 241, 66 Pac. 406; Ehrgott v. New York, 96 N. Y. 276, 48 Am. Rep. 622; Cent. P. v. Senn, 73 Ga. 709.

It is true that there are many decisions to the contrary, and some of the text-writers say that the contrary decisions are in the majority. But for the most part they are based upon the doctrine that under a general allegation of permanent disability to work evidence cannot be admitted to prove that his disability renders his devotion to his business less profitable to him after the injury than it was before. In this state the rule is, as established in Treadwell v. Whittier, supra, that the jury may under such general allegations consider the permanent loss from the fact that the injury renders the plaintiff less capable than before of doing the business in which he was previously engaged. If they can consider a loss of this character from partial disability, they can, of course, consider the loss from a disability which renders him wholly unable to carry on his former business and compels him to engage in a business less remunerative. And it would be absurd to say that the jury could consider such loss, and at the time refuse them the aid of any information as to the relative gains from the business formerly carried on and that subsequently conducted—the only facts that would show the actual value, to him, of his time and labor. If the latter were equally or more profitable, no doubt the defendant would claim, and would be conceded, the right to show that fact in mitigation of the damages. In the states where such proof cannot be made unless the loss of business is specially pleaded, the rule is uniform that, where it is pleaded, evidence of the wages received or gains from business, before and after the injury, is admissible. In this state, where such loss of business power may be considered without having been specially pleaded, it is obvious that the same rule should be applied and evidence of the wages or gains before and after the injury admitted.

The case of Lombardi v. California St. Ry., 124 Cal. 311, 57 Pac. 66, is not in conflict with these views. There the plaintiff had specially alleged the amount of the loss by reason of his inability to attend to his business as he formerly did, and that it consisted of a specified sum paid as wages to men working in his place. He offered evidence of special damages from loss of profits in the business which was carried on by himself and a partner in which considerable capital was invested, concerning which there were no allegations. It was held that this evidence was improperly admitted. The court says that the rule stated in Treadwell v. Whittier was not involved. In the case at bar the plaintiff had no capital invested, nor any partner, and did not plead a special loss of profits.

It is necessary in all such cases, special damage not being in issue, as stated by Mr. Sedgwick, supra, to direct the jury that no allowance as damages can be made for the specific loss of profits that may be disclosed by the evidence of the comparative gains before and after. This the court did in the present case. The jury was instructed that in fixing the amount of damages they could take into consideration the inability of the plaintiff to perform labor, caused by the injuries received from the defendant's negligence, but that they could not "award the plaintiff in this case any damages to compensate him for the loss of his business, trade, or calling." The evidence is received solely for the purpose of enabling the jury to more intelligently estimate the loss occasioned by his incapacity, and not as a basis for the allowance of the particular losses indicated. It is the usual and ordinary previous gains in his usual and ordinary business that is to be considered, and not exceptional or extraordinary profits from particular transactions. The instructions given as above put the matter to the jury in the proper light, and we must presume that it prevented them from allowing a loss of profits as damages, and that they considered the evidence objected to only to determine the plaintiff's damage from loss of earning power.

The appellants also contend that the damages are excessive, to such an extent as to call for the intervention of this court. The injury rendered the plaintiff unconscious for a few moments. There was a contraction of the lumbar muscles and a lateral and posterior curvature of the spine. The contraction turned four of the vertebræ a little to the right. He was confined indoors for two weeks because of the injury. He suffered from continuous strong pains in the back which kept him awake and forced him to take opiates at times to enable him to sleep. He did not attempt to do the work he had previously been able to do, until five months after the accident, and he then found that he could not do it for any length of time. He attempted it several times afterwards, with the same result, and up to the time of the trial, 17 months after the injury, he was unable to endure the muscular exertion necessary to successfully carry on his former business or occupation. At the time of the trial he was still suffering from the injury. There was at that time general weakness and almost a continuous pain in the back which became very severe after walking or being on his feet for two or three hours. He was compelled to engage in clerical work, involving only slight muscular exertion, and it was less remunerative than his former business of loading cars. It may be that the damages given are more than the plaintiff has actually sustained. This is a question primarily committed to the discretion of the trial court. The judge of that court is in a much better situation than are we to determine the question. It sometimes appears to us from the bare record that probably an excessive verdict has been allowed to stand. We are frequently asked to interfere in cases which would require us to exercise the broad discretion of the trial court in reviewing the verdict, instead of the circumscribed discretion possessed by the appellate courts. This we cannot do. We can reverse a judgment for excessive damages only when it appears that the amount allowed is so plainly unjust and oppressive as to suggest passion, prejudice, or corruption on the part of the jury. Hale v. San Bernardino Tr. Co. (Cal.) 106 Pac. 83, and cases cited. We do not think that the case demands our interference.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

KERN VALLEY BANK v. KOEHN. (L. A. 2,285.)

(Supreme Court of California. Jan. 25, 1910.)

1. LIMITATION OF ACTIONS (§ 167*)—BAR OF DEBT AS AFFECTING SECURITY.

Under Civ. Code, § 2911, when the debt secured by a mortgage became barred by limitations, the mortgage lien was extinguished.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Limitation of Actions, Cent. Dig. §§ 651–653; Dec. Dig. § 167.*]

2. LIMITATION OF ACTIONS (§ 164*)—BAR OF DEBT AND SECURITY—REVIVAL.

Civ. Code, § 2911, provides that a lien is extinguished when the debt secured thereby is barred by limitations. Held that, where a debt secured by mortgage became barred by limitations, the subsequent renewal of the note evidencing the debt did not revive the mortgage.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Limitation of Actions, Cent. Dig. §§ 619, 648; Dec. Dig. § 164.*]

3. LIMITATION OF ACTIONS (§ 197*) — EVIDENCE—SUFFICIENCY.

Evidence considered, and held insufficient to show that a mortgage lien was revived after the debt secured thereby was barred by limitations.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Limitation of Actions, Dec. Dig. § 197.*]

4. ATTACHMENT (§ 128*)—VALIDITY—UNDERTAKING.

A writ of attachment is improperly issued and void unless supported by an undertaking conforming substantially to the requirements of the statute.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Attachment, Cent. Dig. §§ 351, 352; Dec. Dig. § 128.*]

5. ATTACHMENT (§ 132*) — UNDERTAKING — SUFFICIENCY.

An attachment undertaking was fatally defective where it failed to contain the stipulation required by Code Civ. Proc. § 539, as amended in 1907, that, if the attachment should be discharged on the ground that plaintiff was not entitled thereto under section 537, the plaintiff would pay all damages.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Attachment, Cent. Dig. §§ 365–370; Dec. Dig. § 132.*]

6. ATTACHMENT (§ 20*)—SUCCESSIVE ATTACHMENT.

A writ of attachment having been invalid, a levy thereunder did not bar or prevent a new proceeding in the same action.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Attachment, Dec. Dig. § 20.*]

7. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 874*)—REVIEW—EXTENT.

An order denying a motion to vacate a writ of attachment could not be considered on appeal from an order refusing to dissolve a subsequent writ of attachment in the same action, where it did not appear that the order in question relative to the first writ had become final.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Kern County; Paul W. Bennett, Judge.

Action by the Kern Valley Bank against Charles Koehn. Appeal by defendant from an order refusing to dissolve an attachment. Affirmed.

For decision in Court of Appeal, see 10 Cal. App. 679, 103 Pac. 173.

J. W. P. Laird, Rowen Irwin, and E. L. Foster (Joseph H. Tam, of counsel), for appellant. George E. Whitaker, for respondent.

SHAW, J. This is an appeal from an order refusing to dissolve an attachment.

The writ of attachment attacked was issued on October 2, 1907, in pursuance of an affidavit and undertaking filed on the same day. The action was begun on July 17, 1907, to recover of defendant the amount of a note for $5,320, dated October 2, 1900, and maturing October 2, 1903.

The first ground of the motion to dissolve the attachment was that the debt sued on was secured by a lien and pledge of personal property. Affidavits and counter affidavits were filed upon the hearing. They were conflicting upon some points. We must necessarily accept the view most favorable to the plaintiff, being bound to that extent by the decision of the court below. The debt was originally created on May 2, 1898, and was evidenced by a note of that date which became due eight months after its date, which would be January 2, 1899. On August 5, 1898, defendant executed to plaintiff a contract purporting to be a grant, bargain, and sale of an undivided one-half interest in a quartz mill and appurtenances with the right to use the mill site, adjacent ground, and water to operate the same. This was given and accepted, not as an absolute conveyance, but as security for the payment of said note of May 2, 1898, in effect a mortgage. Plaintiff did not take possession of the mill under this mortgage. This note was not paid and the note sued on was given in renewal thereof. Although dated October 2, 1900, the latter note was not in fact executed until March 24, 1903. At that time the original debt and note falling due January 2, 1899, was barred by the statute of limitations. The conveyance of the quartz mill, although absolute in form, was, in effect, only a mortgage, and when the debt which it secured became barred the mortgage ceased to be effective and the lien which it had created was extinguished. Civ. Code, § 2911. The subsequent renewal of the note on March 24, 1903, created the debt anew, but it did not renew, revive, or continue the mortgage. Sanford v. Bergin (Cal.) 103 Pac. 336; Wells v. Harter, 56 Cal. 343; Southern Pacific Co. v. Prosser, 122 Cal. 417, 52 Pac. 836, 55 Pac. 145.

It is claimed that H. A. Blodgett, as president of plaintiff corporation, on March 23, 1903, executed to Koehn a written declaration that the conveyance of the quartz mill should stand as security for the note sued on. The affidavits on behalf of plaintiff, however, show that the note was executed on March 24th in the absence of Blodgett; that Blodgett had nothing to do with the renewal of the note; that it was done without any agreement to revive or renew the mortgage; that Blodgett had no authority to act for the plaintiff in the matter; and that he signed the declaration aforesaid at the request of Koehn, without authority and in reliance upon Koehn's statement that there had been an agreement to that effect between Koehn and plaintiff's cashier, who had attended to the matter of the renewal of the note on behalf of plaintiff, that said statement of Koehn was untrue and that he knew that Blodgett was not authorized to act for plaintiff. This sufficiently supports the decision of the lower court that there was no revival or renewal of the mortgage or lien. We have assumed, for the purposes of the argument only, that the lien could be renewed by the plaintiff and Koehn without giving possession to plaintiff and without the execution of any writing by Koehn.

The other ground urged in support of the motion to dissolve the attachment was that on July 17, 1907, and again on September 30, 1907, writs of attachment were issued in the action; that each of these writs had been levied upon property; that such levies remained in full force and effect and constituted liens upon property for the security of the debt sued on; that an attachment cannot be had for debts so secured; and that, therefore, the later attachment was invalid. We need not determine whether or not, after a valid attachment has been issued and levied upon property of the defendant, and while it remains in force, the plaintiff may file a new affidavit and undertaking and obtain another writ of attachment thereon in the same action. A writ of attachment is improperly issued and void, unless it is supported by an undertaking conforming substantially to the requirements of the statute. Hisler v. Carr, 34 Cal. 646; Gow v. Marshall, 90 Cal. 567, 27 Pac. 422; Tibbett v. Tom Sue, 122 Cal. 207, 54 Pac. 741; 3 Ency. of Plead. & Prac. 30. In each of the previous attachment proceedings the undertaking was fatally defective, in that it failed to contain the stipulation required by section 539 of the Code of Civil Procedure, as amended in 1907, "that, if the attachment should be discharged on the ground that plaintiff was not entitled thereto under section five hundred and thirty seven," the plaintiff will pay all damages, etc. The former writs being invalid, the levies thereon did not create valid liens upon the property, did not constitute lawful security for the debt sued on, nor operate to bar or prevent a new proceeding upon a valid undertaking in the same action.

It is said that a motion to vacate the writ of July 17, 1907, has been denied, and that the order denying it has become final. The record before us does not show that the order has become final, nor does it disclose any other grounds for the motion than the existence of the supposed mortgage lien which we here hold had been extinguished. Under these circumstances, the former order cannot be considered in the decision of the present appeal. Naftzger v. Gregg, 99 Cal. 88, 33 Pac. 757, 37 Am. St. Rep. 23; In re Blythe, 99 Cal. 476, 34 Pac. 108.

The order is affirmed.

HOUGHTON v. KERN VALLEY BANK et al.
(L. A. 2,402.)

(Supreme Court of California. Feb. 7, 1910.)

1. TAXATION (§ 421*)—ASSESSMENT—VALIDITY.

An assessment roll offered in evidence in a case involving a tax title showed entries as follows: Under the heading, "Description of Property," appeared the words, "In the town of B., lot 1, 2, 3," and under the heading, "Block," the figures "132." Held that, no map showing the location of any lot or block being introduced, the assessment was prima facie invalid.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Taxation, Cent. Dig. § 729; Dec. Dig. § 421.*]

2. TAXATION (§ 810*)—ASSESSMENT—VALIDITY—EVIDENCE.

If an assessment of lots is prima facie insufficient by reason of a defective description, it may be shown in support of a tax title based thereon that there was of record at the time of the assessment a map, by aid of which the description would serve to fully identify and locate them.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Taxation, Cent. Dig. § 1607; Dec. Dig. § 810.*]

3. LANDLORD AND TENANT (§ 63*)—ATTORNMENT—ESTOPPEL TO DENY TITLE.

In view of Civ. Code, § 1948, providing that the attornment of a tenant to a stranger is void unless it is made with the landlord's consent, or in consequence of the judgment of a court of competent jurisdiction, evidence that where after a tax sale of leased property, while the tax title was claimed by a third person, lessor consented to lessee's payment of rent to such claimant, and deducted such payment from the amount due under the original lease, it amounted to an attornment to such claimant with lessor's consent, terminating the relation on which it was sought to base an estoppel to deny lessor's title.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Landlord and Tenant, Cent. Dig. § 176; Dec. Dig. § 63.*]

4. TAXATION (§ 788*)—TAX DEEDS—RECITALS—CONCLUSIVENESS.

In view of Pol. Code, § 3898, making a tax deed to the purchaser from the state prima facie evidence of all the facts recited therein, and requiring it to recite "facts necessary to authorize such sale and conveyance," a recital in a deed, as one of such facts, that the amount bid was not less than the amount required by section 3897, must prevail, in absence of any showing to the contrary.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Taxation, Cent. Dig. § 1555; Dec. Dig. § 788.*]

5. TAXATION (§ 671*)—SALE OF LAND—LOTS OR PARCELS.

The question as to the lots or parcels in which land is to be sold is controlled as a general rule by the assessment list.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Taxation, Cent. Dig. § 1354; Dec. Dig. § 671.*]

6. TAXATION (§ 341*)—ASSESSMENT—SEPARATE LOTS.

Where separate lots in a block are contiguous and are owned by a single individual, they may be properly assessed as one parcel.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Taxation, Cent. Dig. § 574; Dec. Dig. § 341.*]

7. TAXATION (§ 671*)—SALE OF LOTS—SINGLE PARCEL.

If separate contiguous lots in a block, owned by a single individual, are assessed properly as one parcel, sale of them in bulk is, in effect, a sale of a single parcel.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Kern County; J. W. Mahon, Judge.

Action by R. E. Houghton against the Kern Valley Bank and others, wherein Ng Hon Kim intervened. From a portion of the decree in favor of intervener, and from an order denying a new trial, plaintiff and defendants appeal. Reversed.

Octave G. Du Py, Rowen Irwin, C. Brower, J. W. P. Laird, Olney & Olney, W. S. Allen, Fred E. Borton, Emmet H. Wilson, and G. C. De Garmo, for appellants. Nancy Ella Houghton, in pro. per. Chas. N. Sears, for respondent and intervener.

SLOSS, J. This action was brought to obtain a partition of a number of lots situate in the city of Bakersfield, Kern county. Pending the action Ng Hon Kim filed a complaint in intervention, whereby he claimed, as against all the original parties, the title to a portion of the property described in the complaint, to wit, lots 1, 2, and 3, in block 132, in the Baker homestead tract. The plaintiff and the various defendants answered the complaint in intervention, denying the intervener's claim of title. The court found that said intervener was the owner of the lots claimed by him, and gave him a decree quieting his title thereto as against the plaintiff and the defendants. A partition of the remainder of the land described in the complaint was ordered. The plaintiff and the defendants appeal from that portion of the decree in favor of the intervener, and also from an order denying their motion for a new trial.

The intervener's asserted title was based on a deed from the state following a sale for failure to pay taxes. The proceedings leading up to the making of this deed are fully set out in the record, and the only question that need here be determined is whether the evidence sustains the findings of the court that the intervener acquired title by virtue of the tax proceedings.

Various objections to the validity of the assessment and the steps taken to collect the same are presented by the appellants.

It is urged that the assessment itself is invalid for want of a sufficient description of the property. The assessment roll or book was offered in evidence, and showed entries as follows: Under the heading, "Description of Property," appears the words, "In the town of Bakersfield, lot 1, 2, 3," and under the heading, "Block," the figures "132." Upon the trial the intervener offered no evidence to show whether this represented a general system of numbering in force in the city of Bakersfield, or was according to a subdivision of some tract offered for sale by private owners. The complaint describes the property as "In the Baker homestead tract, according to the map of said tract filed in the office of the county recorder of the county of Kern, state of California, on the 3rd day of April, 1889," and the complaint in intervention adopts the description of the complaint. No map showing the location of any lots or blocks was introduced in evidence. Under the decisions of this court there seems to be no escape from the conclusion that the assessment is prima facie invalid.

In Miller v. Williams, 135 Cal. 183, 67 Pac. 788, the description was "Lots 13, 14, 15, 16, 17 and 18 in Blk F, Leibrandt Tract. Lots 18 and 20, Block C, Kaye and Union Tract." This was held to be insufficient. The case just cited has sometimes been regarded as going to the length of declaring absolutely void an assessment based upon a description of this character. But in subsequent cases it has been explained that the effect of Miller v. Williams is not so sweeping. In Best v. Wohlford, 144 Cal. 733, 78 Pac. 293, it was held that an assessment as follows: "Lot four, block one hundred seventy-eight, 14.42 acres, Rancho Rincon del Diablo"—might constitute a sufficient description of the land if made certain by the introduction of a map showing the lots and blocks delineated thereon as described in the assessment. Similar was the holding in Baird v. Monroe, 150 Cal. 560, 89 Pac. 352, where the assessment was upheld when aided by the introduction of the recorded map of the tract designating with certainty the property referred to in the assessment. Finally, in Fox v. Townsend, 152 Cal. 51, 91 Pac. 1004, 1007, the court had before it a situation like the one which confronts us here, and substantially similar to that in Miller v. Williams. The assessment there relied on described the property as follows: "In Los Angeles County. In Electric Ry. Homestead Assn. Tr. Lot 17 Block 20." The record did not show the introduction of any map in evidence, or that there was any map of any kind in existence at any time during the tax proceedings. The description was held to be insufficient; the court stating its position as follows: "In Miller v. Williams, an action to quiet title, it was held that such a description in an assessment is not sufficient prima facie to identify the portion assessed. In that case, as in this, there was no attempt to supplement the assessment description by evidence showing that it did sufficiently identify the land. The theory of the decision apparently is that a description of this kind is of such a nature as to indicate that the property can ordinarily be located only by reference to some map or plat, and, no such map or plat being referred to as being in existence, the description is prima facie insufficient. There is no presumption, in the absence of such a reference, that there is such a map in existence." And, further: "The later cases of Best v. Wohlford, 144 Cal. 733 [78 Pac. 293], and Baird v. Monroe, 150 Cal. 560 [89 Pac. 352], accepting the rule of Miller v. Williams, as correct, establish the doctrine that, while such description is prima facie insufficient, it may be in fact sufficient to identify the property, and that whether or not it is so sufficient is a question of fact to be determined by the trial court upon such evidence as may be presented on that issue. The party relying on an assessment containing such a description may therefore supplement his case by showing that the description in the assessment was in fact sufficient to identify the land."

Upon the authority of these cases, it must therefore be held that there was before the court no evidence sufficient to justify it in holding that the intervener had acquired title by virtue of valid tax proceedings. The proceedings in question were based upon an assessment which, standing alone, was prima facie insufficient. Upon a new trial it will, of course, be competent for the intervener to offer evidence for the purpose of showing that the description was sufficient. To this end he may show, if it be the fact, that there was of record at the time of the assessment a map by the aid of which the description of the lots in question would serve to fully and completely identify and locate them.

A new trial will be necessary by reason of what we have stated. As a guide for further proceedings we shall give attention to such other points made by appellants as may arise again.

It appeared that the record title to the land stood in the name of one Celsus Brower, who held as trustee for the plaintiff and the various defendants. Brower had executed a lease of the property to the intervener, who had taken possession thereunder, and had accepted grants from the purchasers under the tax sales before the expiration of the term of the lease with its extensions. It is urged that said intervener was, as tenant of Brower, estopped to deny the title of the latter. We need not enter into the question whether the doctrine precluding a tenant from questioning his landlord's title prevents reliance upon a tax title acquired under a sale made after the execution of the lease. 24 Cyc. 955; Teich v. Arms, 5 Cal. App. 475, 90 Pac. 962. There was here evidence sufficient to justify the court in finding that after the tax sale, and while the tax title was claimed by one Morrison, Brower had consented to the intervener's payment of rent to Morrison, and had deducted such payment from the amount due under the intervener's original lease. This amounted to an attornment to Morrison with the consent of the landlord. Civ. Code, § 1948; Jackson v. Davis, 5 Cow. (N. Y.) 123, 15 Am. Dec. 451; 24 Cyc. 956. Such attornment terminated the relation of landlord and tenant—the relation which forms the sole basis of the alleged estoppel.

It is urged that the trial court erred in admitting in evidence tax receipts showing the payment by the intervener of taxes upon the land in controversy. We do not see the materiality of this evidence (Keane v. Cannovan, 21 Cal. 291, 303, 82 Am. Dec. 738), but the record does not disclose any exception to the rulings complained of.

The point, raised for the first time in the reply brief, that the land was sold to the state for more than the amount of taxes and the costs actually due, is not supported by the record. The argument is based upon the assumption that the land sold covered (in addition to the property in controversy) only certain land in the town of Tehachapi and lots in the Drury addition. It appears, however, from the tax collector's deed to the state that the sale included four lots in the Lowell addition, and, taking these into account, it appears that the amount of taxes and costs was correctly computed and stated in the deed. The same answer may be made to the point that the tax collector, in receiving and accepting a bid upon the sale by the state, did not include taxes for the years 1900, 1901, and 1902. Section 3897 of the Political Code provides that no bid shall be received or accepted at such sale for less than the amount of all taxes levied upon such property and interest, costs, penalties, and expenses up to the date of such sale. There is, however, no evidence in the record that any taxes were assessed or levied upon the land in question for the years 1900, 1901, and 1902. The deed to the purchaser from the state is prima facie evidence of all the facts recited therein (Pol. Code, § 3898), and is required to recite "the facts necessary to authorize such sale and conveyance." The deed in question recited as one of such facts that the amount bid was not less than the amount required by section 3897 of the Political Code. In the absence of any showing to the contrary, this recital must prevail.

The remaining point is that the authorization from the State Controller to the tax collector required the land to be sold in separate lots or parcels, whereas it was in fact sold as a whole. It appears, however, that the land sold, while described as lots 1, 2, and 3, was really assessed as a whole. "The question as to the lots or parcels in which the land is to be sold is controlled, as a general rule, by the assessment list." 27 Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law (2d Ed.) 834. Where separate lots in a block are contiguous, and are owned by a single individual, they may properly be assessed as one parcel. People v. Morse, 43 Cal. 534; Cooper v. Miller, 113 Cal. 238, 45 Pac. 325. If so assessed, there seems to be no good reason for holding that a sale of them in bulk is not, in effect, a sale of a single parcel. There may, no doubt, be conditions under which a joint assessment of separate lots would be improper, as, for example, where the lots are not contiguous, or improvements on one are charged against all (Terrill v. Groves, 18 Cal. 149), but no such conditions appear here. The mere fact that the sale included several lots, sold apparently, in gross, does not, under the rule declared in Cooper v. Miller, supra, establish that the several lots did not together form a single parcel.

The portion of the judgment appealed from, and the order denying appellants' motion for a new trial, are reversed.

MILLER v. BAY CITIES WATER CO. et al.

(S. F. 4,814.)

(Supreme Court of California. Feb. 4, 1910.)

1. WATERS AND WATER COURSES (§ 100*)—UNDERGROUND CHANNEL—RIGHTS OF LANDOWNER.

The right of a person owning land on a channel of underground water is not measured by whether the water is under pressure or not, but by whether the water comes to him in a natural defined flow, so as to constitute a part or parcel of his lands.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Waters and Water Courses, Cent. Dig. § 109; Dec. Dig. § 100.*]

2. WATERS AND WATER COURSES (§ 107*)—DIVERSION—EVIDENCE—FINDINGS.

In a suit to restrain the misappropriation of water from an underground channel, evidence held to sustain a finding, as to the geological formation, that complainant's land overlay an underground gravel stratum saturated with water feeding his artesian well, and that defendants threatened and intended to take and divert, and unless restrained, would take and divert, all the waters of a river, both surface and subsurface, which supplied such gravel stratum, to complainant's injury.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Waters and Water Courses, Cent. Dig. § 117; Dec. Dig. § 107.*]

3. WATERS AND WATER COURSES (§ 100*)—UNDERGROUND WATER-BEARING STRATUM—RIGHTS OF OWNER.

The owner of land having an underground water-bearing stratum supplied by the flood waters of a stream has a primary right to the full flow of the stream at flood in order to bring his stratum up to its water-bearing capacity, though not to the extent that they may replenish his water-bearing stratum, as against the right of an appropriator to divert any part of the waters for commercial use beyond the watershed.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Waters and Water Courses, Cent. Dig. § 109; Dec. Dig. § 100.*]

4. WATERS AND WATER COURSES (§ 107*)—WATERS OF STREAM—APPROPRIATION—UNDERGROUND WATER-BEARING STRATUM.

Where the accustomed flow of a stream is more than necessary to supply an underground water-bearing stratum supplying complainant's land with water for irrigation, the burden is on an appropriator, claiming the right to appropriate the surplus flood waters of the stream for use beyond the watershed, to show that such flood waters were in fact wasted or lost waters.

5. TRIAL (§ 391*)—FINDINGS—EVIDENCE.

No finding is required on an averment as to which there is no proof.

6. WATERS AND WATER COURSES (§ 107*)—WATERS OF STREAM—DIVERSION—FINDINGS.

Complainant alleged that defendants were threatening and intending to divert and carry away "the waters of Coyote river" beyond their own lands, and prevent the same from ever returning to the river or flowing through the gravel within the gorge and supplying a gravel stratum under complainant's land, into which complainant's well was sunk, thereby depriving complainant of waters to irrigate his land, and irreparably damaging the same. Held, that such allegation stated in effect that defendants intended to divert all the waters of the stream, and, the court having found the same to be true, such finding sufficiently found the quantity of storm waters which defendants intended to take, under a claim that they were entitled to appropriate and use, beyond the watershed, the flood waters of the stream.

7. WATERS AND WATER COURSES (§ 107*)—FLOOD WATERS—DIVERSION—FINDINGS.

The owner of land underlain by a water-bearing gravel formation fed from an adjoining stream being entitled to have the flood waters of the stream supply by their flow, force, and volume the artesian stratum in which his well is sunk, a finding that, if a "large portion" of such flood waters is diverted by defendants as intended, the gravel stratum will be deprived of water to complainant's irreparable injury is sufficient to sustain a judgment enjoining defendant's appropriation, independent of any finding as to the exact quantity measured in second feet or gallons necessary to cause such result.

8. WATERS AND WATER COURSES (§ 101*)—PERCOLATING WATERS—RIGHTS OF LANDOWNER.

The common-law rule applicable to percolating waters, which gave a landowner all that lay beneath it, with a right to interrupt and take away waters passing to his neighbor's well, has been modified in California by the application of the doctrine sic utere tuo, which gives to each landowner only the right to a reasonable supply for irrigation and other ordinary uses upon his land.

9. WATERS AND WATER COURSES (§ 105*)—PERCOLATING WATERS—DIVERSION—SALE.

The rights of owners of land overlying a water-bearing artesian stratum to withdraw and use the waters are correlative, so that one may not divert such waters for sale elsewhere to the injury of others.

10. WATERS AND WATER COURSES (§ 101*)—RIPARIAN RIGHTS—DIVERSION OF WATERS OF STREAM—PERCOLATING WATER.

One riparian owner is not entitled to divert the waters of a stream for use at a distant point for commercial purposes, so as to prevent another riparian owner, to whom the waters would otherwise be available, from using them on his lands, and this rule is equally applicable as between owners of land overlying a common substratum of percolating water.

11. WATERS AND WATER COURSES (§ 101*)—APPROPRIATION—INJURY TO ARTESIAN WELL ONLY.

An appropriator of the waters of a stream may not carry them beyond the watershed for commercial purposes, to the injury of the owners of land overlying an artesian stratum, which is so connected with the stream as to derive its supply of water by percolation therefrom.

12. WATERS AND WATER COURSES (§ 107*)—DIVERSION—UNDERGROUND STRATUM—INJUNCTION.

An owner of land overlying an underground saturated stratum, receiving its supply from a stream or saturated plane, is entitled to enjoin the diversion of the waters of the stream or saturated plane, or other well-defined supply, for use elsewhere than on lands to which, as waters of the stream, they are riparian, or which, as waters of an underground stratum, they may be reasonably and usefully applied to the overlying land.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Waters and Water Courses, Cent. Dig. § 117; Dec. Dig. § 107.*]

13. WATERS AND WATER COURSES (§ 79*)—DIVERSION—"FLOOD OR STORM WATERS."

While an appropriator may divert for use to any point beyond the watershed any portion of the waters of a stream which can serve no useful purpose, either to the riparian owner or in supplying an underground stratum, or which are in excess of the quantity necessary for that purpose, waters of a stream are not necessarily "flood or storm" waters because the flow is increased by unusual rains beyond normal, so long as the water is confined to the general channel of the stream, nor so long as the waters perform an indispensable service in pressing into the gravel beds or trough the waters which go to supply the various artesian strata, from which the overlying landowners obtain water by means of wells.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Waters and Water Courses, Cent. Dig. §§ 70, 71; Dec. Dig. § 79.*]

14. WATERS AND WATER COURSES (§ 107*)—DIVERSION—DEFENSES.

Where complainant sued for an injunction to restrain a diversion of the waters of a stream as soon as it reasonably appeared that the proposed diversion, by the pump and appliances of defendant as installed and operated, would affect complainant's water supply to his artesian stratum, complainant was not subject to the charge that he had stood by and permitted the development of water to be made to successful operation having reasonable cause to believe that it would affect his supply.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Waters and Water Courses, Cent. Dig. § 117; Dec. Dig. § 107.*]

15. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 173*)—REVIEW—REVERSAL—THEORY OF CAUSE.

Where, in a suit to restrain the diversion of water from a stream, defendants denied complainant's right to any relief against defendants' diversion of the waters of the stream, either surface or subsurface, and insisted that complainant, not being a riparian proprietor, had no right to prevent the diversion of the waters, whether surface, subsurface, or percolating, and that, as far as the storm waters of the stream were concerned, they had a right to divert above the lower gorge of the river all the waters that flowed down to the outlet, irrespective of any benefit they afforded in filling the gravels below the lower gorge and supplying the artesian stratum of plaintiff, which had its intake therein, defendants, on their contentions being refused, were not entitled to the reversal of a decree because the trial court did not adopt an artificial plan not suggested by the pleadings, and on which no proof was made, permitting defendants to store waters of the watershed in reservoirs above the lower gorge, and requiring them in each season to permit a certain quantity of water to pass the upper gorge in such quantities as to allow it to sink into the gravels below the lower gorge and supply complainant's underground stratum.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Clara County; A. L. Rhodes, Judge.

Action by Charles Miller against the Bay Cities Water Company and others. Decree for complainant, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Garret W. McEnerney and Walter Rothchild (John Garber, of counsel), for appellants. S. F. Lieb and John E. Richards, for respondent.

LORIGAN, J. Plaintiff, the owner of a tract of land in Santa Clara county upon which was planted an orchard of 21 acres of deciduous trees, brought this action against the defendant, a California corporation organized for the purpose of furnishing water to cities and their inhabitants, and against certain of its officers, to enjoin the diversion by them of any waters of the Coyote river in said county, either those waters flowing on the surface of the bed of said river, or flowing or percolating underneath it, or from diverting any of said waters to any extent. As the basis of his right to an injunction it was alleged in the complaint, among other things, that beneath the land of plaintiff, and under a stratum of impervious clay, there is a stratum of gravel, always full of water under pressure, which water was constantly supplied to said stratum from the sinking and subsurface flow of the Coyote river; that from a well sunk in the said water-bearing stratum plaintiff had for years annually irrigated his orchard, which was of great value; that if defendants were permitted to divert the waters of the Coyote river as they threatened to do, above or at a certain gorge known as the lower gorge of the river, the gravel stratum of plaintiff and his well would be deprived of water from which to irrigate his orchard, and the orchard would be irreparably damaged and soon become of little or no value. The answer denied all the material allegations of the complaint, and particularly denied the existence of any gravel stratum under the land of plaintiff connected with or supplied from the waters of the Coyote river, and further denied that defendants intended to divert any surface or subsurface waters of the river, or any waters, at or above said lower gorge, except a large portion of the waters of the river which sunk at that point and became impounded and stored in the gravels deposited therein, and did not flow at all, and except, further, that they intended to divert "a portion of the storm or flood waters which for a short period in every year rush in great volume and with great velocity down the channel of said river to the bay of San Francisco, and are wasted and lost therein." Plaintiff had a decree as prayed for, and defendants appeal therefrom, and also from an order denying their motion for a new trial.

Upon the issues presented under the pleadings the trial court found the following facts: That underneath the surface of the land of plaintiff, known as the Miller ranch which is about four miles northerly from what is known as the lower gorge of the Coyote river, and underneath a stratum of impervious clay, there is a stratum of coarse, loose gravel seven feet thick, being from 83 feet to 90 feet below such surface, which is always full of water, under pressure, the same being constantly supplied to said stratum of gravel from the sinking and subsurface flow of the waters of the Coyote river, as hereinafter stated. Said stratum of gravel extends from plaintiff's lands southerly, and approaches the surface of the ground and connects with, and is a part of, the gravel bed of the Coyote river, just below and in said lower gorge of said river. The plaintiff for years past has had a well on said land extending down into said stratum of gravel, through which he has pumped the water therefrom upon his land, and irrigated his orchard, and, if unable to do so, his orchard and land will be irreparably injured. The Coyote river rises to the eastward of the Santa Clara valley, in that portion of the Coast Range Mountains known as the Mt. Hamilton range. It is formed by the union of a number of smaller streams which rise and have their confluence south of Mt. Hamilton, and thence issues in the single stream of the Coyote river into the Santa Clara valley, through a narrow gorge, known as the upper gorge, about 20 miles south of the city of San Jose, and thence flows northerly along the eastern edge of the Santa Clara valley about 8 miles to the point where the valley narrows to what is known as the lower gorge, which lies about 12 miles south of the city of San Jose. The channel of the river passes through this lower gorge, and extends thence northward about 20 miles to the San Francisco Bay. The Coyote river has a watershed in that portion of the Mt. Hamilton range wherein it rises, of over 200 square miles, and supplies by far the greater portion of the underground or artesian waters of all that part of the Santa Clara valley which lies northerly of the lower gorge, and all the rain falling upon the watershed drains into the Coyote river before it enters the Santa Clara valley at the upper gorge. During a few days in times of freshets or high waters, much of the waters of said river runs in its bed from the upper gorge to the bay of San Francisco; but during some seasons freshets or high waters occur only to a limited extent, and in other seasons they do not occur at all; and at all times, whether they do or do not occur, a large portion of the waters of the river, and during the rainless months, substantially all thereof, sinks into said gravel stratum during its course to at least as far northerly as the city of San Jose, and flows or percolates through the said gravel stratum, and other gravel strata connected therewith, from and just below said lower gorge to at least as far northerly as the bay of San Francisco. Said waters keep said gravel stratum, and said other gravel strata connected therewith, full of water and under pressure, and the same rise up in plaintiff's said well from 55 to 63 feet above said stratum, the variation depending mainly upon the time of the year, and also upon the flow of water in the river, and said waters rise up in all the other wells which have been bored down to the said gravel strata connecting therewith. Between San Jose and the bay of San Francisco, such pressure causes the water in said gravel stratum, and the gravel strata connecting therewith, to actually overflow from the wells connected therewith in large quantities, making what is usually designated "flowing artesian wells." The largest of said flowing artesian wells are those nearest the bay of San Francisco, the waters in said gravel stratum and gravel strata connecting therewith, which furnish water for said last-named wells, being at a lower level below the level of said gorge, and under greater pressure from said waters so sinking in said stratum at said gorge, than are the waters in said gravel stratum and strata at points further south from said bay of San Francisco. At the lower gorge Santa Clara valley is only about 400 yards wide, and consists almost entirely of the gravel bed of the Coyote river, and said gravel bed of said river there extends through the lower gorge between the hills at that point, and extends down to the bed rock, lying from 35 to 165 feet below the surface of the gravel through such gorge, and on the surface of the gravel bed of said river, or underneath through the gravel bed thereof, all the waters of said river and of said watershed flow and percolate in a northerly direction, and all of said waters flowed or percolated through said gravel bed, underneath the surface thereof, at the date of commencing this action.

It is further found that at the time this action was commenced—January 9, 1904—defendant had sunk a shaft in the gravel bed of the Coyote river at the lower gorge, and was then installing powerful machinery and pumps, and intended therewith and by other means to divert substantially all of the surface and subsurface water of the river, amounting to some 20,000,000 gallons per day or more, prevent these waters from passing over said lower gorge northward, and carry them by pipes and other means from said point of diversion to other points, and sell the same as an article of merchandise, thus preventing them from returning to the river and supplying water to the gravel stratum in the land of plaintiff, which stratum, if they were so diverted by defendants would be without sufficient water to enable plaintiff to irrigate his orchard or land; that defendant corporation also intended to divert during a portion of each year a large portion of the surface waters of the Coyote river at points on the river before and after it emerged from the Mt. Hamilton range at the upper gorge, and above said lower gorge, and divert the same to other points for sale, and prevent any portion of the water from returning to the river or gravel bed thereof, and, generally, that the defendant corporation, unless restrained, threatened to divert and carry the waters of the river beyond their own lands for sale as merchandise, prevent them from returning to the river or gravel bed, with the result that any or all of these threatened and intended diversions would prevent these waters from flowing or percolating into the gravel stratum northerly of the lower gorge, and prevent plaintiff from having any water in his well with which to irrigate his orchard, and so cause irreparable damage to the same. Continuing, it is found that no material part of the waters underneath the land of plaintiff are supplied from any source other than the waters which fall upon the watershed of the Coyote river. The point where said river emerges at the upper gorge from said range of mountains into the side of the Santa Clara valley is about eight miles southeast from said lower gorge, and is over 100 feet higher than the lower gorge. Between these two points is that portion of said valley which is designated by the defendants in their answer as being known as the "Coyote Valley." This Coyote valley has therein very large strata of gravel, extending and descending continuously from the bed of the river at the upper gorge to the gravel in the river at the lower gorge. At the lower gorge the gravel extends from surface to bed rock, which, at its deepest point, is 165 feet deep. Through these gravels at the lower gorge flow about 20,000,000 gallons per day, a little more in the wet part of the year and a little less in the dry part of the year. The flow is supplied mainly from the said gravels of said Coyote valley; and those gravels are in turn constantly, but chiefly in the wet part of the year, supplied by the waters of said river after it emerges into said valley at the upper gorge. The waters of these very large strata of gravel in said Coyote valley slowly flow northward to said lower gorge, and through the same, and on down toward the bay, through said underground gravel strata, north of said lower gorge; and would soon, within two years at most, all flow through said gravels in said lower gorge, if they should receive no further supply from said river. No water is stored or impounded in the said gravels in said Coyote valley; but, though said gravels impede the flow of the water therein, it flows constantly and continuously through them and through the gravels in said lower gorge, and thence through said gravel strata north of said gorge. The defendant threatened and intended to build a dam across said lower gorge, with the bottom resting on bed rock, and extending to the surface of the gravel. This dam, if built, would effectually prevent any of the waters heretofore flowing through said gravels of said gorge from thereafter flowing or passing through the same. If defendants pump and extract no more water out of the gravels of said gorge than their present shafts, tunnels, pumps, and appliances now permit, still, if such amount of water as could now thereby be pumped, were pumped, the plane of the waters in the gravels below said gorge would be thereby lowered to such an extent that the same would be entirely below the bottom of said gravel stratum in plaintiff's lands, and plaintiff's said well would be thereby entirely deprived of water. Soon after heavy rains upon the watershed of the river, portions of the storm or flood waters of the river flow in its channel to the bay, for short periods of a few hours to a few days—the lengths of the periods being dependent upon the heaviness of the rainfall. Large portions of the storm waters flowing in the channel of the river sink into the gravel strata in and along the bed and banks of the channel. The volume of the storm waters flowing in the channel decreases, from a point near the upper gorge, to a point near the northern limits of San Jose, and from the latter point to the bay, the volume of the waters increases in case of very heavy rains, or of frequent heavy rains during any winter. A larger volume of storm waters sinks in the gravel strata in and along that part of the channel at or near the lower gorge, of the length of about two miles, than in the gravel strata in and along any other part of the channel. The waters, sinking into such gravel strata, flow and percolate into the several gravel strata underlying the surface of the Santa Clara valley, and among others the stratum penetrated by the plaintiff's well. The storm waters coming from a very heavy rain, or from frequent heavy rains during the winter, largely increase the flow and percolation of water into the gravel strata underlying the valley, and thereby the water in such strata and the pressure of the water therein are increased, and the water in the wells, including the plaintiff's well, rises, and wells are caused to flow, and flowing wells to increase their flow. Such increase of water, of its pressure, of its rise in and flow from the wells is proportionate to the volume of storm waters flowing in the channel of the river.

In addition the court found that from the evidence presented in the case it could not "determine with certainty what portion of the storm waters issuing from the upper gorge during any rainy season, or during any rain storm, sinks into the gravel strata underlying the valley; but more than one-third of the storm waters flowing during the last six years did so sink. Should those storm waters be prevented from flowing in the channel of the river below the upper gorge, and be diverted to places not within the valley, the gravel strata underlying the valley would be deprived of their usual supply of water, and within a short time—not more than two years—the wells penetrating those strata would not yield enough water for profitable or successful irrigation, and would not yield more water than the surface wells."

The decree entered perpetually enjoined the defendant corporation and its officers from arresting or obstructing at or above the lower gorge (except for the reasonable use thereof on the lands of the said corporation in the exercise of its riparian rights) any of the water of the Coyote river which, excepting for said arresting or diverting, would flow on the surface of the bed of said river through said gorge, or would flow or percolate through said gorge underneath the surface thereof.

On this appeal practically every finding of the court is challenged as not sustained by the evidence; it is also insisted that the court failed to find on certain material issues, and that the decree as made is erroneous for various reasons. The transcript on appeal consists of some 1,600 pages. The various briefs of counsel on both sides have exhaustively discussed the evidence applicable in support of, or against, the findings made, and by their excerpts therefrom, or by ready reference to it in their briefs, have facilitated our examination of it. The limits of a judicial opinion, however, will in many cases preclude a consideration in detail of findings where they are very many, and are all questioned, and particularly is this true when, as in this case, a careful examination of all the evidence satisfies us that the findings as made find ample support in it, and a discussion of it could only end in demonstrating that fact. We will, however, refer to the evidence supporting them in a general way; and, when we come to consider the attack made on the particular findings of the court as to the threats, intent, and conduct of the defendant respecting the diversion of the waters of the Coyote river, we will discuss the evidence applying to them more in detail.

There can be no doubt but that it was as clearly proven under the evidence as such matters can be proven that there are underlying a vast territory in the Santa Clara valley—some 20 miles square—numerous channels created by the Coyote river through its action in ages past when, in the building up and forming of the valley, its waters rushed in enormous quantities from the mountains, changing from one side of the valley to the other, and constantly varying its course in its flow through the lower gorge northward towards the bay of San Francisco. These old channels now lie beneath the surface of the valley at varying depths; channels beside channels, and channels crossing and interconnecting with each other, through each of which the Coyote river once flowed in its open course, but which are now underground channels filled with loose and coarse gravel, through which waters still flow, supplied to them through percolations from the Coyote river, with which these old gravel channels have always been connected, and that the particular underground channel or gravel stratum from which the well of plaintiff is supplied constitutes one of these old channels, which is likewise connected with and supplied from the waters of Coyote river. The intake of all these old channels, including that from which the plaintiff derives his water, is in the enormous bed of gravel extending several miles northerly below the lower gorge. For at least one mile below the lower gorge this deposit consists of pure gravel from surface to bed rock. Into this vast gravel bed during the winter and spring, when the storm waters gather between the upper and lower gorge and discharge themselves through the latter, there sink into these gravels immense quantities of water, in amount limited only by the extent of the rainfall, but in any season of flood extending largely into hundreds of millions of gallons per day, the evidence showing, when tests were made, that these intakes amounted in some seasons to from 300,000,000 to 500,000,000 gallons a day during a single storm. It is quite clear that these quantities of waters sink into the gravels and fill up the various branch channels underlying the valley, which connect with these gravels by the pressure of the storm waters passing over them, and the supply of these underground channels is obtained in no other way; and it is equally clear that the intake into these gravel beds and the gravel strata along the flow of the river generally is in proportion to the height and breadth of the storm waters passing over them, and the consequent pressure they exert to increase the percolation of the waters in the vast gravel bed and gravel strata. That the waters which lie in these old branch channels are supplied by the percolation of waters into the gravel beds and strata from the storm waters of the Coyote river is beyond question from the evidence, as it equally appears that the flow of these storm waters during the recurring heavy rains is absolutely necessary to sustain the supply of water thereto which would otherwise and in a few years be exhausted. That these underground gravel strata are connected with the river in these gravel beds at the lower gorge, and that their waters are thus supplied to these branch underground channels therefrom, and that the findings of the court to that effect are true appears not only from the evidence of the geological expert—Dr. Branner, whose qualification to testify on the subject was conceded, and who testified to that effect—but also from tests made in wells, and the testimony of well borers and well owners owning lands over these gravel strata and others speaking on the subject. Of course this supply from the rainfall and storm waters is augmented by the 20,000,000 gallons which year in and year out daily percolate over the gorge, and which is designated as the normal flow of the river, but it is quite evident that this quantity, of itself, and save for the immense quantities which are supplied by the annual storm waters, would not sufficiently meet the needs of those hundreds of property owners whose land is situated above the various old branch channels, all having their intake into the gravel beds at the lower gorge, and who draw water for their irrigation from wells sunk in these various water-bearing gravel strata. While it is true that this controversy concerns only the plaintiff and defendants, and must be disposed of by a consideration of their respective rights, yet, as bearing upon the correctness of the findings of the court as to the source of supply of these waters of plaintiff, we have a right to take into consideration the evidence which shows that these various water channels underlying square miles of territory in the Santa Clara valley all have their intake and ramify from the vast gravel beds extending for miles northerly from the lower gorge, that in instances they connect with each other, and that all are affected by the flow of the flood waters in proportion to their volume over the vast gravel beds which serve as an intake for them and supply the various underground branch streams over which these lands are situated. The test which was made, as well as the evidence of these various well owners, showing that the water in the hundreds of wells in the district in which lands overlie these various channels decreases in depth in the summer time while the irrigation season is active and increases in volume with the winter rains and flood waters, and increases in proportion as these floods are frequent and heavy or less frequent or light, and that this was the effect in all wells, including those situated on the channel in which Miller's well was situated, was sufficient of itself to warrant the finding of the court as to the sources from which the waters in the strata underneath Miller's land were supplied.

While it is insisted that the finding that Miller's well was in a stratum of gravel under pressure is not supported by the evidence, yet no good purpose can be subserved by discussing this point. The evidence shows that as a fact the well was sunk in a stratum under pressure, as the court found, but whether it was or not can make no difference in Miller's legal rights. The right of a person owning land upon a channel of underground water is not measured by whether the water is under pressure or not, but by considering whether the waters come to him in a natural defined flow so as to constitute a part or parcel of his lands, a matter which will be considered as we discuss the law applicable to this matter. It is further insisted that the Miller gravel stratum is supplied from other sources than the Coyote stream, and that the finding of the court that Miller's supply came from no other source is not supported by the evidence. About the only evidence rising above conjecture which could support this theory is that such waters might be supplied from a watershed of some eight square miles below the gorge. No other stream save the Coyote enters the region in which Miller's underground stratum is located. And comparing this watershed of 8 square miles with the Coyote watershed of some 200 square miles which the evidence does show contributes its waters to supply the Miller stratum and the other underground channels, this would appear to be too trivial to consider as a source of substantial supply. Dr. Branner, the geological expert heretofore referred to, testified that the water supply in Miller's channel all came from the gorge. This would seem to settle the question; but in any event it is a matter of no real consequence, as the evidence shows that plaintiff, in common with hundreds of others having wells sunk into the same strata, and who are being supplied from the same source (each being entitled to take only a reasonable amount), needs all the water which does come to this gravel channel from whatever source. Defendants cannot deprive him of any portion which gets to his gravel stratum simply because some of the necessary quantity may come from another source than the Coyote river. As all is needed from whatever source it comes, and comes by natural flow to the stratum, plaintiff is entitled, as against defendant, to it all.

We shall proceed now to a consideration of the claim of appellants that the findings of the court as to the threats, intentions, and conduct of defendants relative to the diversion of the waters of the Coyote river are not sustained by the evidence, and to the further claim of a failure to find on what are asserted to have been material issues, because these matters must be disposed of before any consideration of the legal propositions involved in the controversy can be had.

The court found that the defendants threatened and intended to take and divert, and, unless restrained by the court, would take and divert, all the waters of the Coyote river, both surface and subsurface, passing through said lower gorge, and which supplied water to the gravel stratum in which plaintiff had his well, and from which he extracted his waters for irrigation, and specified in its findings the means by which the appellants were attempting to accomplish this result. We see no room for questioning the sufficiency of these findings. The appellants had filed a notice of appropriation at the point of intended diversion on the banks of the Coyote river between the upper and lower gorges, claiming the appropriation of "the water of said Coyote river then flowing and to flow therein to the extent of 10,000 inches measured under a 4-inch pressure," to be diverted through "a canal * * * 120 feet wide upon the bottom and 8 feet deep below banks, or such other dimensions as may be necessary to carry such waters to reservoir sites." In terms this appropriation did not cover flood waters of the river, and, as applied to the waters therein occasioned by ordinary rains, would cover all of those waters, and would take all the waters which, after such rains, passed through the lower gorge and into the gravel beds below it. Subsequently another notice was filed appropriating "500,000 inches measured under a 4-inch pressure." This applied in terms to the flood waters, and, as the records show, would, except in one instance, have far exceeded the amount of any flood waters which flowed in the river. This appropriation of such a vast amount was evidently intended, as counsel for appellants state in their brief, to cover the "peak" rate of flow, and necessarily the peak rate of flow would embrace the entire flow of any flood waters. In fact, the appellants are now here insisting that they have a right to take and appropriate the flood waters of the river. So much for the surface waters. As far as the subsurface waters of the Coyote valley are concerned, it is conceded by appellants that they amount approximately to some 20,000,000 gallons per day. Yet that appellants intend to abstract all these waters, and at the commencement of this action were taking means to do so, is quite apparent. They had contracted for pumps to be operated in the gorge, of a combined lifting capacity of 20,000,000 gallons of water a day for the first 90 feet in the gorge; they had sunk a caisson or shaft at the lower gorge, with tunnels extending towards its bank on either side, and had installed two pumps with a demonstrated capacity, at the least, of raising 10,000,000 gallons a day. They had also bored three strings of wells across the lower gorge to bed rock as "trial dam site lines," with the obvious purpose of constructing a submerged dam from bed rock to the surface of the gravel at the lower gorge, and thus prevent the flow of any of this 20,000,000 gallons of water to the gravels through the lower gorge.

Beyond all this, however, and as applying to both surface and subsurface waters, in two letters of the appellants to the board of supervisors of the city and county of San Francisco they offered to deliver 68,000,000 gallons of water per day from the Coyote river at the lower gorge under gravity pressure, and to bring the supply up to 70,000,000 gallons per day, if necessary. All this they asserted their ability to do by reason of alleged ownership and control of the entire watershed of the Coyote river of 300 square miles with adequate and desirable reservoir sites, the retaining capacity of these several reservoirs amounting to from 50,000,000,000 to 60,000,000,000 gallons, not including an underground reservoir or cone (as they claimed) capable of withstanding a daily draft of 20 or more millions of pure filtered water to be augmented, if necessary, by discharging into it waters from the watershed and reservoirs. All these waters were to be concentrated in the lower gorge, and by means of power generated by the fall of waters impounded in the mountain reservoirs were to be brought to a sufficient elevation at the lower gorge, so that by gravity pressure they could be brought to the southern limits of the city and county of San Francisco.

Taking all of these facts into consideration, there is no room for question but that the court was sufficiently warranted in finding that the intention of defendants was to divert, unless restrained by the court, all the waters of the Coyote river, both surface and subsurface, and, as far as their acts disclose, that they intended to do so by the means and methods the court found were being employed or contemplated. This disposes of the attack on the findings made by the court as far as we deem it necessary to particularly consider them.

Now, as to the claim that the court failed to find upon material issues raised by the answer of defendants, namely, that they did not intend to divert any portion of the surface waters of the Coyote river, "except or other than a portion of the storm or flood waters, which, for a very short period in every year, rushed in great volumes and with great velocity down the channel of said river to the bay of San Francisco and are wasted and lost therein." It is not clear from this averment what is meant by "storm" or "flood" waters "wasted and lost in the bay." It is not a clear allegation that they were anywhere lost and wasted in the river, which, of course, is where the appellants intended to divert them. But assuming that it was; that, in effect, it amounted to an averment that the waters which appellants intended, and which they claimed a right, to divert were the storm waters which were lost and wasted at the point of diversion because they could serve no useful purpose in their flow through the lower gorge to the bay of San Francisco—still there was no evidence introduced by the appellants to support this allegation. The owner of land having an underground water-bearing stratum supplied by the flood waters of a stream has a primary right to the full flow of such waters, in order to bring his stratum up to its water-bearing capacity. In torrential streams, such as the Coyote river, floods vary in extent with different seasons and in different years, and those of one season or one year may be insufficient to supply the underground stratum connected with the stream, while those of another season or year may be more than sufficient. While the owner of the underground stratum is only entitled to the flow of the flood waters to the extent that they may replenish his water-bearing stratum, still his right to the accustomed flood flow of the stream for that purpose is paramount to that of the right of an appropriator to divert any of the waters for use beyond the watershed. If the accustomed flow is more than necessary to supply the underground stratum, the burden of proof is upon the appropriator seeking to appropriate the surplus to show that there is a surplus. In the case at bar the burden of proof was upon the defendants, setting up a claim to an alleged portion or surplus of flood waters upon the ground that such waters were wasted or lost waters, to prove that fact. In the absence of such proof, a finding on the averment was not necessary. Senter v. Senter, 70 Cal. 619, 11 Pac. 782; Murphy v. Bennett, 68 Cal. 528, 9 Pac. 738; Gregory v. Gregory, 102 Cal. 52, 32 Pac. 364.

Aside from this, however, if it was intended to allege that a portion of these storm waters were wasted and lost waters at the point of intended diversion, the court found that they were not in those findings which we have recited, to the effect that the storm waters after passing the lower gorge sunk into the vast gravel beds below it, and flowed into the several strata underlying the surface of the Santa Clara valley, and among others the stratum penetrated by the well of plaintiff, that the pressure of these storm waters largely increased the flow and percolation of water into the said underlying strata, and that "such increase of water, of its pressure, of its rise into and flow from the wells, is proportionate to the volume of the storm waters flowing in the channel of the river," and that if defendants should divert a portion of said waters at the gorge, or at other places above the gorge, plaintiff would be prevented from having enough water in said gravel stratum underneath his land to irrigate his orchard, or any considerable part thereof. These are clear findings that there was no "waste or loss" of the storm waters until, at least, they had served the essential and necessary purpose of supplying to plaintiff their force and volume in forcing such supply into the vast gravel beds in which the various underlying strata referred to had their intakes, and had flowed over these gravels on their way to the bay.

Nor can there be any ground of complaint that the court did not make any finding as to the exact amount of flood waters of the Coyote river which sunk and became part of the waters underlying the lands of plaintiff, or as to the exact amount of flood waters which did not sink, but passed over the gravel beds in which these underlying strata had their intakes and were wasted and lost in the bay of San Francisco. There was no issue as to any amount or exact proportion of these waters which sunk or did not sink; the defendants asserting simply a right to divert at or near the lower gorge a portion of the storm waters which rushed down the channel of the river to the bay, and, as they alleged, became lost and wasted therein. The complaint alleged that defendants were threatening and intending to divert and carry away "the waters of said Coyote river" beyond their own lands and prevent the same from ever returning to the river or flowing through the gravel within the gorge and supplying the gravel stratum in which plaintiff's well was sunk, thereby depriving him of waters to irrigate his land, and so irreparably damaging his land and orchard. This allegation that they were threatening and intending to take "the waters" of the river was, in effect, an allegation that they intended to divert all the waters thereof. The court on sufficient evidence, as we have already shown, found all these particular allegations of the complaint to be true, and was a full finding of the quantity of storm waters which the defendant intended to take, namely, all of them, even if it be assumed that an issue were made on the matter of quantity.

It is true that in another paragraph of the complaint it is alleged that the defendants "will divert a large portion of the surface waters of the Coyote river," accompanied by immediate further allegations that such diversion will prevent the flow of sufficient water to the well of plaintiff with which to irrigate his land. This allegation, as far as it alleged an intention on the part of defendants to divert a "large portion" of the surface waters of the river, was not denied by defendants. In fact, they asserted such a right. The court found that they so intended, and found that if they were permitted to do so, it would prevent the well of plaintiff from being supplied with sufficient water for the purposes of irrigation. The plaintiff undoubtedly had, as against the defendants, a paramount right to have the flood waters supply by their flow, force, and volume the artesian stratum in which his well was sunk; and, as the court found that if a "large portion" of these flood waters serving that purpose was diverted by defendants, the gravel stratum in which plaintiff's well is situated would be deprived of water to his irreparable injury, this finding was sufficient to sustain the judgment independent of any finding as to the exact quantity measured in second feet, or gallons, which went to make up this portion. The plaintiff being entitled to recover if deprived of his right to a full supply of his gravel stratum by the diversion of a "large portion" of flood waters, the exact quantity taken was immaterial, and the omission to find on an issue which in no event could affect the right of plaintiff to recover on the facts as found will not warrant a reversal of the judgment. Gregory v. Gregory, 102 Cal. 52, 36 Pac. 364.

Having disposed of (as far as we deem consideration necessary) the attack on the findings and the claim of alleged want of findings, and being satisfied that there is no merit in the points made relative thereto, we come now to a consideration of the legal principles involved on the appeal.

It is insisted by the appellants, first, that as the plaintiff is a nonriparian owner, he has no right to enjoin to any extent the diversion of the waters of the stream by an appropriator, on the ground that the stream contributes percolating waters to his nonriparian lands; and, secondly, even if he has, the court was not warranted in enjoining the defendants, as appropriators, from appropriating the flood waters of the Coyote river which they claim waste themselves in the bay, in order that another portion of the flood waters may continue to sink into the subsurface gravels and supply percolating waters to his nonriparian lands.

As an abstract proposition of law, applied to the concrete facts in this case, the contention of appellants is that, notwithstanding it is clearly established that the waters, surface and subsurface, which either flow or percolate through the channel of the Coyote river, at or above the lower gorge, pass through well-defined artesian gravel strata in the Santa Clara valley connected with the stream itself, and furnish a supply of water for irrigation to a territory to which its use is essential, still that territory can be deprived of this inestimable benefit by an appropriator seeking to divert all the waters of the river away from the stream as a commercial proposition, thus rendering the lands overlying the various artesian strata valueless, and that owners of these superimposed lands have no rights which are invaded, and hence no right to apply for an injunction to restrain such a diversion.

The principal stress of the argument of appellants against the right of plaintiff to restrain their diversion of the waters flowing through the lower gorge and percolating into the subterranean stratum under the land of plaintiff is based on the claim that plaintiff is not an owner of land riparian to the stream, who would be entitled to a flow of its waters, but is simply an owner of land situated above percolating waters supplied in part by percolation from the stream, who has no rights against an appropriator. This is, in effect, a contention that the rule at common law applicable to percolating waters, which gave an owner of land all that lay beneath it, with a right to interrupt and take away waters passing to his neighbors' wells—the doctrine of cujus est solum—governs the respective rights of plaintiff and defendants.

But whatever the extent to which that doctrine may have heretofore obtained in this state, at least ever since the decision in Katz v. Walkinshaw, 141 Cal. 116, 70 Pac. 663, 74 Pac. 766, 64 L. R. A. 236, 99 Am. St. Rep. 35, it has been modified by the application of the more reasonable doctrine of sic utere tuo as to percolating waters.

It would be a waste of time to particularly discuss the reasons which impelled the modification of the common-law doctrine of an absolute right in each landholder (and as an appropriator the appellants insist upon this right) to abstract all percolating waters under his land and dispose of them as he saw fit, without regard to what extent he might deplete these waters under the lands of his neighbors. The climatic conditions of this state, the great stretches of arid and semiarid lands, the uncertainty of the seasons and varying rainfall, the necessity of irrigation, and the vast superiority of underground waters as a steady and ready means of irrigation over the uncertainty of a similar supply from a surface stream which, in many instances, becomes dry at the very time when irrigation is necessary; the vast areas of land brought under cultivation and production by irrigation, and additional areas still to be improved by it; the enormous draft which this constant improvement and cultivation makes on a supply which is limited, and which will become inadequate for all as population increases and additional lands are to be brought under cultivation and improved by irrigation—these, and many other causes, impelled a departure from the old doctrine and a limitation of it, and the adoption of the just principle that a common and essential necessity—water—when supplied to well-defined strata from whatever source, should be preserved to lands overlying them for reasonable use upon them.

In Katz v. Walkinshaw, supra, in the opinion written by the late Justice Temple, and in that written by Justice Shaw upon a rehearing (granted for further argument), the necessity for the modification of the cujus est solum doctrine as inapplicable to the conditions in this state was fully discussed, announced, and applied. In that case the defendant had sunk wells in the same artesian belt underlying the lands of plaintiff, and in which his irrigation wells were sunk, and was diverting the water for sale to lands distant from the saturated belt from which the artesian waters were derived. Defendant asserted there, like appellants as appropriators do now, that as these were percolating waters, he had under the common-law rule to which we have just adverted, an absolute right to abstract them to any extent he saw fit, and to use them anywhere he pleased, notwithstanding it would result in depriving the well of plaintiff of any supply for irrigation. The common-law rule was rejected as inapplicable to the conditions in this state, and the rule of sic utere tuo announced, and, applying it, it was held that the rights of the parties in the suit to take these particular waters were correlative, and that the defendant could not divert them for sale elsewhere so as to prevent plaintiff from obtaining a reasonable supply for irrigation and other ordinary uses upon his land. The doctrine thus announced in this pioneer case has been subsequently followed, so that the rule is now settled beyond further question. See McClintock v. Hudson, 141 Cal. 281, 74 Pac. 849; Cohen v. La Canada, 142 Cal. 437, 76 Pac. 47; Montecito, etc., Co. v. Santa Barbara, 144 Cal. 584, 77 Pac. 1113; Verdugo Canyon Water Co. v. Verdugo, 152 Cal. 655, 93 Pac. 1021; Burr v. Maclay, 154 Cal. 439, 98 Pac. 260; Hudson v. Dailey, 105 Pac. 748.

But, it is insisted by appellants that this rule only applies as to correlative rights of different persons owning lands overlying the same plane of percolating waters, and does not apply so as to entitle a nonriparian owner, although the stratum underlying his land is directly supplied by waters percolating from the stream to prevent the diversion of the waters of the stream by an appropriator. The precise question as to the respective rights of an appropriator of water to be used beyond the watershed, and of one claiming an uninterrupted flow of these waters to supply, by percolation, a water-bearing stratum underneath his land and connected with the stream, has not been heretofore presented. But there are general principles of law which have been applied as between other appropriators of the stream waters and claimants to the flow or to the percolating waters of the stream which are equally applicable as between the parties to this action. It is true in this case that the plaintiff is not a riparian owner, but neither does it appear, as far as their rights are here asserted, that appellants are. They are only asserting rights as appropriators under a claim that they have appropriated all the surplus waters of the Coyote river, and are entitled to certain impounded waters between the gorges. Be that as it may, however, as far as any waters of the river are concerned (there being no impounded waters), we do not perceive that the fact that the plaintiff is not a riparian owner can affect his rights as against the appellants. As between riparian owners, it is conceded, as the law declares, that one riparian owner is not entitled to divert the waters of a stream for use at some distant point for commercial purposes so as to prevent another riparian owner to whom they would otherwise be available from using them on his lands, and it is established by the authorities to which we have heretofore referred that, as between owners of land overlying a common substratum of percolating water, this cannot be done. This being so, we perceive no reason why the same rule should not be applied as between owners of land overlying a substratum of water directly connected with either the surface or subsurface flow of the stream, and deriving practically its exclusive supply from that source. The theory upon which the right of a riparian owner to be protected in the use of the waters of a stream to which his lands are riparian is that, nature having given these lands the benefit of the flow, and the natural advantage of its use on the lands, one riparian owner may not divert these waters to lands not riparian, to the injury of another riparian owner who can use them. The same principle has been applied, as we have seen, to the use of waters as between the owners of lands, overlying a common stratum of percolating waters. And we perceive no reason why the same principle should not be applied as between an appropriator of the waters of a stream to be taken beyond the watershed for commercial purposes and the owners of lands overlying an artesian stratum which is conclusively shown to be so connected with the stream as to derive its supply of water by percolation therefrom to this stratum. Why, in principle, should there be any distinction? With the common-law doctrine modified to meet the conditions in this state necessitating it, and modified so as to preserve to each owner of lands overlying a common stratum of percolating waters a right to a fair and reasonable use of these waters of which their lands have a natural advantage, no reason suggests itself why the same rule should not apply as between the appropriators of the waters of a stream for use elsewhere than on riparian lands and the owners of lands overlying a water-bearing channel, so directly connected with the stream as to be supplied by percolation from it. The conditions in all cases are analogous as far as the natural supply of waters is available for use upon the lands concerned, whether the lands be riparian to the stream or overlying a common subterranean stratum, or whether the underlying strata are connected and supplied directly from the flow of the stream itself. In either case there is a natural supply of water of which the lands by reason of their location, either as riparian or above a common subterranean stratum, or as lying over a water-bearing stratum supplied by percolation from the stream, have a natural advantage to the use of the waters. Lands are invariably purchased in view of the benefits which they may derive from being riparian to a stream or overlying well-supplied strata of water, the right to the flow or extraction of which is a part and parcel of the land, and there is no rational basis for any distinction between the classes as to the right to prevent a diversion of waters for use elsewhere, whether it be attempted by a riparian owner against another riparian owner, or by one owner of land over a common stratum of underlying water against another owner, or by an appropriator of the waters of a stream as against the owner of land overlying the water-bearing stratum directly supplied by percolation from the stream. As far as the owner of lands overlying a gravel stratum is concerned, it makes no difference in his rights, as against an appropriator of the water, from what source the supply comes which directly supplies his water-bearing stratum—whether from a stream or a saturated plane or other body of water which by natural flow or percolation, either surface or subterranean, clearly supplies his underground stratum. It would present an anomalous condition of the law were it the rule that, while a riparian owner may prevent an appropriator from diverting to his injury the waters of the stream for use beyond the watershed, and one owner of land overlying a common stratum of percolating water may restrain another owner similarly situated from making a like diversion, the owner of lands whose underlying stratum of water is directly and clearly supplied by percolation from the waters of the stream, and who will be greatly injured by a diversion, is not entitled to prevent it. There is no reason or any difference in the rule between the classes and none should exist. Such landowner has a right to restrain a diversion from the stream or saturated plane, or other well-defined supply, by an appropriator or any one else who seeks to divert such stream or other supplying waters from their natural percolating flow, for use elsewhere than upon lands to which, as waters of the stream, they are riparian, or which, as waters of an underground stratum, may reasonably and usefully be applied to the overlying land. Under this rule, as far as the artesian stratum of plaintiff, which is a well-defined one, and has its intake in the vast bed of gravel in the lower gorge, is supplied by the surface waters of the Coyote river passing over said gorge and percolating to the stratum, or is supplied by the subsurface waters in the Coyote valley between the upper and lower gorge (assuming for present purposes that these may not be considered as a part of the river), which pass over the lower gorge and percolate through the gravels below and into the artesian stratum of plaintiff, or as far as the stratum is supplied by percolation from both of these sources, the right of plaintiff to have the flow of these waters in his stratum uninterrupted is paramount to the right of defendants to divert them for use elsewhere, as the court found they intended to do, to the irreparable injury of plaintiff, and plaintiff was entitled to a decree enjoining such diversion.

But it is insisted by appellants that if the plaintiff has a right to enjoin the diversion of the waters of the stream which would otherwise percolate to and supply the artesian stratum underlying his land, the court was not warranted in enjoining the appellants from diverting the flood waters of the Coyote river, which it was claimed were wasted and lost in the bay of San Francisco. There can be no question but that an appropriator of water may divert for use, to any point beyond the watershed, any portion of the waters of a stream which can serve no useful purpose either to the riparian owners, or, in the instant case, any waters of the Coyote river which might serve no such purposes in supplying the underground stratum of plaintiff, or which are in excess of the quantity necessary for that purpose. Fifield v. Spring Valley Waterworks, 130 Cal. 552, 62 Pac. 1054.

But it is quite obvious that merely because waters are flood or storm waters of a stream —that is, on account of unusual rains the waters of a stream are increased beyond the normal flow—these flood or storm waters are not therefore surplus waters of the stream which serve no useful purpose, and are subject to appropriation. What are called the storm waters of the Coyote river are not waters which are precipitated over the lower gorge only in occasional seasons. They are generally of annual occurrence, and flow at great height and breadth over the deep, porous gravel beds below the lower gorge, although they last but a short time. They are confined to the general channel of the stream, as the banks of the Coyote river are of great height, in some places as high as 38 feet, and within the memory of man no overflow of the river until it gets to the low land near the bay has ever been known. But even if these storms are of short duration, and the waters are precipitated with great rapidity into the bay, they cannot be said, for that reason alone, to be waste waters, or subject to appropriation. They are only waste waters, and capable of appropriation as such, if they serve no useful purpose as storm waters. But in the case at bar there can be no question but that the flood waters perform, not only a useful, but an indispensable, service in pressing into the gravel beds or trough at the lower gorge, by their great breadth and enormous weight, a large portion of the waters which go to supply the various artesian strata, including that of plaintiff which have their intake therein. The extent to which these waters sink into these gravels below that gorge depends upon and is proportioned to the pressure exerted by the breadth and volume of the storm waters. The subsurface flow of 20,000,000 gallons per day does not keep up the supply, and that supply is augmented and is only partially kept up by the waters which are forced into the gravels at the lower gorge by the pressure of the flood waters. There are some years when there are no flood waters at all, and years when such floods as come are comparatively small, and there are also dry years occasioned through less than the ordinary rainfall. In every year when there are no floods, and in every dry year, the waters in these gravels suffer additional depletion on account of the extent of the drafts for irrigation, which are necessarily made upon them to meet the deficiency in the rainfall, and this depletion is only partly restored by the flood waters of subsequent years. The water plane in these gravels, and consequently in the various strata to which it is supplied, is, as the evidence shows, gradually lowering. Neither the gravels nor these underground strata have been completely filled since a season of unusual rains in the years 1861–62, when the flood waters brought them up to their full water-bearing capacity, and hence there was a surplus of flood waters which may be said to have served no useful purpose, and were wasted in the bay. Since then, on account of the increase of population and the improvement of the valley, the high state of cultivation to which lands have been and are being brought on account of their susceptibility to irrigation from these underground artesian strata and the consequent vast drafts made by the increasing number of wells sunk therein, the water plane, by continuous and extensive irrigation during the summer seasons, has been and is yearly gradually being lowered so that the flood waters, even to the extent to which they contribute of themselves to replenish the supply and under the pressure of their breadth and volume affect it, still do not bring these artesian strata up to near their full capacity. And the extent to which these artesian strata are now supplied, which is less than their full capacity, and which must be still further depleted as additional lands are brought into cultivation and irrigation from wells sunk into them, is, in addition to this daily supply of 20,000,000 gallons always flowing through the lower gorge, derived solely from the storm waters, and is supplied in proportion to their breadth and volume. It is quite obvious that, as the storm waters flowing over the gravels of the lower gorge do not, even under their enormous pressure, now bring the various artesian strata having their intake therein up to their full capacity, and in the nature of things must be further depleted as additional well drafts are made upon it, to permit them to be diverted at or near the lower gorge must inevitably deprive the various gravel strata, including that of plaintiff, of their usual water supply, and, as the court found, these strata within a few years would not yield enough water for profitable or successful irrigation, nor yield more water than the surface wells. As it appears, therefore, that all these flood waters, either by partially sinking into the gravels, or by their breadth and weight causing an increased sinking surface, are inadequate to fully supply the underground waters in these artesian strata, it is quite clear that it cannot be said that any portion of them are waste or lost waters which the appellants are entitled to divert from the stream above the lower gorge. All these waters are necessary, of themselves or by their force, to supply the underground waters, which they, even now, fail to do to the full capacity of the underlying strata, to which full capacity the plaintiff and others interested in them are entitled. Performing this necessary and indispensable service which could not be supplied without them, no part of them can be said to be waste waters until they have performed it, as far as they are capable of doing so, and have passed over the gravels on their way to the bay. This seems to be so plain as to require no further particular discussion. If at any time these flood waters, or any portion of them, can be characterized as waste waters in their flow from the upper gorge towards the bay, it certainly is not while they are in the river above the lower gorge where appellants desire to divert them. If they become waste waters, it is only after they have passed the gravels at the lower gorge, and have performed the necessary and useful purpose of supplying them, and the artesian strata connected with them, as far as they are capable of doing so, and from there are rushing towards the bay. We are not prepared to say that, even in their flow after passing the gravels in which the intake to these artesian strata lie, they serve no other useful purpose, but certainly these storm waters do not become waste until they have flowed over these gravel beds and are on their way to the bay. It is only there that it may be said that they can perform no further useful service, the only place where they first become waste waters, and where, without apparently invading the rights of anyone, they may be diverted. No reasonable objection could be made to the diversion of the waters by the appellants there because they are then, for all practical purposes, waste waters. But it is quite clear that this is the only point on the stream where it can be said, as far as plaintiff is concerned, that they are waste waters.

Coming now to a consideration of the objections of appellants to the decree.

It is insisted that the court should have secured the appellants in the right to divert the waters from the gravels of the lower gorge to the extent that their present shaft, pump, and appliances would permit. There can be no question but that the plaintiff brought this action for an injunction to restrain this particular diversion of the waters as soon as it reasonably appeared that the proposed diversion, by the pump and appliances of appellants as installed and operated, would affect the supply of water in his artesian stratum. So the appellants were not entitled to be secured in the operation of their plant and their diversion of water by that means on the ground that the plaintiff stood by and permitted the development of water to be made to successful operation, having reasonable cause to believe that it would affect his water supply (Katz v. Walkinshaw, supra); and, as the court found by evidence sustaining the fact that, if permitted to proceed with such pumping with the appliances as installed, the plane of water in the gravel below the lower gorge would be lowered to such an extent that it would be below the intake of the gravel stratum in the land of plaintiff, and his well thereby be entirely deprived of water, the court properly enjoined the further operation of said pump and appliances.

It is further insisted that the court should have framed a decree permitting the appellants to store waters of the watershed in reservoirs in the mountains above the lower gorge, and require them in each season to permit 5,500,000,000 gallons to pass the upper gorge in such quantities as would allow it to sink into the gravels below the lower gorge. This claim is made on the theory that this would exceed in amount that which is contributed to the gravels below the lower gorge by the sinking of the flood waters. The respondent questions the accuracy of this estimate and the feasibility of this plan, as well as the power of the court to so frame a decree respecting the matter as will give the court immediate and effectual control of the acts of the defendants so as to see that it is carried out, and to prevent injury to those relying upon the underground supply as nature gives it for the irrigation of their lands—an injury which would be the inevitable result of any delay or failure in turning in the amount specified. It is insisted, too, that the right of this plaintiff to the waters percolating through his land is a vested right, and that the right to have the flow of the flood waters contribute to this percolating supply is equally a vested right, which the court has no authority to permit to be disturbed or of which the plaintiff may be deprived except under condemnation proceedings and upon payment therefor. Other objections to such a decree are also urged, which it is unnecessary to state. Nor do we deem discussion or decision upon any of them necessary, because, in the state of the pleadings and proofs in the case, we do not think the court erred in failing to make a decree as suggested by appellants, even if under them the court had the right to do so. This case was not tried on the theory that the appellants were entitled to any such decree. There is nothing in the pleadings in the case remotely suggesting that the court should make such a decree, or that the appellants would be satisfied with it if it did; nor was any evidence presented in the case addressed to the making of any such decree. The trial court was neither advised under the pleadings, nor was suggestion made on the trial, that such a decree was proper. The claim of appellants was against the right of plaintiff to any relief or protection whatever against the diversion of the waters of the Coyote river, either surface or subsurface. They insisted in the trial court, and likewise insist here, that plaintiff, not being a riparian owner, had no right to prevent the diversion of the waters of the river, either the normal surface flow or the subsurface flow, or any percolating water, and that, as far as the storm waters were concerned, they had a right to divert, above the lower gorge, all the waters that flowed down to the bay of San Francisco, irrespective of any benefit they afforded in filling the gravels below the lower gorge and supplying the artesian stratum of plaintiff which had its intake therein. Asserting that plaintiff had no right to have these waters supply his artesian stratum under nature's plan they now ask that the decree of the trial court be reversed because that tribunal did not adopt an artificial plan, which was not suggested by the pleadings, to which no proof was particularly addressed, nor the trial court asked to make, and which is, for the first time in the case, suggested here, and then as a ground for reversal. Under the circumstances stated the appellants, if they had been entitled to such a decree under proper pleadings and proof, are in no position now to complain because it was not made by the trial court. As the appellants did not assert any right to impound the storm waters and release them in any given quantity to the gravels below the gorge so as to supply plaintiff's and the other artesian strata, but asserted that plaintiff had no right to any of these waters, but that appellants had a perfect right to divert and use them all, they cannot be heard to complain that the court did not embrace in its decree a plan which they had never asserted a specific right to, or asked to be made. Huffner v. Sawday, 153 Cal. 86, 93, 94 Pac. 424.

This disposes of the principal attack of appellants against the findings upon the claim of an alleged want of findings, and relative to their objections to the decree. Several other points are made, which, while we have examined them, we do not think of sufficient importance to command particular discussion.

We are satisfied that the findings as made are sustained by the evidence, and the decree supported by the findings, and the judgment and order appealed from are therefore affirmed.

We concur: ANGELLOTTI, J.; SLOSS, J.; MELVIN, J; HENSHAW, J.

SHAW, J. I concur in the judgment and in the opinion of Justice LORIGAN. I believe, however, that the claim of defendants to the so-called waste flood waters may well be decided on the merits. A well-established, but infrequently used, principle of the law of injunctions is peculiarly applicable to the case. Beach on Injunctions states it thus: "When an injunction to restrain a nuisance will produce great public or private mischief, a court of equity is not bound to grant it merely for the purpose of protecting a technical or unsubstantial right." Volume 2, § 1067. High on Injunctions gives it in this form: "The court may properly be guided by the consideration of the relative convenience of the parties; and, if it appears that the benefit resulting to the plaintiff from the granting of the writ will be slight as compared to the injury to the defendant, the relief may be denied, and the plaintiff left to the pursuit of his remedy at law." Volume 2 (4th Ed.) § 470. See, also, Peterson v. Santa Rosa, 119 Cal. 391, 51 Pac. 557; Jacob v. Day, 111 Cal. 571, 580, 44 Pac. 243, for applications of the principle.

This principle is stated in these authorities with reference to the refusal of an injunction. It is a flexible rule, however, and it will apply to either party, and to the granting or refusal of the injunction, according to the circumstances of the particular case. And in the varying conditions to be found in the different parts of this state this adaptability makes it of the greater value, if wisely administered. In many parts of the state, especially in the large interior valleys, practically all the flood waters are waste waters. They contribute little or nothing to the saturation of any subterranean gravel beds which are resorted to for a supply of water for useful purposes. They rush in great volume to the sea, carrying destruction in their path, and overflowing the low lands to the great damage of the owners, serving no useful purpose whatever. If they were stored in reservoirs, they might be made to serve a triple purpose. The extreme floods and consequent overflow and destruction would be prevented; the stored water could be used to irrigate large areas of valley land, now left unproductive for lack of water; if distributed upon the plains, for irrigation, a large portion of these waters would in due course of time find their way, by seepage and percolation, to the channels of the streams, giving an increased and more regular flow in the summer months, increasing the amount available for irrigation in the smaller streams, and bettering the navigation of the large rivers—all of which would add tremendously to the growth, prosperity, and wealth of the state, and to its ability to support the large population which its climate and productions attract. The question of the right to store such flood waters, and the terms upon which it can be obtained or exercised, is of the greatest importance to the future welfare of the state. In such parts of the state an injunction to prevent the storage of such flood waters might, perhaps, as a general thing, be properly denied.

But in the case at bar the conditions above described do not exist. The reverse is true. The Santa Clara valley presents conditions not paralleled elsewhere in the state, except it may be in the San Fernando valley, in which is found similar gravel beds, kept supplied by similar flood waters and rainfall, the use of which water is secured to the city of Los Angeles by its ancient pueblo right. In the Santa Clara valley a large community has settled upon the lands over the gravel beds in question, and, by the use of the waters stored therein, has made probably the richest and most productive region of equal size in the state. Plaintiff is but one of these, but he represents a large population engaged in like pursuits. The property of every one of them would be jeopardized by a diminution of the waters that go into this underground reservoir. The floods in which it can be asserted with any reasonable assurance that waste occurs are infrequent. They come at intervals of several years, and generally the waste water is small and practically indeterminable. The right to obtain such small quantities at such wide intervals for storage in open reservoirs, where evaporation would dissipate a large part during the time it would have to be stored to be made of real use, would be of little value, and probably of none at all. It is obvious from the whole case that the individual defendants never would have inaugurated their enterprise with nothing in view but the privilege of ascertaining, storing, and using these chance waste waters. It would be impracticable and unprofitable. The giving of a decree permitting the storage of such water as could be ascertained to be thus wasted, on the rare occasions when there is any waste, and the refusal of an injunction against such storage, would be of no substantial benefit to the defendants, and would have no practical effect, except to render the rights of a large number of persons more precarious, and their property less valuable, and possibly less productive. In view of all these circumstances I am of the opinion that the injunction was properly extended to include all the waters in controversy.

Ex parte MOORE. (Cr. 156.)

(Court of Appeal, Second District, California. Dec. 13, 1909.)

CRIMINAL LAW (§ 982*)—SUSPENDING SENTENCE — IMPRISONMENT UNDER ORIGINAL JUDGMENT.

The court suspending the sentence of imprisonment in jail imposed on one convicted of crime may thereafter order the issuance of a commitment, and direct the imprisonment of accused under the original judgment.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 2500, 2501; Dec. Dig. § 982.*]

Application by Clara Moore for a writ of habeas corpus for her discharge under a commitment directing her imprisonment on a conviction of crime. Writ dismissed, and petitioner remanded.

S. A. D. Gray, for petitioner. H. B. Alexander, Deputy Dist. Atty., for respondent.

PER CURIAM. Application for writ of habeas corpus.

Petitioner was arrested upon a charge of vagrancy, and on the 18th day of March, 1909, entered a plea of guilty, and was sentenced by the court to serve 180 days in the city jail of Los Angeles. Sentence was suspended "to leave city." Thereafter, on October 19, 1909, the defendant was brought before the court charged with violating the terms of the suspended sentence. Thereupon the court ordered a commitment to issue, and directed the imprisonment of petitioner under the original judgment. This writ is prosecuted by petitioner to obtain her discharge under said last-named order of the court.

Upon the application for this writ the same was issued upon the theory presented to us that the petitioner had been paroled under the provisions of the act of March 13, 1909 (St. 1909, c. 232), and that, after the expiration of the term of the original sentence, the court had undertaken to revoke the order of probation and directed the execution of the original judgment. Upon the hearing, however, and an examination of the record, we find that no question connected with the probation law is involved, but, on the contrary, that the case presented is identical with that of Ex parte Collins, reported in 8 Cal. App. 367, 97 Pac. 188, upon the authority of which case, and for the reasons there assigned, the writ is ordered dismissed and prisoner remanded.

HOLLYWOOD UNION HIGH SCHOOL DIST. et al. v. KEYES, County Clerk. (Civ. 777.)

(Court of Appeal, Second District, California. Dec. 14, 1909.)

1. SCHOOLS AND SCHOOL DISTRICTS (§ 97*)—BONDS—OFFER AND ISSUANCE—CONTRACT.

Under Pol. Code, § 1745, which authorizes the issuance of high school district bonds, the proposal and offer to issue bonds of certain kind and character and the purchase thereof is a contract in which the taxpayer and the purchaser are parties, and the minds of the parties must meet to make it valid.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Schools and School Districts, Cent. Dig. § 227; Dec. Dig. § 97.*]

2. SCHOOLS AND SCHOOL DISTRICTS (§ 97*)—BONDS—NOTICE OF ELECTION—PAYMENT OF INTEREST.

Under Pol. Code, § 1745, which authorizes the issuance of high school district bonds, and provides for the posting of notices of the election and what the notice shall contain, the omission to designate the times of payment of interest in the notice is fatal to the validity of the bonds.

3. INTEREST (§ 23*)—PAYMENT OF INTEREST—WHEN NOT SPECIFIED — WHEN PAYABLE — MATURITY.

In contracts between individuals where the payment of interest is fixed at a per centum per annum, it is payable at the time of the maturity of the principal obligation.

4. SCHOOLS AND SCHOOL DISTRICTS (§ 97*)—BONDS—NOTICE OF ELECTION—INSUFFICIENCY OF.

Under Pol. Code, § 1745, providing for the posting of notices of elections for the issuance of high school district bonds, a provision in the notice that the interest was payable "per annum" was insufficient, and the failure to specify the time at which interest upon the bonds was payable could not be cured by any action of the supervisors in fixing the times of payment; and a county clerk was justified in refusing to attest such bonds.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Schools and School Districts, Cent. Dig. § 226; Dec. Dig. § 97.*]

Mandamus by the Hollywood Union High School District and another against C. G. Keyes, county clerk and ex officio clerk of the board of supervisors of the county of Los Angeles. Writ denied.

Hartley Shaw, for petitioners. O'Melveny, Stevens & Millikin, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. The petition discloses that the trustees of the Hollywood Union High School District heretofore, acting under section 1745 of the Political Code as enacted in 1909 (St. 1909, pp. 488, 489, c. 311), gave notice to the taxpayers of the time and place for an election at which was to be determined the question of the issuance of bonds for purposes within the statute. This notice, it is conceded, contained all of the matters required by the section above stated, excepting that, in respect of interest, the notice provided that the bonds, which should be of the denomination of $1,000 each, "shall bear interest at the rate of 4½ per cent. per annum," whereas the statute provides that the notice shall designate "the rate of interest, not exceeding six per cent. per annum, payable annually or semiannually." It is the contention of respondent that the position of the county clerk, whose refusal to attest the bonds is the subject of this writ, is well taken, for the reason that the omission to designate the times of payment of interest in the notice is fatal to the validity of the bonds, and for that reason the clerk is justified in his refusal to attest the same.

It needs no argument to support the proposition that the proposal and offer to issue bonds of certain kind and character and the purchase thereof is a contract in which the taxpayer is one party and the bond purchaser the other, and, like every other contract, the minds of the parties must meet in order that it shall be valid. As the statute stood prior to 1909, the matter in relation to the fixing of the maturity of the interest was, by section 1670 of the Political Code, delegated to the board of supervisors as agents of the taxpayers, and the determination of the times of payment of interest by the board would bind the taxpayer. Section 1670 was repealed in 1909 (St. 1909, p. 473, c. 311), and the discretion theretofore reposed in the supervisors in this regard was, by the terms of section 1745, as enacted in that year, reserved to the people themselves, and this is indicated by the statement as to what the notice of election should contain heretofore quoted. This construction is in harmony with the present governmental policy tending to reserve to the people powers which have heretofore been delegated to representatives.

It is insisted by petitioner that these provisions of section 1745 with reference to the denomination of the bonds, and the time within which interest should be made payable, are but limitations upon the powers of the board, and are not to be considered as express declarations as to a material part of the notice. As we have before said, we are not in sympathy with this contention. We regard it as peculiarly significant that the express powers heretofore conferred upon the board of supervisors as the agents of the people should be by legislative act withdrawn from the agents, and the requirement in connection therewith should be found in the provisions relative to the notice of election; all of this indicating to our minds that it was the legislative intent that the people themselves, who bear the burden of taxation, should in the first instance express the character and extent of the obligation which they are imposing upon themselves, whether it apply to the denomination, rate of interest, or time of payment thereof.

Petitioner further insists that in the face of this construction the notice was nevertheless sufficient, for it provided that the rate of interest should be 4½ per cent. per annum, and in the form in which the bonds are proposed to be issued, and which form respondent refuses to attest, it is provided that the interest shall be payable annually. In other words, that the "per annum" in the notice justifies the use of the word "annually" by the supervisors. In contracts between individuals it is established that, where the payment of interest is fixed at a per centum per annum, the same is payable at the time of the maturity of the principal obligation. Koehring v. Muemminghoff, 61 Mo. 403, 21 Am. Rep. 402; Tanner v. Dundee, etc., Co. (C. C.) 12 Fed. 646; Ramsdell v. Hulett, 50 Kan. 440, 31 Pac. 1092. This rule, being recognized as to contracts between individuals, is particularly applicable to contracts the evidences of which must be negotiated in the open market, and the market value of which is affected to some extent by the certainty or uncertainty of their terms; and it is obvious that a bond uncertain through an omission of express terms to indicate any material provision thereof would be affected as to the value thereof by such omission. The contrary effect as to the general provision of interest payable per annum was determined in Murphy v. San Luis Obispo (Sup.) 48 Pac. 974, but, in view of the rehearing granted in that case and the subsequent opinion in bank (119 Cal. 624, 51 Pac. 1085, 39 L. R. A. 444), we do not regard that case now as an authority on this question, and that the question is open for decision and, we think, should be determined in harmony with the cases above cited. We do not fully appreciate the force of some of the decisions to which our attention has been called, the effect of which is to determine that the time for the maturity of the interest materially affects the rate of interest. We cannot understand how this can be said where the rate is expressly fixed by the contract. It does, however, and must of necessity, affect the market value of the instrument, the subject of sale.

In our opinion, therefore, the omission to specify in the notice calling the election the times at which interest upon the bonds was payable cannot be cured by any action of the supervisors in fixing such times for the payment of interest, and that, as a consequence, the action of respondent in refusing to attest such bonds is justified.

Writ denied.

HUNEKE v. HUNEKE. (Civ. 714.)

(Court of Appeal, Second District, California. Dec. 16, 1909. Rehearing Denied by Supreme Court Feb. 14, 1910.)

1. Divorce (§ 249*)—Division of Property—Homestead.

Where, in a divorce proceeding, the court found that the homestead was community property, a decree that it should be divided equally between the parties at the expiration of a year from the entry of an interlocutory judgment granting the husband a divorce for extreme cruelty was the least interest therein that the court could assign him under Civ. Code, § 146, providing for the disposition of community property in divorce proceedings.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Divorce, Cent. Dig. § 712; Dec. Dig. § 249.*]

2. Divorce (§ 253*)—Trial—Property Interest—Determination—Time.

In the absence of an order continuing the hearing of a suit for divorce, in so far as it involved the property rights of the parties, the opportune time for the hearing and final determination of that question is at the time and place of the trial of the principal issue involved in the divorce proceeding, and not on the entry of a final decree one year after the date of the interlocutory judgment.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Divorce, Cent. Dig. § 716; Dec. Dig. § 253.*]

3. Divorce (§ 201*)—Property Interests—Determination—Jurisdiction.

Under the express provisions of Civ. Code, § 147, the court having jurisdiction of a suit for divorce has jurisdiction to decree a partition and sale of the parties' community homestead.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Divorce, Cent. Dig. §§ 591, 592; Dec. Dig. § 201.*]

4. Divorce (§ 201*)—Property Rights—Determination—Jurisdiction—Estoppel.

Where, in a suit for divorce, both parties, in addition, raised issues concerning conflicting claims to certain real property, which were heard and determined without objection, they were estopped thereafter to question the jurisdiction of the court to make and enter a judgment affecting such property.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Divorce, Cent. Dig. §§ 591, 592; Dec. Dig. § 201.*]

5. Divorce (§ 283*)—Judgment—Appeal—Time.

In so far as an action for divorce involved conflicting claims of the parties to real property, the court's judgment determining such issues became final as to all parties six months after the entry thereof, in the absence of appeal under Code Civ. Proc. § 939, requiring appeals to be taken from final judgments within that period.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Divorce, Cent. Dig. § 766; Dec. Dig. § 283.*]

6. Divorce (§ 181*)—Interlocutory Decree—Appeal—Time.

Under Civ. Code, § 131, providing for an appeal from an interlocutory divorce decree within six months, and for the entry of a final decree within one year from the date of the interlocutory decree, it was not the legislative intent to change the procedure and practice in actions for divorce, but to make the decree ineffective for one year as a deterrent from a new marriage.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Divorce, Cent. Dig. § 567; Dec. Dig. § 181.*]

7. Divorce (§ 254*)—Division of Property—Modification of Findings.

After a judgment affecting the property rights of the parties in an action for divorce had become final by failure to appeal within the time prescribed, the court had no jurisdiction to modify its findings or to grant a new trial.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Divorce, Cent. Dig. § 720; Dec. Dig. § 254.*]

8. Divorce (§ 283*)—Appeal—Right to Appeal—Time—Interlocutory Judgment.

Where an interlocutory judgment for divorce also determined the rights of the parties as to their community homestead, and this part of the judgment became final by a failure to appeal within six months, the fact that the final decree restated and reaffirmed the interlocutory decree conferred no right of appeal as to matters involved and finally determined by the interlocutory judgment, though by Civ. Code, § 131, execution was stayed on the final judgment as to the property until the entry of the final decree in divorce.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Divorce, Cent. Dig. § 766; Dec. Dig. § 283.*]

9. Divorce (§ 283*)—Division of Property—Appeal — Time — Directions for Enforcement.

Where a divorce decree provided for a division of the parties' community homestead, and a sale thereof for that purpose, at the expiration of one year, such provision did not render the decree fixing and determining the property rights any the less final, under the rule that the finality of a decree is not affected by any direction therein contained in aid of its execution.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Divorce, Cent. Dig. § 766; Dec. Dig. § 283.*]

10. Divorce (§ 283*)—Time to Appeal—Final Judgment.

Civ. Code, § 131, provides for an appeal from an interlocutory divorce decree within six months, and Code Civ. Proc. § 939, provides for an appeal from a final judgment within the same period. An interlocutory divorce decree granted plaintiff a divorce which would become final at the expiration of one year, and at the same time directed a division of the community homestead, to be sold at the expiration of a year.

No appeal was taken within six months, and at the end of a year final judgment was entered, reaffirming and restating the matters contained in the interlocutory judgment, and provided for the appointment of referees to make partition or to sell the property at public auction. Held, that the matter inserted in the final judgment, and not contained in the original, should be treated as an order for carrying the judgment into effect, and hence the appeal was ineffective.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Divorce, Cent. Dig. § 766; Dec. Dig. § 283.*]

11. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 70*)—APPEALABLE ORDERS — PARTITION — ORDER APPOINTING REFEREES.

An order in divorce proceedings, appointing referees and directing partition or sale of real property, and directing that they report their action to the court for confirmation or modification, is interlocutory, and hence unappealable.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 377; Dec. Dig. § 70.*]

12. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 70*)—APPEALABLE ORDERS — FINALITY — ORDER APPOINTING REFEREES.

The order appointing the referees did not vest in them power reserved to the court; the order providing for final confirmation of the referees' proceedings by the court.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 377; Dec. Dig. § 70.*]

13. DIVORCE (§ 286*)—DIVISION OF PROPERTY—REVIEW—PRESUMPTIONS.

Where a court, in a divorce proceeding, had jurisdiction to order partition and sale of real estate belonging to the parties, its action in so doing must be sustained, in the absence of any showing of prejudicial error in connection therewith.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Divorce, Cent. Dig. § 769; Dec. Dig. § 286.*]

14. CONSTITUTIONAL LAW (§ 249*) — EQUAL PROTECTION OF LAW—DIVORCE LAW.

The California divorce law is not in violation of the fourteenth amendment of the federal Constitution, in that it denies equal protection of the laws, because the defendant is bound by the decree after the lapse of six months, while the plaintiff may dismiss the action at any time within a year after entry of interlocutory judgment.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Constitutional Law, Cent. Dig. § 710; Dec. Dig. § 249.*]

15. DIVORCE (§ 201*)—DIVISION OF PROPERTY—JURISDICTION—SOURCE.

The jurisdiction of the divorce courts in the division of the property of the parties rests on the right of a sovereign state to exercise control over all the property within its boundaries, and to determine the status or condition of its inhabitants or persons found within its borders, independent of any federal question.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Divorce, Cent. Dig. §§ 591, 592; Dec. Dig. § 201.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Walter Bordwell, Judge.

Action by John Huneke against Frances Huneke. Appeal from judgment and order denying defendant a new trial. Dismissed, and orders made in aid of execution affirmed.

John M. York and Waldo M. York, for appellant. Hutton & Williams, for respondent.

ALLEN, P. J. The action was one in divorce, based upon charges of extreme cruelty, and for a decree establishing the rights of the parties to a homestead alleged to constitute all of the property owned by the parties to the action. The answer of defendant denied the allegations of the complaint, denied that the property was a homestead, but, on the contrary, asserted the same to be the separate estate of the defendant. By cross-complaint defendant sought a decree of divorce and a decree adjudging the property described in the complaint and cross-complaint to be her separate estate. An issue was presented upon all the matters involved in the cross-complaint. The cause came on for trial September 17, 1906, and the court found in favor of plaintiff as to all the issues presented, and against defendant, and especially as against her claim of the separate character of the property involved. The court adjudged the property described to be community property, and that the same was impressed with a valid homestead, and by its interlocutory decree ordered that one year from the entry thereof a final decree of divorce should be entered in favor of plaintiff, and that the homestead should by such decree be awarded to the parties equally. This award to plaintiff was the least interest which, under section 146, Civ. Code, could be assigned to him; the divorce being granted plaintiff upon the ground of extreme cruelty. Eslinger v. Eslinger, 47 Cal. 64. And it was directed that a partition be made thereof, and one-half be set off to each in severalty, or, if the same could not be done advantageously, that the property be sold, and the proceeds be equally divided. Jurisdiction was reserved by the court to carry into effect the provisions of such interlocutory judgment. This interlocutory decree was entered September 26, 1906, and notice thereof given to defendant October 1, 1906. No further proceedings were had in connection with the case until August 23, 1907, when the defendant moved the court to strike from the findings of fact filed, and upon which the judgment was based, all portions thereof relating to the character of the property and the rights of the parties in respect thereof. This motion was denied on August 27, 1907, and on the 22d day of January, 1908, the court, under the objections of defendant, entered its final judgment dissolving the marital relation, and finally adjudging the rights of the parties as by the interlocutory decree determined, and further directing the appointment of three referees with directions to partition the premises, if the same could be done advantageously, allotting to each party one-half thereof, otherwise, to sell the premises at public action for cash, and report their proceedings to the court. It was ordered that the referees report in writing to the court their action under the order, the court to approve any partition reported or any sale made before the same should become effective, to which order and the judgment defendant excepted. Thereafter defendant moved the court to vacate the decision and judgment rendered in said action, and especially in so far as said judgment affects the property rights of the parties, and to grant a new trial, which motion was denied, and on June 12, 1908, the defendant noticed an appeal from the judgment entered on the 27th day of January, 1908, and from the order denying the motion for a new trial.

The primary contention of appellant is that, under the statutes of this state, the court had no jurisdiction to enter a judgment establishing the rights of the parties to the property involved until the expiration of one year from the date of the interlocutory judgment decreeing the divorce, or until such time as the entry of a final judgment came on to be heard. This contention has been met and determined adversely to appellant by this court in John v. Superior Court, 5 Cal. App. 264, 90 Pac. 53, and subsequently by the Supreme Court in Pereira v. Pereira, 103 Pac. 488, in both of which cases it is determined that, in the absence of an order continuing the hearing as to the property rights involved, the opportune time for hearing and final determination of the rights of the parties as to the property is at the time and place of the trial of the principal issue involved in the divorce. Accepting this proposition as established, it must be unquestioned that under section 147, Civ. Code, the court had jurisdiction and authority in the divorce proceedings to make an order relative to the disposition of the community property, and, if necessary, to order a partition or sale thereof. Aside from the fact of having such jurisdiction over the community property, and that of necessity there reposed in the court authority to determine what portion of the property claimed by each was of the community, we find that in this particular action the parties, in addition to the issues involved in the action for divorce, presented to the court by the cross-complaint another action in which they sought to have their conflicting claims to certain real property heard and determined. No objection being urged by any one to this joinder of actions, and all parties having appeared and tried the issues presented in each, all are precluded now from questioning the jurisdiction of the court to make and enter a judgment as affecting the issues thus presented. In so far, then, as the action involving the conflicting claims to real property is concerned, the judgment of the court thereon became final as to all parties six months after the entry thereof, in the absence of an appeal. By section 131, Civ. Code, the same time is allotted for an appeal from an interlocutory decree of divorce, which is, by section 939, Code Civ. Proc., the time within which an appeal shall be taken from any final judgment.

As said by the Supreme Court in Pereira v. Pereira, supra, except so far as the statute makes the decree of divorce ineffective for the period of one year as a deterrent from a new marriage, it was not the legislative intent to change in any other respect the procedure and practice in actions for divorce. We are then confronted with a case where, after the judgment affecting the property rights has become final, an appeal is sought from the order and judgment of the trial court refusing a new trial and denying the motion to modify the findings upon which such judgment is based. By reason of the finality of the judgment the court had no jurisdiction or authority to modify its findings, or to grant a new trial. Claudius v. Melvin, 146 Cal. 260, 79 Pac. 897. As a consequence, no error could be predicated upon an order denying a motion to modify the findings or to grant a new trial. The mere fact that the final decree restated and reaffirmed the previous judgment, made and entered at the time of the trial and included in the interlocutory judgment, conferred no right of appeal as to matters involved and finally determined by the original interlocutory judgment, even though it should be said that the effect of section 131, Civ. Code, is to hold in abeyance the execution of the final judgment as to the property rights until the entry of the final decree in divorce. The finality of the decree is not affected by any direction therein contained in aid of its execution. Freeman on Judgments, § 28; In re Norton, 108 U. S. 237, 2 Sup. Ct. 490, 27 L. Ed. 709. Any of the arguments of appellant urged in support of the theory that the order executing this interlocutory decree is judicial could be equally as well directed against any other order in execution of a conditional decree affecting real property. The direction in the decree that a segregation of the interests to which the parties by the decree were found to be entitled should be made, or a sale ordered, at the expiration of one year, did not render the decree fixing and determining the property rights any the less final. In our opinion, therefore, a notice of appeal given more than six months after the entry of the interlocutory judgment is not effective as presenting for review or consideration any question involved in such judgment. It is true that the final judgment as entered, in addition to its reaffirmance and restatement of the matters contained in the original or interlocutory judgment, provided for the appointment of referees to make a partition, or, in event the same could not be had, to sell at public auction the premises, and to make due report of their action and proceedings to the court. But the matter inserted in the final judgment and not contained in the original may be considered, as it is, an order to carry the judgment into effect, and were it to be treated as an appealable order under section 939, Code Civ. Proc., the appellant does not in her notice of appeal in terms seek to review the same, but, on the contrary, confines her notice to the judgment, which, as we have said, was final, and the order denying a new trial, which, in our judgment, was made too late to be effective for any purpose. This order, however, upon its face, does not purport to definitely determine the rights of the parties, or to conclude them in the assertion of any right. It is preliminary to and the basis of a report of referees ordered to be made to the court, and from which report, or the action of the court in confirmation or modification thereof, an appeal would lie. We see nothing in the order from which it may be said that judicial power is delegated to the referees, for by its terms it provides that, whatever may be the conclusion or report of the referees, the same should have no efficacy until the court acted thereon. People v. Hayne, 83 Cal. 111, 23 Pac. 1, 7 L. R. A. 348, 17 Am. St. Rep. 211. Nor does the order vest in the referees power reserved to the court in the interlocutory judgment. In both the interlocutory judgment and the final judgment the power of the court, as controlling all matters connected with the partition or sale, is declared. On the other hand, should this preliminary order be considered as an order after judgment, and included in the notice of appeal, nothing indicating its irregularity or erroneous character is suggested. That the court possessed jurisdiction to make the order is to our mind clear; and, having such jurisdiction, the action of the court must be sustained in the absence of any showing of prejudicial error in connection therewith.

It is finally contended by appellant that the divorce law of California is inhibited by the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States, in that it denies equal protection under the law. This claim is based upon the proposition that, under our statutes, the defendant is bound by the decree after the lapse of six months, while the plaintiff is accorded the right of dismissal within one year after entry. That the statute should give plaintiff the right to dismiss the action for divorce instituted by him, while withholding the same right from the defendant, is not denying equal protection under the law. "What satisfies this equality has not been, and probably never can be, precisely defined. Generally it has been said that it only requires the same means and methods to be applied impartially to all the constituents of each class, so that the law shall operate equally and uniformly upon all persons in similar circumstances." Magoun v. Illinois Trust Co., 170 U. S. 293, 18 Sup. Ct. 598, 42 L. Ed. 1037; Kentucky Railroad Tax Cases, 115 U. S. 321, 6 Sup. Ct. 57, 29 L. Ed. 414. This divorce law of our state undertakes to and does confer upon all citizens who are parties plaintiff equal and exact rights, and the same to all citizens who are parties defendant, and it does operate equally and uniformly upon all similarly situated as parties litigant. Aside from the peculiar character of actions for divorce, and the latitude which should be accorded each sovereign state in dealing with this unsolved problem in connection with its regulation, we see nothing in the sections referred to inhibited by the federal Constitution. The jurisdiction of the divorce courts, like the jurisdiction of probate courts, rests upon the right of a sovereign state to exercise control over all the property within its boundaries, and to determine the status or condition of its inhabitants or persons found within its borders, and no federal question is involved here. Estate of Clark, 148 Cal. 112, 82 Pac. 760, 1 L. R. A. (N. S.) 996, 113 Am. St. Rep. 197; De la Montanya v. De la Montanya, 112 Cal. 101, 117, 44 Pac. 345, 32 L. R. A. 82, 53 Am. St. Rep. 165; Richards v. Blaisdell et al., 106 Pac. 732.

We see no prejudicial error in the record sufficient to warrant a reversal of any action or order of the court made in the proceeding. The appeal from the judgment and order denying a new trial is ordered dismissed, and the orders of the court made in aid of the execution of the judgment are affirmed.

We concur: SHAW, J.; TAGGART, J.

PEOPLE v. SWAILE. (Cr. 142.)

(Court of Appeal, Second District, California. Dec. 16, 1909.)

1. EXPLOSIVES (§ 5*)—MISUSE—INFORMATION—DESCRIPTION — "NITROGLYCERIN" — "DYNAMITE"—"GIANT POWDER."

An information for the malicious placing of an explosive near a dwelling house, describing the explosive as "nitroglycerin," commonly known as "dynamite" or "giant powder," was not objectionable for indefiniteness as to the explosion charged, the substances all being nitroglycerin explosives.

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, vol. 5, p. 4810; vol. 3, p. 2298.]

2. INDICTMENT AND INFORMATION (§ 125*)—DUPLICITY—ILLEGAL USE OF EXPLOSIVES—INTENT.

An information for illegal use of explosives, alleging such use with intent then and there to endanger, intimidate, and terrify certain specified persons, was not defective for duplicity because it alleged more than one intent.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Indictment and Information, Cent. Dig. § 375; Dec. Dig. § 125.*]

3. INDICTMENT AND INFORMATION (§ 125*)—DUPLICITY—STATUTORY OFFENSES—SEVERAL ACTS.

Where a statute enumerates a series of acts, either of which or all together may constitute the offense, all such acts may be charged in a single count, since, though each may by itself constitute the offense, all together do no more, and constitute but one and the same offense.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Indictment and Information, Cent. Dig. § 337; Dec. Dig. § 125.*]

4. Explosives (§ 5*)—Illegal Use—Instructions.

Where an information charged that defendant placed dynamite on the porch of a dwelling house with intent to endanger, intimidate, and terrify certain individuals, the court properly charged that the evidence was sufficient to sustain a conviction if it showed that defendant intended either to endanger, to intimidate, or to terrify either of the persons designated.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Explosives, Cent. Dig. § 2; Dec. Dig. § 5.*]

5. Witnesses (§ 191*)—Communication Between Husband and Wife—Letter from Husband to Wife.

Introduction of a letter written by accused to his wife containing a confession of the charge was not objectionable under Code Civ. Proc. § 1881, relating to privileged communications between husband and wife; there being no examination of the wife as to a privileged communication.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Witnesses, Cent. Dig. § 738; Dec. Dig. § 191.*]

6. Witnesses (§ 52*)—Competency—Husband and Wife—Letter from Husband to Wife.

A letter from husband to wife containing a confession of crime is not inadmissible under Pen. Code, § 1322, rendering the wife incompetent to testify against her husband in a criminal case; she not being examined as a witness against accused.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Witnesses, Cent. Dig. §§ 132–134; Dec. Dig. § 52.*]

7. Criminal Law (§ 394*)—Evidence Illegally Obtained.

Evidence otherwise admissible against accused cannot be excluded because illegally obtained.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 875, 876; Dec. Dig. § 394.*]

8. Criminal Law (§ 517*)—Evidence—Confession—Corpus Delicti.

Though ordinarily the corpus delicti should be proved before a confession is admitted, the court may change the order of the proof in its discretion, and, if it does so, its ruling is not reversible error unless accused is prejudiced thereby.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 1146, 1147; Dec. Dig. § 517.*]

9. Criminal Law (§ 517*)—Evidence—Confession—Corpus Delicti.

Where, in a prosecution for the illegal use of explosives, it was proved that some person placed dynamite on the porch of a dwelling house in which certain named persons resided, and also placed a fuse so as to explode the dynamite, and had fired the fuse, such evidence sufficiently showed the corpus delicti to justify the admission of accused's confession.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 1146, 1147; Dec. Dig. § 517.*]

10. Criminal Law (§ 706*)—Trial—Retender of Evidence—Misconduct of District Attorney.

Where certain evidence was excluded in the first instance because it was not so closely connected with the defendant as to bind him, it was not misconduct of the district attorney thereafter to retender the evidence on the court's apparent change of ruling on the subject.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 1661; Dec. Dig. § 706.*]

11. Criminal Law (§ 407*)—Evidence—Admissions—Silence.

Where statements of fact tending to connect a person with a crime are made to him, the admissibility thereof depends on his answer or acts. If he admits the truthfulness of the accusation, or fails to deny it under such circumstances as may be construed to be an admission that it is true, the statement, with its answer or act, may be admitted; but if he denies it there is no admission.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 898, 899; Dec. Dig. § 407.*]

12. Criminal Law (§ 407*)—Evidence—Admissions—Silence.

An accusation of crime calls for reply even from a person under arrest or in the custody of an officer, where the circumstances surrounding him indicate that he is free to answer if he chooses to do so.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 898, 899; Dec. Dig. § 407.*]

13. Criminal Law (§ 407*)—Evidence—Admissions—Silence.

In a prosecution of accused for misuse of explosives, in connection with his confession accused said that he was prompted all the way through by the "almighty dollar." He was then asked whether that was what he threw the rocks through the window for, to which he replied, "I am not saying anything about those rocks at all." Held, that defendant's reply to the accusation as to the rocks was the same as though he had said nothing, and was admissible as an admission.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 898, 899; Dec. Dig. § 407.*]

14. Criminal Law (§ 371*)—Evidence—Other Offenses.

Where, in a prosecution for the illegal placing of dynamite on the porch of a dwelling house, defendant claimed that he did not intend to injure any one, but placed the dynamite on the porch as "a harmless bluff," evidence that he also threw rocks into the house was competent to rebut his claim as to his intent, and was not objectionable as tending to establish an independent offense.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 830–832; Dec. Dig. § 371.*]

15. Courts (§ 99*)—Trial—Rulings on Evidence—Law of the Case.

16. Criminal Law (§ 719*)—Argument of Counsel—Matters not Sustained by Evidence—Nature of Evidence.

In a prosecution for the illegal use of explosives, the admission of an officer's accusation to accused that he threw rocks through the windows of the house on the porch of which the explosives were placed, and defendant's failure to deny the charge, was sufficient to warrant the district attorney in discussing defendant's intent and, in reply to defendant's claim that his act was "a harmless bluff," in calling the jury's attention to the rocks.

17. Criminal Law (§ 1171*)—Misconduct of District Attorney—Prejudice.

19. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1178*)—APPEAL—BRIEFS—ARGUMENT.

Accused was not entitled to an examination of instructions refused on appeal where his only argument thereof consisted of a statement that the court erred in refusing to give the following instructions, etc., giving their numbers and the page of the transcript where found.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; W. R. Guy, Judge.

Charles R. Swaile was convicted of placing an explosive near a dwelling house with intent to endanger, etc., and he appeals. Affirmed.

Mills & Hizar, L. R. Kirby, and A. J. Morganstern, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and George Beebe, Deputy Atty. Gen., for respondent.

TAGGART, J. The defendant was informed against for the crime of placing an explosive near a dwelling house with intent to injure, intimidate, and terrify human beings. This is alleged to have been done by depositing "at, in and near a certain dwelling house, the property of Edgar W. Dickenson, to wit, upon the porch thereof, a certain nitroglycerin explosive commonly known as dynamite or giant powder; * * * that said nitroglycerin explosive was so placed by said defendant at, in and near said dwelling house as aforesaid with the intent then and there to injure, intimidate and terrify Edgar W. Dickenson and J. A. Dickenson, human beings." The jury returned a verdict of "guilty," and defendant was sentenced to imprisonment in the state prison for a term of 20 years.

On this appeal, which is from the judgment and the order of the court denying him a new trial, appellant first urges as a reason for a reversal: That the information does not state a public offense in this, that the explosive named is not one of those enumerated in section 601 of the Penal Code under which the charge was made; also, that the "intent" with which the act was done was not specifically alleged, three different intents being stated. This multiplicity of intent is the basis of an assignment of error in connection with the refusal of the court to require the district attorney to elect which particular intent was relied upon for a conviction, and also of error assigned in the giving of certain instructions by the court.

The information is sufficient against the objections urged by appellant. There is no uncertainty as to the explosive charged. Had it stated nitroglycerin explosive alone the information would have been certain within the meaning of the statute, and that it alleged a particular nitroglycerin explosive commonly known as dynamite or giant powder did not render it any less certain. These substances are both nitroglycerin explosives. According to the expert evidence in the case, they are the same nitroglycerin compound, and the two terms are mentioned as synonymous by some of the lexicographers.

The information is not bad for duplicity because it alleges more than one intent in the commission of the crime. Accepting the contention of appellant that the "intent" is one of the essential elements of this offense the rule applicable here would be the one declared in People v. Frank, 28 Cal. 507, as follows: "Where, in defining an offense, a statute enumerates a series of acts, either of which separately or all together, may constitute the offense, all such acts may be charged in a single count, for the reason that, notwithstanding each may by itself constitute the offense, all of them together do no more, and likewise constitute but one and the same offense." People v. Leyshon, 108 Cal. 440, 442, 41 Pac. 480. As the information charged but one offense—but one act—at a particular time and place, there was no basis for the motion of defendant that the district attorney be required to elect which charge he would try. Cases such as People v. Williams, 133 Cal. 165, 65 Pac. 323, where the information is so drawn that the conviction of the defendant might be had upon a showing as to any one of numerous violations of the law, do not support appellant's contention that it was error for the court to refuse to require an election. From this it is also apparent that in our view it was proper for the trial court to charge the jury that the evidence was sufficient to sustain a conviction if it showed "that the defendant intended either to injure, or to intimidate, or to terrify either of the persons named in the information."

Neither the provisions of section 1881 of the Code of Civil Procedure, relating to privileged communications between husband and wife, nor those of section 1322 of the Penal Code, rendering the wife incompetent to testify against her husband in a criminal case, were violated by the introduction in evidence of the letter written by defendant to his wife. This letter reads as follows: "I have had to confess to pututting Dinamite on Dickenson's Porch. you cannot see me before Monday bet 9 and 11 the Det found the dinamite in the shed." The letter was given to one of the officers to carry to the wife. It was not sealed or inclosed in an envelope, and, at the request of the officer, was returned to him by the wife after she had read it. The statement introduced by the letter is that of the husband, and there was no examination of the wife as to a privileged communication, nor was she examined as a witness against her husband. People v. Chadwick, 4 Cal. App. 63, 72, 87 Pac. 384, 389. If it be conceded that the letter was illegally obtained this would not operate to exclude it from evidence on the ground that it was a privileged communication, or that the evidence was self-criminating. Though papers and other subjects of evidence may have been illegally taken from the possession of the party against whom they are offered, or otherwise unlawfully obtained, this is no valid objection to their admissibility if they are pertinent to the issue. 1 Greenleaf on Evidence (16th Ed.) § 254a. The foundation laid for the introduction of defendant's confession was sufficient. Accepting the rule that ordinarily the corpus delicti should be shown before a confession is admitted, it is nevertheless true that the order of proof is largely within the discretion of the trial court, and, unless it clearly appears that the defendant was prejudiced by the ruling of the trial judge permitting the confession to be given before the corpus delicti was established, it is not reversible error. People v. Besold, 154 Cal. 363, 97 Pac. 871. We think, however, that the corpus delicti in this case was sufficiently established before the confession was introduced. That some one had placed the explosive on the porch of a dwelling house and not only placed a fuse so as to explode it, but had fired the fuse, was clearly shown. All the intent necessary for the offense charged could be inferred from this evidence.

The complaining witness in describing the condition of the dwelling house, after testifying to finding the explosive with the charred fuse attached, made the following statement: "When I went inside of the house, I noticed in the bedroom and bathroom leading directly north from the bedroom there was glass strewn around in there and I found two large rocks in there." On motion of defendant, this testimony was stricken out and the jury instructed to disregard it; and the labeled rocks were also directed by the court to be removed from the sight of the jury. In connection with the confession of the defendant, introduced in evidence, the officers who testified thereto were permitted to give as part of the conversation had with the defendant at the time the following: "Defendant: * * * I was prompted all the way through by the almighty dollar. Officer: And was that what you threw those rocks through the window for? Defendant: I am not saying anything about those rocks at all." Defendant moved to strike out this portion of the narration by the officer, and his motion was denied. The same matter was permitted to be testified to by another officer against the objection of defendant. Thereafter the district attorney recalled the complaining witness, and again sought to introduce the rocks and the evidence relating to the finding of them in the house, but his tender was denied. Appellant assigns this renewed offer of this testimony by the district attorney, and further mention by him of the rocks to the jury in his argument, as prejudicial misconduct. What was said by the district attorney in the last instance was in connection with the matter of the intent of the defendant in placing the explosive on the porch, and in reply to the suggestion of defendant's counsel that the act was a "harmless bluff" as the defendant told the officers. The language used was: "What was he doing with the rocks? You remember the rocks? What was the defendant doing with the rocks?"

It was not misconduct on the part of the district attorney to retender the evidence after the court's apparent change of ruling in this respect. The reason assigned by the court for not admitting the evidence in the first place was because it was not so closely connected with the defendant as to bind him. The statement in relation to the rocks testified to by the officers was only admissible upon the theory that it was an admission by the defendant that he had thrown the rocks, and that such evidence was competent in the case. Where statements of fact tending to connect him with a crime are made to a person suspected of having committed such crime, the admissibility of such evidence depends entirely upon the answer or acts of the person accused. If he admits the truthfulness of the accusation, or fails to deny it under such circumstances as may be construed to be an admission that it is true, the statement with his answer or act may be introduced as a declaration made by him; on the other hand, if he denies it, there is no admission upon his part to be introduced. In this state, an accusation of crime calls for a reply, even from a person under arrest, or in the custody of an officer, where the circumstances surrounding him indicate that he was entirely free to reply, if he chose to do so. People v. Amaya, 134 Cal. 531, 66 Pac. 794. The answer of defendant to the officers' accusation as to throwing the rocks was the same as if he had said nothing, or that he did not care to make any statement as to them. This entitled the statement to be admitted, if otherwise relevant, material, and competent. We think it was properly admitted. But this testimony as to the rocks was no more relevant and competent than that of the complaining witness which was stricken out. The mere fact that it tended to establish an independent offense was not sufficient to exclude it if it tended to throw any light upon the conduct of the person who placed the explosive. There can be no doubt that it tended to rebut the statement of defendant that he did not intend to injure the complaining witness, but placed the dynamite upon the porch as a harmless bluff. The error in the ruling of the court excluding the evidence tendered by the prosecution, however, would not justify the district attorney in commenting upon this evidence in his argument. Right or wrong, the ruling of the trial court was the law of the case for all purposes of the trial as to the particular evidence to which it related. But the admission of the accusation made by the officers and defendant's failure to deny it, was, we think, sufficient to warrant counsel in using the language complained of.

The other statements of the district attorney in his argument which are assigned as misconduct do not warrant a reversal of the case. In one instance, perhaps, the inference from the evidence was not justified. It was hardly proper to use the words "one of his dynamiting plots," but we do not think it was so far out of the bounds of legitimate argument as to be prejudicial. An inference that a person who places dynamite on the porch of an inhabited dwelling, or one he believed to be inhabited, intended to assassinate some one was legitimate, and was not an improper one for the district attorney to draw in his argument to the jury.

The instructions of the court upon the matter of intent which are assigned as error were proper under the view hereinabove expressed. The instructions requested by the defendant which the court refused to give to the jury can hardly be said to be presented to us on this appeal. It is neither the duty nor the practice of appellate courts to pass upon matters which the appellant himself does not consider of sufficient importance to more than refer to with the statement: "The court erred in refusing to give the following instructions," etc.; giving the numbers of them and the page in the transcript where found. People v. Pembroke, 6 Cal. App. 593, 92 Pac. 668. On examination, however, we are unable to discover that defendant was in any manner prejudiced by the refusal to give them or such portions of them as would have been proper, and which were not substantially given elsewhere.

The objections of the Attorney General to the consideration of certain questions which he contends are not before us on this appeal are not passed upon; it being assumed, for the purposes of this decision, that the matters brought up on suggestion of diminution of record cover the objections made.

Judgment and order affirmed.

YUBA COUNTY v. NORTH AMERICAN CONSOL. GOLD MINING CO. et al. (Civ. 623.)

(Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Dec. 3, 1909.)

1. COURTS (§ 212*)—APPELLATE COURT—JURISDICTION—EQUITY CAUSE.

A suit to restrain defendants from discharging or depositing tailings or other refuse from a mine into a river, or certain named branches thereof, was a suit in equity; and hence an appeal from a decree therein could not be taken to the appellate court.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Courts, Dec. Dig. § 212.*]

2. COURTS (§ 212*)—APPELLATE COURT—JURISDICTION.

Where the appellate court has no jurisdiction to determine the merits of a suit in equity, it has no jurisdiction to entertain an appeal from any judgment or order therein, whether involving the merits or not.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Courts, Dec. Dig. § 212.*]

3. COURTS (§ 486*)—INTERMEDIATE APPELLATE COURT—ERRONEOUS APPEAL—TRANSFER.

Where an appeal was erroneously taken to the appellate court from an order changing the place of trial of a suit in equity, it would be transferred to the Supreme Court, as required by Const. art. 6, § 4.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Courts, Dec. Dig. § 486.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, Yuba County; Eugene P. McDaniel, Judge.

Action by Yuba County against the North American Consolidated Gold Mining Company and others. From an order transferring the cause to another county for trial, both parties appeal. Case transferred to Supreme Court.

See, also, 107 Pac. 139.

F. H. Greely and W. H. Morrissey, for appellant. Niles E. Wretman, for respondents.

CHIPMAN, P. J. This is an action brought to restrain defendants from discharging or depositing tailings and other refuse matter from their mine into Yuba river, or certain named branches thereof. A motion was made by the defendants, or some of them, to change the place of trial from Yuba county, and upon hearing the trial court granted the motion, but transferred the case to a county different from that which in the judgment of both parties the court was without authority to name. Both plaintiff and defendants appealed from the order. The parties have filed a stipulation that the appeal be taken up at the earliest opportunity.

The action is clearly one in equity, and without the jurisdiction of this court. We held, in Rickey Land & Cattle Co. v. Glader, 6 Cal. App. 113, 91 Pac. 414, that where we are without jurisdiction to determine the merits of the controversy, we are also without jurisdiction to entertain an appeal from any judgment entered in the case, whether or not involving the merits. In this view it becomes our duty to transfer the case to the Supreme Court, under article 6, § 4, of the Constitution. The appeal, though improperly taken to this court, is not lost. The cause and all the papers thereto are, under rule 32, transferred to the Supreme Court. 78 Pac. xiii.

YUBA COUNTY v. NORTH AMERICA CONSOL. GOLD MINING CO. et al. (Civ. 623.)

(Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Dec. 17, 1909. Rehearing Denied by Supreme Court Feb. 14, 1910.)

1. VENUE (§ 72*) — CHANGE — CONSIDERATION OF DEFENDANTS NOT SERVED.

Defendants, sued under fictitious names and not served, cannot be regarded in the consideration of a motion for a change of venue made by defendants who have been served, and who have appeared, demurred and filed their affidavit of merits.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Venue, Dec. Dig. § 72.*]

2. VENUE (§ 36*)—CHANGE OF VENUE—STATUTES—"ACTION"—"SPECIAL PROCEEDING."

Code Civ. Proc. § 22, declares that an "action" is an ordinary proceeding in a court of justice by which one party prosecutes another for the enforcement or protection of a right, the redress or prevention of a wrong, or the punishment of a public offense, and section 23 declares that every other remedy is a "special proceeding." Held, that a suit in equity to restrain defendants from polluting a water course was an "action" and not a "special proceeding" within Code Civ. Proc. § 394, providing that whenever an action is brought by a county or a city against residents of another county or city, or a corporation doing business in the latter, the action must be, on motion of the defendant, transferred for trial to a county other than the plaintiff, if the plaintiff is a county, and other than that in which the plaintiff is situated, if the plaintiff is a city, the term "special proceeding" being limited to a proceeding in a court which under the common law and equity practice was neither an action at law nor a suit in equity.

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, vol. 1, pp. 128–140; vol. 8, p. 7563; vol. 7, pp. 6586–6590; vol. 8, pp. 7802, 7803.]

3. VENUE (§ 36*)—CHANGE OF VENUE—ACTION BY COUNTY.

A suit by a county against a corporation doing business in another county for polluting a water course was within Code Civ. Proc. § 394, providing for a change of venue whenever an action is brought by a county against residents of another county or a corporation doing business in the latter, on motion of the defendant.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Venue, Cent. Dig. § 54; Dec. Dig. § 36.*]

4. VENUE (§ 42*)—CHANGE OF VENUE—COUNTY TO WHICH CHANGE SHALL BE MADE.

Code Civ. Proc. § 394, provides that whenever an action is brought by a county against residents of another county, or a corporation doing business in the latter, the action must be, on motion of the defendant, transferred for trial to a county other than the plaintiff, if the plaintiff is a county. Held, that while a defendant, sued by a county other than that of defendant's residence, is entitled as of right to a change of venue under such section, defendant is not entitled to have the cause transferred to the county of its principal place of business, nor to any particular county, but the county to which the case shall be transferred is within the discretion of the court to which the application is made, to be determined by considering the situation, place of business of the parties, convenience of witnesses, etc.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Venue, Cent. Dig. § 64; Dec. Dig. § 42.*]

5. VENUE (§§ 13, 36*)—PLACE OF TRIAL—SITUATION OF SUBJECT.

A suit by a county to restrain the pollution of a water course against a corporation having its principal place of business in another county, was properly commenced in the county where the subject of the action was situated, under Code Civ. Proc. § 392, though defendants were authorized to have the same removed to another county by section 394.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Venue, Dec. Dig. §§ 13, 36.*]

6. VENUE (§ 36*)—CHANGE OF VENUE—CONSTITUTIONAL PROVISIONS.

Const. art. 12, § 16, provides that a corporation or association may be sued in the county where the contract is made or is to be performed, or where the obligation or liability arises, or the breach occurs, or where the principal place of business of such corporation is situated, "subject to the power of the court to change the place of trial as in other cases." Held, that the quoted clause is authority for the court to look to Code Civ. Proc. § 394, providing for a change of venue in actions by counties, as providing some of "the other cases" referred to in the Constitution in which a change of place of trial is provided for.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Venue, Dec. Dig. § 36.*]

7. STATUTES (§ 85*) — SPECIAL LEGISLATION — PRACTICE IN COURTS OF JUSTICE.

Code Civ. Proc. § 394, providing for a change of venue in actions by counties against a corporation doing business in another county, is not unconstitutional as special legislation regulating practice in courts of justice and providing for changing the venue of actions, in that it accords special privileges to corporations doing business without the county where the action is commenced, not accorded to corporations doing business within the county.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Statutes, Cent. Dig. §§ 94, 95; Dec. Dig. § 85.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, Yuba County; Eugene P. McDaniel, Judge.

Action by Yuba County against the North America Consolidated Gold Mining Company and others. From an order changing the place of trial, both parties appeal. Affirmed.

CHIPMAN, P. J. Defendants, North America Consolidated Gold Mining Company and Charles S. Deisem, moved for a change of the place of trial either to Sierra county or Santa Clara county. The court granted their motion to transfer the case, but designated the county of Sacramento as the place of trial. The trial judge, in making his order, rendered the following opinion in which the facts appear, and in which we think the learned trial judge correctly states the law:

"Some of the defendants in the above-entitled action have been sued under fictitious names and have not been served with summons, and under well-settled decisions they are not to be regarded in the consideration of the motion for a change of venue, made by the defendants who have been served, have appeared, demurred, and filed their affidavits of merits. This motion for a change of venue is based upon section 394 of the Code of Civil Procedure, or that portion of said section which is as follows: 'Whenever an action is brought by a county or city against residents of another county or city, or a corporation doing business in the latter, the action must be, on motion of the defendant, transferred for trial to a county other than the plaintiff, if the plaintiff is a county, and other than that in which the plaintiff is situated, if the plaintiff is a city.' It is contended by the plaintiff herein that this section does not apply, basing that contention upon the claim that this is not an 'action,' but 'a special proceeding.' It is a suit for an injunction, a proceeding in equity. 'An action is an ordinary proceeding in a court of justice by which one party prosecutes another for the enforcement or protection of a right, the redress or prevention of a wrong, or the punishment of a public offense.' Section 22, Code Civ. Proc. 'Every other remedy is a special proceeding.' Section 23, Code Civ. Proc. 'Any proceeding in a court which, under the common-law and equity practice, was not either an action at law or a suit in equity is a special proceeding under this section.' In Matter Central Irr. Dist., 117 Cal. 382 [49 Pac. 354] vol. 1 Encyc. of Plead. & Prac. 112. There can be no doubt at all upon the matter of application of section 394, Code Civ. Proc., to this suit. It appears from the complaint and defendants' showing that the county of Yuba, as plaintiff, has brought an action against a corporation doing business in another county, and the language of the section is mandatory: 'The action must be, on motion of the defendant, transferred to a county other than the plaintiff, if the plaintiff is a county.'

"All the steps taken by defendant seem to have been duly taken in time, and in the manner exactly prescribed by the Code, except in one respect. It appears that under the said section, when the plaintiff is a county suing a corporation doing business in another county, a right to a change of venue is given to have the cause transferred to another county, but no right is given to the defendant to have the cause transferred to the county where it has its principal place of business, nor to any other particular county. The naming of the county is left, in my opinion, to the discretion of the court. In the consideration of the question of what county the cause should be transferred to, the court will take into consideration all the matters and things apparent upon the face of the record, such as the situation and place of business of the parties, the convenience of witnesses (as far as may be apparent before answer filed), and all other reasons that may properly affect the exercise of its discretion. The defendant herein has moved that the action be transferred to either the superior court in and for the county of Sierra or to that in and for the county of Santa Clara. This portion of the motion relating to the two counties named may be regarded as mere surplusage—irrelevant and redundant matter in the motion, which may be disregarded, so that there is left only the demand and motion for a change of venue as contemplated by the statute.

"In the argument upon this motion no case has been called to the attention of the court, and none has been found after most diligent search, not in consonance with the views herein expressed, and it may be safely said that there is none. The statute was amended in 1891, and again in 1907, for the express purpose of meeting just such cases as this. It has so happened in the past that when similar motions have been made for a change of venue in other cases of the same general character as the one at bar, this court has denied the motions for technical reasons and upon technical grounds that do not appear nor exist herein. There is no possible doubt that the action was properly commenced in this county under section 392, Code Civ. Proc., and under the Constitution, and could be properly tried here; but defendants have seen fit to avail themselves of the right given them by section 394, and the court is bound by the mandatory terms of the law as there expressed. In view of the opinion of the court that none of the cases cited by counsel for plaintiff interprets the law to be other than mandatory or as meaning anything different from what the language itself sets forth in clear and unambiguous terms, it would seem to be entirely unnecessary to discuss any of them.

"In determining the county to which the cause should be transferred, I take into consideration the fact that it would be most inconvenient for the attorneys and witnesses for plaintiff to have to go to either Sierra or Santa Clara county, because of the distance, etc.; that Sutter, the neighboring county has her hands full of similar cases, as I am informed, and I have decided that Sacramento county would probably be more favorably located, taking everything into consideration, than almost any other county within reasonable distance of Yuba. The motion for a change of venue to a county other than the plaintiff is granted, that part of the motion relating to either Sierra or Santa Clara county is denied, and the superior court in and for the county of Sacramento is hereby designated as the court to which the above-named action is transferred for trial.

"Dated this 24th day of December, 1908.

"Eugene P. McDaniel, Judge."

Defendants have filed no brief. We discover no point in plaintiff's brief which is not satisfactorily disposed of by the opinion of Judge McDaniel, except the point made by plaintiff that section 394, Code Civ. Proc., is violative of section 16, art. 12, and subdivisions 3, 4, § 25, art. 4 of the Constitution. Section 16, article 12, reads as follows: "Sec. 16. A corporation or association may be sued in the county where the contract is made or is to be performed, or where the obligation or liability arises, or the breach occurs; or in the county where the principal place of business of such corporation is situated, subject to the power of the court to change the place of trial as in other cases." It seems to us that the clause "subject to the power of the court to change the place of trial as in other cases" is authority for the court to look to section 394, Code Civ. Proc., as providing for some of the "other cases" referred to in the Constitution in which the change of the place of trial is provided for. The further point that section 394 is obnoxious to the provisions of the Constitution prohibiting special legislation, "regulating the practice of courts of justice," and "providing for changing the venue" of actions, because according privileges to corporations doing business without the county where the action is commenced not accorded to corporations doing business within the county, is not in our opinion, well taken. This discrimination is found in other sections where the right to have the place of trial changed is placed upon the distinct ground that the defendant resides in a county other than the county in which the action is commenced, and this although, had the defendant been a resident of the latter county, he could not have the venue changed. Such legislation has never been regarded as in any just sense special legislation within the meaning of the inhibitory provisions of the Constitution.

The order is affirmed.

Where an attorney who had acted as attorney for a client for some time offered to prosecute an action for a specified fee, and the client made no response, and the attorney then offered to prosecute the suit for a contingent fee if the client did not want to pay attorney's fees, and the client made no response, but had knowledge of the subsequent prosecution of the suit and accepted the beneficial results thereof, the client under Civ. Code, § 1589, consented to all the obligations arising therefrom as far as known, or ought to have been known by him, for the circumstances under which the offer of the attorney was made called for election on the part of the client which he must communicate to the attorney by expressing his choice between paying attorney's fees or a contingent fee, and the client must be deemed to have promised to pay the reasonable value of the services performed.

3. EVIDENCE (§ 354*) — BOOK ACCOUNT — ADMISSIBILITY.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Frederick W. Houser, Judge.

Action by W. C. Batcheller against Henry F. Whittier. From a judgment granting partial relief, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

G. E. Delavan, Jr., and Waldo M. York (Thomas C. Ridgway, of counsel), for appellant. Wm. Rhodes Hervey and Frank G. Finlayson, for respondent.

SHAW, J. Action to recover compensation for services rendered by plaintiff as an attorney at law for defendant.

Plaintiff alleges that on April 25, 1902, he and defendant entered into a contract, whereby, in consideration of plaintiff prosecuting a certain action for defendant against one Thomas Gormley, defendant would pay all the costs of such litigation and plaintiff and defendant would equally divide the proceeds of such action, if successful, and, if unsuccessful, plaintiff should make no charge for his professional services so rendered therein; that plaintiff brought the action and prosecuted the same to a successful termination, as a result of which defendant received valuable real estate and a sum of money. In his answer defendant admits the employment of plaintiff as his attorney in said matter, and also admits the action was prosecuted to a successful termination with the alleged resultant benefits, but denies making the alleged agreement touching the compensation to be paid plaintiff for services rendered in said matter, but, on the contrary, alleges "that it was agreed between plaintiff and defendant that plaintiff should receive the sum of $250 for his services in such litigation in the superior court of the county of Los Angeles, state of California," and that no agreement was had as to compensation for services in case an appeal should be prosecuted to the higher court. Upon the trial the court, among other facts, found that plaintiff offered to render his services in the prosecution of the action for a fee of one-half of the proceeds thereof, if successful, and that he would make no charge if unsuccessful, "but said defendant did not accept said proposition of plaintiff." The court further found "that it was not agreed between plaintiff and defendant that the plaintiff should receive $250 for his services in such litigation in the superior court of the county of Los Angeles, state of California"; that at the date of the employment plaintiff was the adviser and attorney at law of defendant, and that plaintiff fully performed his services as an attorney at law on behalf of defendant; and that the reasonable value of such services was and is $2,500, for which sum judgment went for plaintiff, from which, and an order denying his motion for a new trial, plaintiff appeals.

There is no question as to defendant employing plaintiff to prosecute the suit. The sole controversy relates to the existence of the alleged agreement fixing the compensation to be paid plaintiff for his services.

The chief contention upon which appellant urges a reversal is that the finding to the effect that defendant did not accept the offer found by the court to have been made by plaintiff is unsupported by the evidence. The alleged contract rests in the parol testimony of plaintiff. It appears therefrom that defendant on several occasions prior to instituting the suit consulted him as to the former's legal rights and the propriety of bringing an action to protect such rights before there was any discussion of the question of plaintiff's charges for services to be rendered; that in one of these conversations (when they were talking about the suit) defendant asked plaintiff, "How much would it be worth to bring the suit?" to which plaintiff replied that the services in the superior court would be worth from $250 to $500. "He (the defendant) didn't say anything to that." "And then," continues plaintiff, "the matter ran on, as I say, until this final conversation," which occurred on April 25, 1902. On this occasion, plaintiff testifies, defendant was uncertain what he would do, and plaintiff urged him to proceed with the suit, and, after further discussion of the details, defendant said "that he didn't want to take the chances of having to pay out attorney's fees and then losing the suit or losing the property." Thereupon plaintiff said: "Well, let's commence suit. If you don't want to pay attorney's fees, I will tell you what I will do. I will take it and put it through, and you pay the costs, and I will do the work, and we will each take one-half of what we get out of it, and, if we don't win I won't charge you anything for my services"—to which defendant replied, "Well, I will go you on that," and plaintiff said, "Very well, I will get the papers ready just as quick as I can and start the suit." Contrary to this evidence, defendant testifies that he called upon plaintiff, who for 10 or 12 years had acted as his attorney, told him that he desired to employ him in the matter and gave him the particulars of the case; that two or three days after this he asked the plaintiff what he was going to charge him for his services in the matter, and plaintiff replied $250; that no other conversation relating to plaintiff's compensation for his services in the matter was had between them, and no conversation ever occurred wherein plaintiff offered, as he testifies, to take charge of and prosecute the case to a termination for one-half of the proceeds that might result therefrom.

It thus appears the evidence of the parties was in sharp conflict upon the question of defendant giving expression to any verbal assent to the offer made by plaintiff. The denial that the conversation occurred at all, as testified to by defendant, is tantamount to a denial that he consented thereto by saying, in reply to the offer made by plaintiff, "I will go you on that." Appellant insists, however, that, conceding there were no words used by defendant communicating his acceptance of the offer, nevertheless, the making of the offer as found by the court imposed upon defendant the duty of rejecting it by expressing his dissent therefrom; otherwise, defendant must be deemed to have accepted by reason of his permitting plaintiff to perform the services as a result of which the former was benefited. The testimony of defendant clearly tends to prove that there was on his part no express verbal acceptance of the proposal. The question then resolves itself into this: Did the making of the proposal as expressed in the language of plaintiff and performance of the services with defendant's knowledge, but in the absence of express words whereby defendant signified his assent thereto, constitute a promise on defendant's part to pay the sum specified in the offer? We say "promise" because the action is based upon a promise in consideration of which plaintiff performed the service.

The evidence of plaintiff clearly tends to show that at the time of instituting the action plaintiff had made two propositions

One for services to be rendered in the superior court for a compensation of $250 to $500, as to which plaintiff testifies defendant said nothing. Later, when plaintiff urged defendant to institute suit and the latter expressed himself as reluctant to pay attorney's fees, plaintiff made a proposal for a contingent fee, which is embraced in his statement of what he said to defendant, above quoted. To this proposal the court, in effect, finds that defendant "likewise said nothing." In view of the existing and long continued relation between the parties of attorney and client, as found by the court, the fact that the plaintiff had offered to perform the services incidental to a trial in the superior court for a specified fee, the subsequent offer made upon the condition that "if" defendant did not "want to pay attorney's fees" plaintiff would prosecute the action to a final determination for a contingent fee, necessarily called for some verbal expression on the part of defendant in order to signify his choice of evils between paying attorney's fees and the acceptance of the offer predicated upon the conditional clause introduced by the word "if." Clearly the offer was not absolute, but made dependent upon the condition as to whether or not defendant wanted "to pay attorney's fees." The nature of the proposal and circumstances under which it was made were such as called for an election on the part of defendant, which election, if made, could only be communicated by some verbal expression as to his choice between the paying of attorney's fees and accepting plaintiff's offer. The effect of the court's finding that "defendant did not accept the offer" is that defendant made no reply thereto, but stood silent. Under the circumstances, the prosecution of the action with his knowledge and acceptance of the beneficial results thereof "was equivalent to a consent to all the obligations arising from it so far as" were known or ought to be known by him. Section 1589, Civ. Code. Inasmuch as he did not signify his election between paying attorney's fees and accepting plaintiff's offer, and as performance by plaintiff does not appear to have depended upon his promise to do either, it follows there was no meeting of the minds of the parties upon the subject of plaintiff's compensation. In the absence of an agreement upon the subject, defendant must be deemed to have promised to pay the reasonable value of the services performed in his behalf and with his consent and knowledge. This sum the judgment accords to plaintiff.

The court refused to receive in evidence an account book offered by plaintiff which purported to contain items of personal account between plaintiff and defendant relative to the Gormley suit, and which contained an entry as follows: "Agreed fee to be one-half." This entry, according to plaintiff's testimony, was made a month, or perhaps three months, after the alleged transaction. Conceding that an account book is admissible in evidence to prove an account sued on, the rule extends to such entries only as are the proper subject of a book account. 9 Ency. of Law, p. 930. The entry "agreed fee to be one-half" is a mere memorandum of a special contract and had no proper place in an account book (2 Wigmore on Ev. § 1541), and as to which the extent of its use in evidence is fixed by section 2047, Code Civ. Proc. Reid v. Reid, 73 Cal. 209, 14 Pac. 781; People v. Lanterman, 9 Cal. App. 684, 100 Pac. 720. There was no error in the ruling thereon.

Defendant borrowed from one C. K. Book $5,250, for which he gave his note and a mortgage securing its payment upon the real estate involved in the Gormley suit. Negotiations for this loan were conducted by plaintiff. The court refused to permit Book to testify that during these negotiations, had long after the making of the alleged contract, plaintiff stated to him that he (plaintiff) had a half interest in the property. This ruling is assigned as error. The making of this statement was wholly disconnected with the transaction claiming to constitute the making of the contract. Upon no theory could it be regarded as a part of the res gestæ. We are acquainted with no principle of law under which this self-serving declaration, made without the presence of defendant, could properly be admitted in evidence. Authority to the contrary is found in Hausman v. Hausling, 78 Cal. 283, 20 Pac. 570; Nicholson v. Tarpey, 70 Cal. 608, 12 Pac. 778; Shamp v. White, 106 Cal. 220, 39 Pac. 537.

Judgment and order affirmed.

Ex parte BOND. (Cr. 155.)

(Court of Appeal, Second District, California. Dec. 20, 1909.)

1. INTOXICATING LIQUORS (§ 147*)—PROHIBITORY ORDINANCES—SCOPE OF ORDINANCE.

An ordinance, providing that any person who establishes, keeps open, maintains, or carries on a place where spirituous liquors are sold or given away "or" who, either as owner, employé, agent, etc., sells or gives away spirituous liquors, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, is broad enough to include the selling or giving away of liquors, whether at a place of business or not, as the two clauses are connected by the disjunctive.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Intoxicating Liquors, Cent Dig. § 162; Dec. Dig. § 147.*]

2. INTOXICATING LIQUORS (§ 146*)—UNLAWFUL SALE—ONE SALE AS OFFENSE.

Under an ordinance making it a misdemeanor for any person to sell or give away spirituous liquors, one sale is sufficient to constitute the offense.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Intoxicating Liquors, Cent. Dig. § 159; Dec. Dig. § 146.*]

3. INTOXICATING LIQUORS (§ 10*) — POLICE POWER—ORDINANCES.

A city has power under its police power, by virtue of Const. art. 11, § 11, to pass an ordinance making a single sale of spirituous liquor, in violation of the terms of the ordinance, an offense.

4. INTOXICATING LIQUORS (§ 146*)—OFFENSES —SALE BY SECRET SOCIETY — BONA FIDE CLUB.

A prohibitory ordinance, making it a crime for any person, corporation, club, or association to sell or give away spirituous liquors, was enacted. A decision was handed down by the court thereafter that, though the ordinance was valid, in a proper case it would preserve the personal right of one at his fireside to serve his guests. Thereafter a secret society was formed, having for its declared objects charity, moral and social ethics, etc., and to "purchase, store and distribute goods and supplies to its members," and the society established a bar, and supplied its members with liquors from a common stock and for pay, punched tickets which each member was provided with, and for which he had given an order authorizing the society to purchase for him the different supplies to an amount represented by the figures on the tickets. The bar bill of the club was the least in amount of all the supplies. Held, that the society was not a bona fide social club entitled to claim fireside rights.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Intoxicating Liquors, Cent. Dig. §§ 159, 160; Dec. Dig. § 146.*]

5. INTOXICATING LIQUORS (§ 146*)—SALE BY CLUBS—WHAT CONSTITUTES.

Neither under such facts could a member who, in the absence of the steward of the club, furnished liquor from the common stock to other members, and for pay, punched the tickets which they presented, claim nonresponsibility on the ground that he was a host serving his guests, since it was a sale by the member acting for the club to the members receiving the liquor.

Application by James E. Bond for a writ of habeas corpus to secure his release from custody. Writ discharged, and petitioner remanded.

John D. Pitts, for petitioner. Ralph E. Swing, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. Petitioner was found guilty of violating a prohibitory liquor ordinance of the city of Upland, and sentenced to pay a fine of $50, with the alternative of imprisonment of one day for each dollar of fine. On application of his attorney to this court a writ was issued against the city marshal of Upland, in whose custody petitioner was detained, and the matter is before us for hearing upon the sufficiency of the petition.

The complaint and a stipulated statement of the evidence upon which the conviction was had are made part of the petition. The complaint charges that the defendant did "* * * willfully and unlawfully sell, furnish, distribute, deliver, and give away, and for a long time prior thereto had been willfully and unlawfully selling, furnishing, distributing, and giving away, spirituous and malt intoxicating liquors, to wit, whisky and beer." The portion of the ordinance necessary to be considered here reads: "Section 1. Any person, firm, corporation, club, or association that within the city of Upland, California, establishes, keeps, opens, maintains or carries on a place where spirituous, vinous or malt, or mixed liquors, or any alcoholic or any intoxicating drink or drinks, or so-called temperance beer, containing alcohol in any quantity whatever, are sold, kept for sale, offered for sale, furnished, distributed, divided, delivered, drank or given away; or, that within said city, either as owner, employé, agent, servant, clerk, or otherwise, sells, keeps for sale, offers for sale, furnishes, distributes, divides, delivers, or gives away, any spirituous, vinous, malt or mixed liquors, or any alcoholic or intoxicating drink or drinks, or so-called temperance beer containing alcohol in any quantity whatever, except as herein provided, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor." The exception relates to sales for medical and mechanical purposes.

The petition shows that the defendant is a member of a secret society organized in Upland, and incorporated in this state under the name of the "Protective Brotherhood of the Alamo." The purposes of the order, as set forth in the articles of incorporation, are: "To promote charities, moral and social ethics, fraternalism, righteous citizenship, the brotherhood of its members and benevolence to all mankind. To encourage useful and profitable industries, to provide amusements, athletic sports, libraries, reading rooms, cafés, social halls and clubrooms for its members. To provide for sick and disabled members and the families of deceased members. To organize, charter, equip and institute subordinate lodges of the Protective Brotherhood of the Alamo, in this and other states. To purchase, store and distribute goods, wares and supplies for its members and the subordinate lodges of the order."

The organization leased and occupied a building formerly used as a hotel, and therein, in addition to lodge rooms, clubrooms, including parlors, reception rooms, library and reading rooms, banquet hall, dining room, sleeping apartments, and committee rooms, maintained a bar from which members of the organization only were furnished with spirituous, vinous, and malt liquors, for which there had been procured a United States retail liquor license. The method of disbursing the liquors, which was ordinarily attended to by a steward, was as follows:

Any member who wished to become a patron of the bar deposited (presumably with the steward) such sum as he desired to invest in a ticket or tickets, bearing upon the face the figure 5 or a series of 5's, representing at five cents per figure the amount paid or deposited. Upon ordering liquors or other supplies, if any such were included, the number of 5's on the ticket which represented the value of the purchase, the figures being taken at a valuation of five cents each, were punched by the person delivering the goods. Thus, for a glass of beer, valued at five cents, one figure would be punched, and for a drink of whisky, valued at ten cents, two figures would be punched. No money passed directly at the time the liquor or supplies were received by the patron, but an order blank, directing the board of directors to purchase for the member who bought the ticket certain specified supplies, liquors, lodgings, meals, cigars, etc., specified thereon, was signed and delivered at the time of the "deposit" for the ticket. To show that the organization was a bona fide fraternal and secret society, a showing is made of the value of the furniture and fixtures, lodgeroom accessories and supplies on hand, making an aggregate of $4,500. The vinous and malt liquors totaled only $16.50. each of the other supplies named having a greater value; even mineral waters reaching an aggregate of $37.50.

Amid these surroundings the defendant, in the absence of the steward, furnished and delivered to various members of said corporation holding the above-mentioned tickets both beer and whisky, punching and canceling their respective tickets in the manner above described. The beer and whisky so furnished and delivered by defendant was taken and furnished from the common stock kept on hand by said corporation for the purpose of serving to members, on demand, holding tickets regularly issued, and was not the individual, separate property of the persons to whom defendant served the same.

We are satisfied that the ordinance is broad enough in its terms to include the selling or giving away of intoxicating liquors, whether at a place of business or not. The two clauses of section 1 of the ordinance are stated in the disjunctive, the first relating to the keeping of a place, and the second to a sale, gift, or distribution by any person, either "as owner, employé, agent, servant, clerk, or otherwise." That one sale may be a violation of the second clause is supported by the leading opinion in Ex parte Fedderwitz, 130 Cal. xviii, 62 Pac. 935, 940. The ordinance before the court in that case, like the one here, was a prohibitory as distinguished from a license ordinance. Like this, also, it contained one clause applying to the keeping of a place of business, and another relating to the selling, offering for sale, and giving away of intoxicating liquors. Reviewing the opinion in Merced Co. v. Helm, 102 Cal. 159, 36 Pac. 399, in which it was said that a single sale did not constitute a violation of the ordinance there under consideration, Beatty, C. J., in the Fedderwitz opinion, says: "But that case has no bearing on the proposition. That was a civil action to recover a license which was imposed, and could only be imposed, for the privilege of conducting the business." A single sale was there held not to be carrying on the business in the sense of a license law. "It does not follow from this, however, that a single sale may not constitute a crime, if the ordinance so provides, as this clearly does." It was also held in that case that the power to pass an ordinance such as the one before us is unquestionably conferred by section 11, art. 11, of the Constitution of the state. Speaking with reference to earlier cases distinguished, it is said: "It was not decided or intimated that a prohibition of single sales was beyond the power of the municipality. In this case —for the first time apparently—that question is directly involved, and we can only say that no law has been called to our attention with which the Berkeley ordinance conflicts. The dissenting opinions in that case discuss other matter considered in the leading opinion, and do not affect the question before us, but McFarland, J., in his concurring opinion, limits his support of the decision in this respect by the declaration that the language of the complaint charged a sale, whereas the ordinance also included a "giving away." As to the latter he says: "So that by the terms of this ordinance it would be a public offense, punishable by imprisonment, for any person in Berkeley, in his own home, and at his own table or fireside, to offer a glass of wine or beer to a guest; and I desire to say that when a petitioner convicted of this time-honored hospitality shall come here for relief, I will not feel myself precluded from again inquiring whether or not a personal right guaranteed by the Constitution has been violated."

Relying upon the principle announced in the reservation made by Justice McFarland, and claiming the right to extend that reservation to the hospitality of the social club by virtue of what is said in the case of Cuzner v. California Club (Cal.) 100 Pac. 868, 20 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1095, the petitioner contends that the bona fide social character of the club of which defendant was a member had been established. The Cuzner-California Club Case is readily distinguished from the case before us in that it was a license case pure and simple, while here we have no question of when a traffic in liquors may be carried on without a license. The question is, Did the defendant traffic in, sell, or give away liquors in violation of an ordinance prohibiting each and all of these things? The matter before the Supreme Court in the California Club Case was not, "Has a municipality the right to prohibit by ordinance the distribution of liquors in the manner shown in the record in that case?" but, Was the club violating a license ordinance by such a distribution without procuring a license? We fully approve and concur in the views of Justice McFarland as to the invasion of the hospitality of the fireside, and in a proper case it might be that we should recognize that the club was the fireside of its members, or some of them. The question, however, of whether or not a club is the bona fide fireside of one claiming this protection from prosecution for the violation of a prohibitory liquor ordinance must depend upon the facts in each particular case.

Considering this question as it affects the Protective Brotherhood of the Alamo, we find the following conditions: On July 2, 1906, the city of Upland passed a prohibitive liquor ordinance which made it unlawful for any person or persons to keep any and every form of place in which traffic in intoxicating drinks as a beverage is ordinarily carried on, including "blind pigs" and "boot legs." On July 30, 1908, the section as hereinabove quoted was introduced as an amendment to the ordinance; the terms "club, corporation, and association" not appearing in the original. This amendment appears to have slept for a year, but was finally passed and adopted on the 3d day of August, 1909. In the meantime the decision in the California Club Case was filed on March 6, 1909, and on April 12, 1909, the Protective Brotherhood of the Alamo was incorporated. Accepting the moral, athletic, healthful, benevolent, and philanthropic purposes of the order as being declared in good faith, we cannot overlook those other purposes appearing in the articles of incorporation which are not so closely allied with the foregoing, and more nearly connected with and more easily made applicable to the transactions in which the defendant was engaged. That a fraternal brotherhood equipped as this one was should be organized in the prohibition community of Upland at such a time, with the declared purposes, "To purchase, store and distribute goods, wares, and supplies for its members and the subordinate lodges of the order," and should upon its organization proceed at once to establish a bar, and provide the "machinery" which this one did to extract the "goods, wares and supplies" from the bar, gives strong support to the implied finding in the judgment of conviction of the defendant that these purposes of the order were intended to cover an evasion of the prohibition laws of the community in which it resided. Like many efforts of litigants to establish "too good a case," the evidence here seems to prove too much. Simplicity and directness are the best evidences of good faith; and, when complexity and intricate machinery are introduced to accomplish that which from its very nature does not require it, we usually and naturally assume that such use was intended to cover up something. If the case were before us on appeal, we should say at once that there was abundant evidence to support a finding of an intent to evade. The use of the written order and deposit and ticket in the manner shown by the evidence does not change the transaction. The commuter who purchases his ticket for 10 or 20 or 30 rides cannot be said to buy a share in the car or railroad; neither can it be said that when the conductor punches his ticket to cover his transportation he does not by this act pay his fare. The defendant was acting for the club in serving, from the common stock held by it, liquors to the members of the club and punching their tickets therefor. The liquor he served did not belong to him, and he was not dispensing the hospitality of himself or of the club. No attempt was made to show in any manner that the hospitality in question was his. It was a sale by the club to such of its members as obtained the liquor from the defendant.

Writ discharged, and petitioner remanded to the custody of the marshal of the city of Upland, with direction that he be imprisoned in the county jail of San Bernardino county, in accordance with the commitment returned with the writ issued by the court, in default of payment of the fine therein provided.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Walter Bordwell, Judge.

Action by Eugene Klein against the Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fé Railway Company. From a judgment for plaintiff and from an order denying a new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

T. J. Norton and A. H. Van Cott, for appellant. Williams, Goudge & Chandler and Jones & Drake, for respondent.

ALLEN, P. J. This is an action for damages on account of personal injuries, it being averred that plaintiff, a passenger on defendant's train, which collided with another train through defendant's negligence, was, by such collision, thrown from his seat against the opposite seat and on the floor of the car, thereby sustaining injuries in the back, lower abdomen, a shock to the nervous system, a sprain of the back, a double inguinal hernia, together with other internal injuries, permanently affecting and impairing his health, and by which he is disabled for life. The cause was tried by a jury and a verdict in plaintiff's favor for $8,500 returned, upon which verdict a judgment was entered January 21, 1908. A motion for a new trial was denied, and from the judgment and the order denying a new trial defendant gave notice of appeal on July 21, 1909. The principal claim of appellant is that the testimony of plaintiff bears the imprint of falsity and the jury should have rejected the same, and that the corroborative testimony is insufficient, when taken in connection with plaintiff's evidence, to sustain the verdict. It is evident from an examination of the record that many inaccuracies and inconsistencies are observable in the testimony of plaintiff; in fact, serious contradictions of former statements and former testimony are made to appear. But the verdict does not rest upon the evidence of plaintiff alone, as was the case in Railway Company v. Somers, 71 Tex. 700, 9 S. W. 741.

The negligence which occasioned the collision was conceded upon the trial, and, as stated by the trial court to the jury, the only issues to be determined were whether or not all or any of the injuries complained of by plaintiff were proximately caused by such collision, and, if so caused, what damages should be assessed therefor. There was testimony by plaintiff and other witnesses, some of whom were disinterested, to the effect that before the accident plaintiff had the appearance of being a well man, and was able to work and undergo great physical effort without apparent fatigue. As his wife expressed it, "he was the picture of health." There is other testimony—that of a physician who made an examination of plaintiff as early as 1903, who testified that at the time he had no organic disease, and his only affliction seemed to be a nervous condition produced by overwork and worry. There is nothing in the record indicating that in the interval between that examination and the collision any serious change had been produced in his physical condition, unless it be assumed from certain expert testimony which was introduced upon the part of defendant tending to show that certain physical defects were of long standing. The jury, in considering this evidence in connection with the other evidence in the case, and in answering certain special interrogatories submitted by the court, determined, as may be inferred from such answers to the special interrogatories, that plaintiff before the injury complained of was afflicted with nervous and stomach trouble, but that the same was exaggerated by the collision. They further found, however, that a rupture and a bowel trouble were both caused by the collision and that plaintiff was permanently injured and diseased and the same were caused by the collision. There is evidence in the record warranting such answers to the special interrogatories. There is also evidence in the record tending to show that after the collision medical examinations developed that, in addition to a complete rupture, plaintiff "had an ataxia," and was suffering "from hemianesthesia and from chronic peritonitis"; and it is in evidence that all of these ailments might be attributed to a sudden shock or injury. There was independent testimony showing at the time of the collision plaintiff was thrown from his seat onto the floor of the car; that his appearance after the accident was such as to indicate great suffering. Considering the entire record, the evidence was such as to justify the jury in determining that the injuries were proximately caused by the collision, and that the answers to the various special interrogatories as to his ailments and their cause had support from the evidence.

It is insisted further that the verdict is excessive. This proposition is surely answered by what has heretofore been said as to the extent of the injuries established. It would be a strange doctrine which could be invoked in support of appellant's contention. Human suffering and a shortened life can scarcely be measured by a money standard, but certain it is that the amount of this verdict, when taken in connection with the extent of the injuries developed by the testimony, is open to no criticism, except it be directed to its inadequacy.

As to the matters involved in the credibility of witnesses, and the weight and effect which should be given their testimony, whether that of plaintiff or any other witness, it is sufficient to again call attention to the well-established rule that such questions are for the jury in the first instance and the judge who presides upon the hearing of the motion for a new trial. Where a conflict exists, appellate courts will not weigh evidence and determine its sufficiency or insufficiency as a matter of law.

Error is assigned on account of the refusal of the trial judge to submit the following special interrogatory: "Did the seat upon the seat in the section in which plaintiff was riding at the time of the collision strike the plaintiff in the abdomen?" The test as to whether, under the law as it then stood, such interrogatory required submission depends upon whether or not it is in answer to a material question involved in the case. As said by Chief Justice Beatty in Plyler v. Pacific, etc., Cement Co., 152 Cal. 130, 92 Pac. 59: "The very purpose of special findings is to test the validity of the general verdict by ascertaining whether or not it may have been the result of a misapplication of the law to actual findings in material conflict with the findings which in their absence would be implied from the general verdict." The particular thing which occasioned the injury, as alleged, was not the contact with the seat of the car upon which the plaintiff was riding, but the fact that plaintiff was thrown from such seat against the opposite seat and upon the floor. It was unnecessary for the jury, in order to arrive at a verdict, to all agree upon the subject of this interrogatory. The general verdict did not imply a finding in the regard stated. It was neither an issue, nor was it a material fact, and, had it been submitted and answered in the negative, would not have been such an inconsistent finding as to have affected the general verdict.

The instructions refused, and on account of which appellant claims error, were in substance given by the court in other instructions, and were sufficiently explicit as information to the jury in relation to the law of the case applicable to the facts submitted.

We see no error in the record, and the judgment and order are affirmed.

PAYNE v. PAYNE. (Civ. 696.)

(Court of Appeal, First District, California. Dec. 20, 1909. Rehearing Denied by Supreme Court Feb. 17, 1910.)

1. CONTRACTS (§ 96*)—VALIDITY—UNDUE INFLUENCE—CONFIDENTIAL RELATIONS.

Equity closely scrutinizes gifts and contracts between parties occupying confidential relations, such as parent and child, guardian and ward, etc., in which dominion may be exercised by one over another, and will forbid one occupying such a position from profiting at the expense of the other party without the fullest disclosure of the circumstances of the transaction.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Contracts, Cent. Dig. § 441; Dec. Dig. § 96.*]

2. DEEDS (§ 196*)—UNDUE INFLUENCE—BURDEN OF PROOF.

The burden is upon one occupying a confidential or fiduciary relation to another to show that the execution of a deed from such other was fair, free from fraud or undue influence, and that the grantor was mentally competent at the time.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Deeds, Cent. Dig. §§ 588, 589; Dec. Dig. § 196.*]

3. DEEDS (§ 211*)—UNDUE INFLUENCE—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

Evidnce held to sustain a finding that a deed executed by plaintiff to defendant was procured by undue influence, while plaintiff was feeble and mentally incompetent.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Deeds, Dec. Dig. § 211.*]

4. DEEDS (§ 203*)—UNDUE INFLUENCE—ADMISSION OF EVIDENCE.

In a suit involving the validity of a deed claimed to have been made to grantor's daughter-in-law through undue influence, while grantor was feeble and mentally incompetent, the court must necessarily be liberal in admitting evidence of the acts, conduct, and expressions of the grantor to show undue influence.

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Clara County; J. R. Welch, Judge.

Action by Belinda J. Payne against Anna B. Payne. From a judgment for plaintiff, and an order denying a new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

H. E. Wilcox and D. M. Burnett, for appellant. Beasley & Fry, for respondent.

COOPER, P. J. It is claimed that the finding of the trial court to the effect that the deed made by plaintiff was procured by undue influence, and executed while plaintiff was weak, feeble, and mentally incompetent, is not supported by the evidence. We have carefully examined the evidence in the record, and in our opinion it is sufficient to support the finding.

The plaintiff was over 79 years of age at the time she made the deed to the defendant, and very feeble, being confined to her bed most of the time. The defendant was the daughter-in-law, of whom she was very fond, being the widow of her deceased son and the mother of two grandchildren. Defendant had, at the request of plaintiff, left her home, and devoted her time and attention to the plaintiff as companion and nurse for some weeks prior to the time the deed was made. The evidence does not show any intentional fraud or deceit on the part of defendant, but on the other hand she appears to have been kind, patient, and attentive during the days and nights she nursed and cared for plaintiff. Plaintiff was very feeble and under the influence of medicines most of the time. She talked a great deal, and at times incoherently, and seemed to fear that she would lose all her property. She told defendant that there were evil spirits in the house and that the spirits kept her from sleeping. She said that a web was being woven against her, and that the pills the doctor gave her had legs; she could feel them crawling in her stomach. She said her feet were Pandora's feet, and made other similar remarks. While the evidence is not sufficient to show that she was mentally incompetent, yet it does show that she was delirious at times, weak and very nervous. In such condition it is a matter of common knowledge that one will exaggerate the virtues of a friend who is kind and attentive, and even conceive a totally unfounded dislike, or even hatred, to one who has apparently been negligent or remiss. A hint or even a suggestion by one who has gained the confidence of such weakened and feeble person is often very potent in its results. We cannot say in this case that during the many days and nights in which the defendant had been faithfully and apparently lovingly attending to and nursing the plaintiff, such hints or suggestions were not made. The defendant had the deed prepared by her own attorney. Although in the home of plaintiff's daughter, Mrs. McGraw, the matter was not even mentioned to her, or to her husband, Dr. McGraw. The plaintiff did not advise with any third party, nor was it suggested to her that she do so. The notary who took the acknowledgment was brought to the house while Mrs. McGraw and her husband were absent. The deed was executed, acknowledged, delivered, and recorded before any one was informed of it other than the notary. In such case, even if we had doubts as to whether or not the deed was the free, voluntary act of the plaintiff, and if we were inclined to the belief that it was, we would not interfere with the finding of the trial judge. He saw the defendant upon the witness stand, and had the advantage of seeing and observing her and of hearing her voice while she was testifying. In such case, if error is committed it is better to err in favor of restoring the property of a feeble old woman to her dominion and control than to err in upholding a deed given under such circumstances as to cast suspicion upon it. Courts of equity not only view gifts and contracts which are made or take place between parties occupying confidential relations with a jealous eye, but they go further, and forbid any persons, standing in a fiduciary position, from making any profit in any way at the expense of the party whose interest he is bound to protect without the fullest and most complete disclosure. This rule applies to all the variety of relations in which dominion may be exercised by one person over another. It applies as between parent and child, guardian and ward, husband and wife, attorney and client. In such case the law does not presume consent, but casts the burden upon the person receiving such deed or benefiting by such transaction to prove that the transaction was fair, free from fraud or undue influence, and made by a person in full possession of his faculties. Honest transactions need not be concealed. They are usually done openly, in the daylight, in the face of the world. It is of the utmost importance that this class of cases should be carefully scrutinized, and in all cases set aside if attended with fraud, or if the instrument or deed is procured by undue influence. The elderly person who has become feeble, and whose physical and mental powers are waning, should not be allowed to become the victim of a designing person, whether such person be a relative, a child, a member of the same church or society or even a minister of the gospel. It is to the credit of courts of equity that in such cases they reach out their protecting hands and restore to the weak and feeble that which has been obtained from them by such improper influence or advice.

We have examined the various errors assigned by appellants as to rulings on the admissibility of testimony during the trial, and find no error of sufficient importance to justify a reversal of the case. In cases like this much latitude is allowed, and the courts necessarily are liberal in admitting evidence as to acts, conduct, and expressions by the person who is claimed to have been mentally incompetent.

BOYD v. BARGAGLIOTTI. (Civ. 632.)

(Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Dec. 17, 1909.)

1. Appeal and Error (§ 1011*)—Findings—Review.

Where there is a substantial conflict in the evidence, and the record on appeal reveals enough evidence to support the findings, the court on appeal will not examine in detail all the evidence presented by the record.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 3983; Dec. Dig. § 1011.*]

2. Contracts (§ 322*)—Building Contracts—Actions for Balance Due—Evidence.

In an action for the balance due under a contract for the construction of a bridge, evidence held to justify a finding that the failure to complete the bridge within the contract time was caused solely by the failure of the owner to supply materials as required by the contract.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Contracts, Dec. Dig. § 322.*]

3. Appeal and Error (§ 1011*)—Findings—Conclusiveness.

A finding on conflicting evidence is conclusive on appeal.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 3983; Dec. Dig. § 1011.*]

4. Contracts (§ 324*)—Work and Labor (§ 14*)—Actions—Nature and Form of Remedy.

Where the entire performance of a special contract has been prevented by one of the parties, or where its terms have been subsequently varied by mutual agreement, the action for the amount due for work done should be in the form of indebitatus assumpsit, and not on the contract.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Contracts, Cent. Dig. §§ 1549–1557; Dec. Dig. § 324;* Work and Labor, Cent. Dig. §§ 31–33; Dec. Dig. § 14.*]

5. Work and Labor (§ 27*)—Actions—Evidence—Contract.

In indebitatus assumpsit for work done under a contract, entire performance of which was prevented by the adverse party, or the terms of which were subsequently varied by mutual agreement, the contract is admissible in evidence as an admission of the standard of value, or as proof of any other fact necessary to the recovery.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Work and Labor, Cent. Dig. § 53; Dec. Dig. § 27.*]

6. Work and Labor (§ 15*)—Contracts—Actions.

Where a written contract for the construction of a bridge was modified by an oral agreement during the progress of the work, and the completion of the work within the contract time was prevented by the failure of the owner to provide material as required by the contract, the owner could not defeat a recovery on quantum meruit by proving that he received no benefit from the work because of the destruction of the bridge by a flood.

7. Contracts (§ 300*)—Failure to Perform—Excuses—Delay of Other Party.

Where the failure to complete a structure within the time fixed in the contract therefor was due solely to the negligence of the owner, he could not recover the liquidated damages stipulated for in the contract, for failure to complete the structure within the time specified.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Contracts, Cent. Dig. § 1378; Dec. Dig. § 300.*]

8. Arbitration and Award (§ 57*)—Sufficiency of Award.

The rule that it is essential to the validity of an award by arbitrators that it should finally determine the matters submitted, and leave nothing to be done except to execute the award, is true, both under the common law and under Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1281–1290, relating to arbitration.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Arbitration and Award, Cent. Dig. §§ 280–288; Dec. Dig. § 57.*]

9. Arbitration and Award (§ 59*)—Statutory Arbitration—Award—Sufficiency.

Where the submission to arbitration of a controversy between a contractor and the owner was not in writing, and the arbitrators merely pointed out the particulars in which they deemed the structure to be uncompleted under the contract, but did not assess damages, and did not settle definitely the differences between the parties, there was no arbitration under Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1281–1290, relating to arbitration.

10. Arbitration and Award (§ 59*)—Law Arbitration.

Nor in such case was there a common-law arbitration.

11. Work and Labor (§ 30*)—Findings—Sufficiency.

Where, in indebitatus assumpsit for work done under a contract for the construction of a bridge, the court found that the contractor did not fail to complete the bridge in any manner whatever, and that if there was any failure, it was due entirely to the failure of the owner to furnish necessary material, and that the failure to complete the work within the time specified in the contract was not due to the negligence of the contractor, but was caused by the neglect of the owner to comply with his part of the contract, the finding was not so uncertain as not to support a judgment for the contractor for the value of the work done.

Appeal from Superior Court, Mendocino County; J. Q. White, Judge.

Action by J. S. Boyd against P. Bargagliotti. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

McNab & Hirsch, for appellant. Robert Duncan, for respondent.

HART, J. By the terms of a certain contract, entered into by and between the parties on the 17th day of September, 1906, the plaintiff and one J. L. Hughes agreed to construct for the appellant a bridge across Russian river, near the town of Pieta, in Mendocino county, for the sum of $575. Said contract, although made on the 17th day of September, 1906, was not signed by the parties until the 13th day of October of said year. By the contract, however, the defendant agreed to furnish all the materials with which said bridge was to be built, and to place the same on the bridge site, where they would be accessible to the builders. The parties of the second part (plaintiff and Hughes) covenanted to complete the erection of said bridge "within sixty working days from the date hereof." It was stipulated on the part of the defendant that he would pay Boyd and Hughes "twenty-five per cent. of said $575.00 when fifty per cent. of said work shall have been completed and the remainder of said sum, $575.00, at the completion of said work." The contract further contained the following clause: "And for the true and faithful performance of all and every of the covenants and agreements above mentioned, the parties to these presents covenant and agree each with the other that the sum of three hundred dollars ($300.00) gold coin of said United States, as fixed, settled, and liquidated damages shall be paid to the other by the failing party, if such there be." On November 26, 1906, the defendant made a payment to the plaintiff and Hughes of the sum of $200 on the contract price.

The bridge was not completed within the time stipulated in the contract, and a controversy arose between the parties upon the question whether the contractors had performed their work according to their agreement. This led to an agreement on the part of all the parties to submit the question upon which the differences between them rested to the determination of two disinterested persons, to be selected by the parties—one by the contractors, and the other by the defendant. Accordingly two persons were selected to arbitrate and decide the controversy, and, in furtherance of the agreement to arbitrate, they heard the statements of the parties to the contract, examined the contract and the specifications, and inspected the bridge, and finally rendered the following decision or award: "We find that said bridge is not completed in accordance with the written contract, in so far as that the railing is not in place. One strut is not in place. Three cross-rods are not in place. Bracing between piling of center pier is not in place. As far as the concrete work is concerned, the preponderance of evidence is in favor of the contractor, and we must so hold. The time limit of the written contract certainly has expired, and no doubt the owner has been injured thereby. But we will not assess damages thereon, provided the contractor without unnecessary delay completes said structure. Provided, further, that under all the circumstances, contractor should devote at least five days' actual time of a good mechanic to assist the owner in completing the approaches to said bridge. If the contractor does complete said structure, fully and in accordance with each and every stipulation herein contained, then it is our judgment that the contractor shall be entitled to the compensation as it is contained in the original contract." The submission of the controversy to arbitration was not in writing, and it is not pretended, and obviously it could not be, that the arbitration herein mentioned is the proceeding authorized by sections 1281 to 1290, inclusive, of the Code of Civil Procedure.

In February, 1907, however, the bridge was carried away by the force of the high waters of Russian river, and whether the contractors completed the bridge according to the terms of their agreement, or, if they did, whether their default in so completing it within the time prescribed by the contract was excused because of the conduct of the defendant, constitute the principal propositions in the case, and from which arise all the legal points upon which appellant asks for a reversal. The defendant claims that the plaintiff and Hughes failed to complete the bridge in accordance with the stipulations of the contract, and upon such claim refused to pay to the contractors the balance which they claimed was due them under said contract.

The complaint contains several distinct counts, all, with the exception of one, being pleaded in the form of a general assumpsit, to wit: For "lumber and material, and work and labor and money laid out and expended," by the plaintiff, in the sum of $226.70; (2) for "labor performed and for moneys laid out and expended by said plaintiff and said Hughes for said defendant," of the value of $46.05; (3) the balance due under the terms of the contract, to wit, the sum of $375. The first and second counts are upon a quantum meruit. It may here be stated that, under an oral agreement made between the parties subsequently to the execution of the written contract, there were some deviations in the erection of the bridge from the original specifications, and hence the plaintiff not only declared upon the contract, but also counted upon the unpaid balance thereunder in the form of a common count, or in indebitatus assumpsit. The complaint further pleads an assignment to plaintiff by Hughes of all his right to and interest in the claims pleaded in the complaint. The answer denies each and all the material allegations of the complaint, and, furthermore, and in addition to general damages, sets up a number of counterclaims—one in the nature of damages for loss of lumber alleged to have been sustained by the defendant through the negligence of plaintiff and Hughes, and others, for the reasonable value of the use of defendant's tools and implements; for rent and occupation of a house and barn while the bridge was in process of construction; for labor performed for plaintiff and Hughes "at their special instance and request"; for wines and vegetables furnished to the said contractors at their request, and for the alleged liquidated damage provided for in the contract for negligently failing to complete the contract within the stipulated time. The answer, moreover, pleads the award of said arbitrators as a defense and also in abatement of the action. The prayer of the answer is for affirmative relief by way of general damages, liquidated damages, and for a sum on account of the other claims alleged in said answer to be due defendant.

The defendant also filed a cross-complaint making Hughes a party thereto, wherein the contract between the parties is pleaded, failure of the contractors through inexcusable negligence to complete the bridge is alleged and general damages, in addition to those fixed by the contract, pleaded and prayed for. Boyd and Hughes answered the cross-complaint, denying each and all of the material allegations thereof. The court found in favor of Boyd and Hughes upon all vital points, and accordingly rendered and entered judgment in favor of Boyd for the sum of $562.75 and in favor of Hughes, as defendant to the cross-complaint, for costs. This appeal is from said judgment and the order of the court denying Bargagliotti's motion for a new trial.

Among other things, the court found: That Boyd and Hughes completed the bridge according to the specifications of the contract, but not within the time fixed by the contract; that their failure to complete it within said period of time was due to no fault of the contractors, but solely to the negligence of Bargagliotti in failing to furnish the material with which to construct it; that the claims pleaded in the first and second counts of the complaint were for money expended, services, etc., in connection with the erection of the bridge; that, as to the claim for the sum of $226.70, alleged in the complaint as being the reasonable value of "lumber and materials, and work and labor performed, and money laid out and expended, by plaintiff for said defendant," the sum of $167.45 was the reasonable value thereof, and that the same was due Boyd from Bargagliotti on that account; that as to the second count, wherein it is alleged that plaintiff and Hughes performed labor and expended money, "at the special instance and request" of appellant, of the reasonable value of $46.05, the sum of $20.30 was the reasonable value of such services, and the money so expended. The court further found that the sum of $375—the balance due under the terms of the contract—was still unpaid and due plaintiff, and "that said work and labor so performed by said plaintiff and said Hughes under said contract was and are reasonably worth the sum of $375." The court further found against all the allegations of the answer upon which affirmative relief was asked by the defendant. The court also found that the differences between the parties were not, as a matter of fact, submitted to arbitration, and that the sum of $300 (fixed in the contract as liquidated damages for failure upon the part of either of the parties thereto to comply with the vital terms thereof) "is not, and was not at the time of the commencement of this action, or any other time, due or owing from Boyd and Hughes, or either of them, to the cross-complainant, Bargagliotti," etc.

The appellant makes these points, upon which he claims to be entitled to a reversal of the judgment and order: (1) That the evidence is insufficient to justify the findings; (2) that the plaintiff, having counted on a quantum meruit as to the value of the services performed in pursuance of the terms of the written contract, waived his right to rely upon the express contract, and, the defendant having received no benefit from the labor so performed, the bridge having been destroyed before completion and prior to its acceptance, the plaintiff cannot recover on a quantum meruit; (3) the arbitration abated the action; and (4) certain errors of law occurring at the trial.

1. There exists a substantial conflict in the evidence upon all the important issues of fact presented by the pleadings. It will not be necessary to examine in detail all the evidence presented by the record; it being sufficient to say that the record reveals enough evidence to justify and support the findings. It is necessary, however, to refer to the evidence in a general way in order that some of the legal points urged by the appellant may be the better understood.

It appears that at some time prior to the making of the contract between the parties to this litigation an old bridge, which had been erected and maintained across the Russian river about a mile distant from the site of the bridge involved here, had been swept away by the high waters of the stream. Such of the materials of the old bridge as remained intact—piling and the like—were to be removed by the defendant to the site of the new bridge, and used by the contractors in the erection of said last-mentioned bridge. Boyd and Hughes undertook to remove the piles of the old bridge from the bed of the river, but experienced considerable difficulty, on account of the depth of the water at that point, in doing so. In fact, many of the piles they were required to saw off at as near their lower extremity as the condition of the river, as to quantity of water in its bed then, would permit. It was soon discovered that some of the piling thus secured would be entirely unsuitable for the purposes of the new bridge, and this finally led to an oral agreement, in the month of October, between the parties to the effect that cement should be used to brace the center pier of the bridge in the place of the piling called for by the written contract.

The principal contention of Bargagliotti here is that the contractors failed to complete the bridge either within the time stipulated and limited by the contract, or within a reasonable time after the so-called award by the arbitrators. The oral agreement, to which reference has been made, necessitated some delay; and, according to the testimony of Boyd and Hughes, Bargagliotti expressly acquiesced in such delay. By the written contract, as we have seen, the defendant (and we shall hereafter refer to Bargagliotti as "the defendant") agreed to furnish and place, or caused to be placed, at the site of the bridge, so that it would be readily accessible to the contractors, all materials necessary for the construction of the bridge. Boyd testified (and he was corroborated upon the point by Hughes) that the delays which occurred in the work on the bridge were occasioned by the neglect of the defendant to readily furnish the materials from which the structure was to be built. Boyd said: "There was a delay in not having the piling there in the neighborhood of two weeks. * * * There was other delay on account of flooring necessary for the construction of the bridge that necessitated our stopping work. * * * There was a delay of about a week on account of waiting for lumber."

Hughes testified, in part: "There was a change made in the plan with reference to that center pier. We were to put in 10 barrels of cement, and whatever gravel it would take to mix it up in this center pier, in lieu of putting in these pilings on each side. * * * There was something said at that time about an extension of time on account of the change being made. Mr. Bargagliotti allowed us an extension of time—as near as I could say, he didn't say any definite time to do it or anything. Mr. Bargagliotti made the proposition of change." Hughes continued, saying that they were delayed in the completion of the bridge because the defendant failed to have necessary material on the ground. On one occasion, he said, they were delayed two weeks, and on another about 10 days, on account of the neglect of the defendant to have material in readiness. These delays, it must be understood, were in addition to the delay due to the change of the material with which the center pier was to be braced.

Both Boyd and Hughes testified that, prior to the so-called submission to arbitration, they had completed the bridge. One of the points of controversy between the parties was whether it was the duty of the contractors to place a railing on the bridge. The specifications are silent on this point, and the contractors claim that they made no agreement to put on railing. Another point of divergence between them was as to the quantity of cement which was to be used in the concrete brace to the center pier of the bridge. Boyd and Hughes testified that they were, under the oral agreement, to furnish 10 barrels of cement only, and that they furnished that quantity of cement. The defendant, it is true, contradicts Boyd and Hughes and other witnesses produced by them on the question of the causes of delay, as well as upon all the other important points involved in the controversy, but this only creates such a conflict as estops this court from declaring, as a matter of law, that the findings are not sustained by the evidence.

Both Boyd and Hughes testified that, after the award was made by the arbitrators, settling the question whether the bridge had been completed according to the plans and specifications, they expressed willingness to Bargagliotti to do the work which the arbitrators had decided ought to be done on the bridge as soon as the defendant could get the material necessary to do so and place it at the bridge site. Bargagliotti, they said, replied that he desired to wait until he could secure the services of neighbors in building the approaches (these the defendant had agreed to build), and that then all the final work could be done at one time. Plaintiff and Hughes further testified that on several occasions after the "award" they went to the bridge to perform the work, but there was no material at hand for the purpose. Once Hughes called at defendant's residence to propose to go on with the work, but defendant was not at home. On these points, too, they are contradicted by the defendant, but again we are confronted with a situation in which there is presented a substantial conflict in the evidence. It was, as is well understood, for the trial court to say on which side the truth prevailed or the evidence preponderated, and, having found with Boyd and Hughes upon the proposition whether the failure to complete the bridge within the stipulated time was caused by the neglect of the contractors or that of the defendant, we are not at liberty to declare that the conclusion is erroneous. As to the other counts of the complaint the same conflict exists in the evidence, and the findings thereon cannot therefore be disturbed by this court.

2. The course of the plaintiff in pleading the indebtedness under the contract in the nature of a common count, or indebitatus assumpsit, was proper under the circumstances as disclosed by the evidence. We have already seen that the written contract, subsequently to its execution, and after work on the bridge had progressed to some extent, was modified by an oral agreement of the parties, and that the completion of the work was prevented by the conduct of the defendant, and it has frequently been held in this state that, "where the entire performance of a special contract has been prevented by one of the parties, or where its terms have been afterwards varied by the agreement of both parties, the action for the amount due for work and labor should be in the form of indebitatis assumpsit, and not upon the contract. In such case the contract may be introduced in evidence by either party as an admission of the standard of value, or as proof of any other fact necessary to the recovery." Reynolds v. Jourdan, 6 Cal. 112, the opinion being by Chief Justice Murray. The rule as thus stated has uniformly been followed in this state wherever the precise question has arisen. See Castagnino v. Balletta, 82 Cal. 250, 23 Pac. 127, and Adams v. Burbank, 103 Cal. 646, 37 Pac. 640. The contract, after its execution, and after work had been performed in pursuance of its terms, having been altered in a material particular by agreement of the parties, it is obvious that, had plaintiff declared upon the instrument as it was originally made, he would, at the trial, have encountered a variance between the proof and his pleading, for it would necessarily transpire, in view of the modification referred to, that the terms of the written contract had not been carried out. But, in any event, even if it be assumed that the count is upon a quantum meruit, the position of appellant would not be maintainable, since his failure to derive benefits from the work performed by the contractors was occasioned by his own inexcusable remissness. The truth is, according to the findings, the defendant himself was guilty of a breach of the contract by his negligence in failing to provide, as it was required by the contractors, the necessary material with which to perform the work, and whether the count under consideration be a common count or a quantum meruit, it is no defense to say in this action that the defendant received no benefit from the labor performed.

3. The claim that the defendant was entitled to a judgment for the liquidated damages prescribed by the contract because the contractors failed to complete the bridge within the time fixed by said contract is without merit, as is likewise the contention that the court should have awarded defendant damages, set up in the answer by way of recoupment to the claims counted upon in the complaint, for loss of lumber, rent of house, and loan and use of tools, implements, etc., and for general damages. If the evidence, as we have held to be the fact, supports the findings of the court that the bridge was not completed within the time stipulated in the contract because of the fault and culpable negligence of the defendant himself, then clearly the defendant is not entitled to either liquidated or general or any damages. Upon the questions involving the alleged claims for the use of the tools and implements referred to in the answer, and for rent alleged therein to be due the defendant for use and occupation of a house and barn, and for wines and vegetables alleged to have been furnished Boyd and Hughes by Bargagliotti during the progress of the work on the bridge, the evidence discloses a sharp conflict, and the findings thereon cannot consequently be disturbed.

4. The court was right in finding that no arbitration of any matters connected with the contract was had. The object of submitting questions of difference as to the rights of parties which are within the legitimate scope of a legal arbitration is to obviate or put an end to litigation, and it is essential to the validity of an award that it should be final—that it should finally determine the matters submitted to the arbitrators, thus leaving nothing to be done but to execute and carry out the terms of the award. Porter v. Scott, 7 Cal. 312; Jacob v. Ketcham, 37 Cal. 197; Pierson v. Norman, 2 Cal. 599; 3 Cyc. p. 693, and cases cited; 2 Am. & Eng. Enc. of Law (2d Ed.) pp. 749, 751. This is true both under the common law and under the Code. 2 Blackstone's Com. (4th Cooley's Ed.) p. 17; sections 1281 to 1290, inclusive, Code Civ. Proc. In the case at bar, the proceeding, called an arbitration, was not, as is obvious, an arbitration under our Code. But, assuming it to have been good as a common-law arbitration, as counsel for appellant contend, the decision of the arbitrators itself is lacking in the essentials of a valid award. No damages are assessed or awarded against the contractors, nor is there any other determination involved in the award which definitely settles the differences between the parties. It merely points out, as we have seen, certain particulars in which the arbitrators deemed the bridge to be uncompleted under the terms of the contract. This still left to be determined later whether, assuming that they had proceeded to comply with the requirements of the decision of the arbitrators, the contractors had in fact done as directed by the award. In other words, assuming that the contractors had undertaken to comply with the terms of the award, the defendant would still have been at liberty to object that the work had not been performed as required by the award, and no one would doubt his right to so defend in an action against him to recover on the contract.

5. It is argued that certain of the findings are uncertain and contradictory. This contention is founded on the following language of one of the findings, based on an allegation in the cross-complaint: "That said Boyd and Hughes did not fail and neglect to complete said bridge in any manner whatever or fail to comply with their contract, and if there was any failure to complete said bridge in any respect, such failure was due entirely to the failure of said defendant, Bargagliotti, to furnish the necessary materials to complete said bridge." The italicized portion of the foregoing finding is the subject of the criticism to which we refer, and there can be no doubt that, if it stood alone upon the proposition to which it relates, it would afford little support to the judgment. But the court not only in other findings, but in the very one from which we have quoted, distinctly and unqualifiedly finds that "said bridge was not completed within 60 working days from September 17, 1906, but the failure to complete the same was not due to the negligence or carelessness on the part of said plaintiff, Boyd, or said Hughes"; that the failure to so complete the bridge was caused by the neglect of Bargagliotti to comply "with his part of said contract," etc. The findings amply support the judgment.

6. We have found no prejudicial error in any of the rulings of the court.

As before stated, the findings upon all the vital questions of fact in the case are sufficiently supported by the evidence, and no reason appears justifying a reversal of the judgment and order.

The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

FORREST v. SOUTHERN PAC. CO.

(Civ. No. 692.)

(Court of Appeal, First District, California. Dec. 20, 1909.)

MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 180*)—INJURY TO SERVANT—NEGLIGENCE OF FELLOW SERVANT—CO-SERVANT ON THE SAME TRAIN.

Civ. Code, § 1970, as amended in 1907 (St. 1907, c. 97), exempts an employer from liability to his employé for injuries by the negligence of employés in the same general business, provided that the employer shall be liable when the injury results from the wrongful act or default of a co-employé employed upon a railroad train other than that upon which the injured employé is employed. The train upon which decedent was engineer and another work train took the side track at a station to await a passenger train going in the same direction, and a brakeman on decedent's train and one on the other work train went ahead on the passenger train to notify all trains that their respective trains would follow the passenger train, the other work train running first, but the brakeman from decedent's train negligently failed to notify another train that his train would follow the other work train, causing the collision in which decedent was killed. The company's rules permitted brakemen to ride on passenger trains to inform other trains of the movement of their own train. Held that, as the duty which the brakeman on decedent's train neglected was imposed for the safety of that train, he was employed on decedent's train within the statute at the time and not on the passenger train, though he was then riding on it, and hence the company was not liable for injuries caused by his negligence.

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Cruz County; Lucas F. Smith, Judge.

Action by Mary O. Forrest against the Southern Pacific Company. From a judgment for plaintiff and an order denying a new trial, defendant appeals. Reversed.

Cassin & Lucas, for appellant. Carl E. Lindsay and Benj. K. Knight, for respondent.

HALL, J. Plaintiff, as the widow and sole heir at law of James Forrest, brought this action to recover damages for the death of her said husband, caused by the collision of two railroad trains of defendant, upon one of which said James Forrest was employed as the locomotive engineer. The train upon which decedent was employed was known as train No. 21. The train with which it collided was known as train No. 2089. The collision occurred between Felton station and Big Tree station. Appellant and respondent agree that the collision and death of Mr. Forrest were the result of the negligence of a brakeman employed by defendant, one Jesse Manning. The point upon which appellant and respondent do not agree is as to whether or not at the time of the accident the said brakeman was employed, within the meaning of section 1970 of the Civil Code, as amended in 1907, upon a railroad train other than that on which Forrest was employed. The pertinent part of the statute under which it is claimed that defendant is liable for the death of Engineer Forrest is as follows: "An employer is not bound to indemnify his employee for losses suffered by the latter * * * in consequence of the negligence of another person employed by the same employer in the same general business * * *; provided, nevertheless, that the employer shall be liable * * * when such injury results from the wrongful act, neglect or default of a co-employee * * * employed upon a railroad train * * * other than that upon which the employee is injured is employed. * * *"

There is no dispute as to the facts in the case, which are as follows: Defendant operates a railroad from Boulder creek to the city of Santa Cruz. Felton station is between these points, and between Felton station and Santa Cruz is Big Tree station. Between Big Tree station and Santa Cruz is Felton Junction, from which a spur track extends to Old Felton. Shortly before the collision occurred train No. 21, which was a work train, and another work train No. 15, were lying on sidings at Felton station, intending to pass to Felton Junction, but waiting for the regular passenger train from Boulder creek to Santa Cruz, designated as No. 516, to pass on its way to Santa Cruz, while an extra work train designated as No. 2089 was lying upon the siding at Big Tree station, intending to pass to and beyond Felton station, but also waiting for the same train to pass. Trains Nos. 15 and 21 both had the right of way over No. 2089, and it had been agreed between the conductors of trains 15 and 21 that train 15 should precede train 21 to Felton Junction. Jesse Manning upon the day of the accident was employed as a brakeman on train 21, and had been so employed for 11 days prior thereto. Decedent was the locomotive engineer of the same train. Upon the day of the accident passenger train 516 was upon schedule time, and when it left Felton station on its way toward Santa Cruz a brakeman from train 15, by direction of the conductor of train 15, got upon and went with it to notify all trains that might approach from the direction of Santa Cruz that train 15 would follow train 516. Likewise Jesse Manning, the brakeman of train 21, under instructions from the conductor of said train, got upon and went with train 516 for the purpose of notifying all trains that might approach from the direction of Santa Cruz that train 21 would follow train 15. It was the duty of brakemen to act as flagmen, and to notify approaching trains of the presence and movements of their respective trains. According to the rules and practice of defendant it was allowable and proper for such brakeman to ride upon the locomotives of passenger trains to their objective points in the discharge of such duty.

The brakeman of train 15 properly performed his duty, and as the passenger train 516 passed Big Tree station notified train 2089 that train 15 would shortly follow train 516; but Jesse Manning, the brakeman of train 21, engaged in a conversation with a lady on the passenger train, and wholly failed to notify train 2089 of the intended movement of train 21, but passed on to a point beyond Felton Junction. The result was that after train 15 had passed Big Tree station train 2089 started toward Felton station, and shortly collided with train 21 which was following train 15 toward Felton Junction. It was in this collision that Mr. Forrest, the engineer of train 21, was killed.

Although it is not disputed that Manning was employed as a brakeman and flagman of train 21, it is contended by respondent that at the time of the accident he was not employed on such train within the meaning of the statute, but was employed on the passenger train within the meaning of the statute by reason of the fact that he was riding on such passenger train for the purpose of discharging a duty that he owed to train 21 and the crew thereof, of which he was clearly a member. He was a member of the crew of train 21, and the duty that he failed to perform was a duty that was imposed upon him because he was a brakeman upon such train and a member of its crew. The duty he failed to perform had no relation to the operation of the passenger train, upon which he was riding simply as a matter of convenience, but did have a most important relation to the operation of train 21 and the safety of its crew.

Before the amendment to section 1970 of the Civil Code of 1907 it would not be contended that the brakeman of a given train was not a fellow employé with the locomotive engineer of the same train. While Manning was riding upon the passenger train, he was not employed thereon within the meaning of the statute. He was still employed on the train of which he was the brakeman and flagman. He was then acting under the directions of the conductor of train 21. His mission, while riding on the passenger train, was because of his employment on and in the operation of train 21. He was just as much employed on train 21 as though he had been sent off on foot to flag against an expected approaching train. The cases cited from Texas, decided under the Texas statute, are not in point.

Under the undisputed facts of this case the brakeman whose negligence caused the death of Mr. Forrest was not employed upon a train other than the one upon which decedent was employed.

For this reason the verdict is not supported by the evidence, and the judgment and order must be reversed, and it is so ordered.

ALBERT v. ALBERT. (Civ. 724.)

(Court of Appeal, Second District, California. Dec. 21, 1909.)

1. Public Lands (§ 144*)—Certificate of Purchase—Assignment—Conditional Delivery.

Civ. Code, § 1056, providing that a grant cannot be delivered to a grantee conditionally, is applicable to an assignment of a certificate of purchase of public lands, and where such assignment, absolute on its face, is delivered to the assignee on oral conditions, the delivery is absolute, and the assignment takes effect immediately.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Public Lands, Dec. Dig. § 144.*]

2. Evidence (§ 444*)—Assignments—Conditional Delivery—Parol Evidence.

An absolute assignment of a certificate of purchase of public lands delivered to the assignee cannot be varied by parol evidence that the assignment was delivered on certain conditions, such as the payment of a note and mortgage.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. §§ 1929–1944; Dec. Dig. § 444.*]

3. Evidence (§ 444*)—Written Instruments—Parol Evidence to Vary.

Though delivery of an instrument is a question of fact which may be established by parol evidence, where it is shown that an assignment of a certificate of purchase of public lands has been duly delivered to the assignee, the rule will not permit the showing that the delivery is on condition.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. §§ 1929–1944; Dec. Dig. § 444.*]

4. Assignments (§ 59*)—Rescission—Mutual Consent.

Where an absolute assignment of a certificate of purchase of public lands is delivered to the assignee, though on a parol agreement that the assignee would pay a note and mortgage, a subsequent agreement by which the assignee agreed to reassign and the assignor pay the note and mortgage, would not constitute a rescission by mutual consent, since rescission presupposes the existence of an executory contract.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Assignments, Dec. Dig. § 59.*]

5. Assignments (§ 59*)—Right to Rescind—Assignment of Land Certificate.

Under Civ. Code, § 1689, authorizing the rescission of a contract by a party thereto, on failure of consideration through the fault of the other party, the assignor in an absolute assignment of a certificate of purchase of public lands, delivered to the assignee, cannot rescind because the assignee failed to perform an oral agreement, on which the assignment was based, that the assignee would pay a note and mortgage, since the agreement was a contract, a breach of which would only give a cause of action for damages.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Assignments, Dec. Dig. § 59.*]

6. Public Lands (§ 144*) — Certificate of Purchase — Assignments — Collateral Agreements—Rights of Parties.

An absolute assignment of a certificate of purchase of public lands was delivered to the assignee on an oral agreement that he would pay a note and mortgage. On failure to pay, it was subsequently agreed that, if the assignor would relieve the assignee of his covenant as created by the oral agreement, the latter would reassign each certificate. Held, in a contest over the right to have a duplicate certificate issued under provisions of Pol. Code, § 3518, which was referred to the court by virtue of section 3414, that such subsequent agreement could not avail the assignor in the contest, since it was a collateral agreement, which could only be enforced by an action for specific performance.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Public Lands, Dec. Dig. § 144.*]

7. Appeal and Error (§ 852*)—Review—Relief Awarded—Assignment of Land Certificate—Collateral Agreement.

The assignee of a certificate of purchase of public lands applied to have a duplicate certificate issued to him under Pol. Code, § 3518, and, on objection of the assignor, a contest was referred to the court under Pol. Code, § 3414. The assignment had been delivered on an oral agreement that the assignee would pay a note and mortgage. Subsequently it was agreed that if the assignor would pay the note and mortgage the assignee would reassign the certificate. Held, on appeal from the decision of the court finding for the assignor, that the judgment could not be affirmed as holding that the assignment was absolute, and that the assignor had no rights therein on the ground that the assignor was entitled to specific performance of his subsequent agreement where the complaint did not contain allegations sufficient to support such action.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Dec. Dig. § 852.*]

8. Frauds, Statute of (§ 73*)—Transfer of Real Property—Assignment of Land Certificate.

Under Pol. Code, § 3514, making the property evidenced by a certificate of purchase of public lands an interest in real estate, an oral agreement for its sale and transfer is obnoxious to the statute of frauds. Code Civ. Proc. § 1973.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Frauds, Statute of, Dec. Dig. § 73.*]

9. Frauds, Statute of (§ 129*)—Transfer of Real Property—Assignment of Land Certificate—Part Performance.

Under Pol. Code, § 3514, making the property evidenced by a certificate of purchase of public lands an interest in real estate, an oral agreement to assign such a certificate cannot be sustained on the ground of part performance within Civ. Code, § 1741, where, though the assignee paid the purchase price, he did not enter into possession of the land or improve the same.

Appeal from Superior Court, Kern County; J. W. Mahon, Judge.

Action by Charles Albert against Charles C. Albert. From a judgment for defendant and from an order denying a motion for a new trial, plaintiff appeals. Judgment and order reversed.

Rowen Irwin, for appellant. Chas. W. Sears, for respondent.

SHAW, J. This action involves a contest over the right to purchase certain school lands of the state. Judgment went for defendant, from which, and an order denying his motion for a new trial, plaintiff appeals. On May 7, 1896, a certificate of purchase of the lands involved was duly issued to defendant, Charles C. Albert. On November 25, 1904, pursuant to the provisions of section 3518, Pol. Code, he made application to the register of the state land office for the issuance to him of a duplicate certificate of purchase. On December 20, 1904, plaintiff duly filed in the office of said register his protest against the issuance of said duplicate certificate, claiming that he was the owner of said original certificate of purchase under an assignment thereof theretofore made to him by defendant. Whereupon, the surveyor, in accordance with the provisions of section 3414, Pol. Code, made his order whereby such contest was referred to the superior court of Kern county for adjudication.

The complaint alleges that in August, 1896, the certificate of purchase was, for a valuable consideration, duly and regularly assigned to plaintiff by defendant, and that ever since said date he has been the owner and holder thereof. Not only does the answer admit the making of the assignment, but the court found that the defendant "assigned the said certificate to plaintiff Charles Albert and the same was delivered by defendant to plaintiff, which assignment purports to assign all the right, title and interest in and to" the lands described in the certificate. In paragraph 4 of the answer, "defendant alleges that at the time of the execution of said assignment of said certificate of purchase, to wit, on or about the 4th day of August, 1896, that the said certificate of purchase was assigned and delivered by the said defendant to the said plaintiff under and by virtue of an agreement between the said parties that the said plaintiff would, on or before the said note and mortgage hereinbefore referred to (a certain note made by defendant to one Hannah and secured by mortgage upon the real estate described in the certificate of purchase) became due and payable, pay and satisfy the same and thereby relieve the said defendant from the payment thereof, and that the said execution of said certificate by the said defendant and the delivery thereof to the said plaintiff was made absolutely upon the agreement of the said plaintiff to pay the said note and mortgage as aforesaid, and for no other reason or consideration whatever; and it was then and there agreed by and between the plaintiff and defendant that said assignment should not take effect and should not be of any force or pass any interest whatsoever to said plaintiff until said plaintiff paid and satisfied and fully discharged the note and mortgage hereinbefore referred to, and in the event that said plaintiff failed to pay said note and mortgage as aforesaid, then the said plaintiff was to reassign at once and redeliver to said defendant the said certificate." The court, in substance, found this allegation to be true, and also found "that the said assignee, plaintiff herein, wholly failed to comply with his agreement so made, and failed and has ever failed to pay the amount payable on said note," or any part thereof. The facts thus alleged and found by the court to be true are supported solely and alone by oral evidence received over plaintiff's objection.

This ruling of the court is assigned as error. Since the certificate of purchase is a contract evidencing an interest in real property, and was "subject to sale, by deed or assignment, executed and acknowledged before any officer authorized by law to take acknowledgments of conveyances of real property" (section 3515, Pol. Code), and since the due execution and delivery of the assignment is admitted in the pleadings, and also found by the court (though it does not appear to have been acknowledged—query, whether acknowledgment requisite as between the parties), it would seem that the rule established by section 1056, Civ. Code, with reference to the delivery of grants, is equally applicable to transfers by deed or assignment of certificate of purchase. That section provides that a grant cannot be delivered to the grantee conditionally. Mr. Jones in his Law of Real Property, § 1303, says: "If the delivery be to the party to whom it is made, though upon the express condition, not appearing upon the face of the deed, that it is to take effect only upon certain conditions, whatever may be the form of the words, the delivery is absolute, and the deed takes effect immediately." To the same effect is Devlin on Deeds, § 314, and Mowry v. Heney, 86 Cal. 471, 25 Pac. 17. Moreover, to permit the introduction of oral evidence tending to establish an agreement contrary to the plain import of the written assignment, which on its face is absolute, would be in direct violation of that cardinal rule that the terms of a written instrument cannot be varied or altered by evidence resting in parol.

Respondent cites a number of authorities in support of the proposition that the delivery of an instrument is a question of fact to be determined by oral evidence. This is necessarily true, but the question of delivery is not involved here. The answer admits, and the court finds, that the certificate was assigned, and the instrument constituting the assignment was duly delivered by defendant to plaintiff. This being true, the terms and conditions of the assignment and transfer must be determined from the language of the instrument; nor can its operation and effect be abridged or limited by attaching thereto conditions and qualifications resting in parol. Finding 3 is based solely upon oral evidence, the admission of which constituted prejudicial error.

Defendant alleges in his answer and cross-complaint that plaintiff not only failed and neglected to perform his agreement to pay said note, but informed defendant that he was willing to, and did then and there at such time, agree with said defendant herein to redeliver and reassign the said certificate to said defendant and cross-complainant herein; that pursuant to said agreement defendant did on or about November 25, 1902, pay said note, and at the time of said payment plaintiff stated that he had no claim on said certificate or the property whatsoever. There was evidence tending to prove the facts contained in this allegation, and the court found the same to be true. It is suggested that such finding establishes a rescission by mutual consent, as well as by reason of a failure of consideration on account of plaintiff's neglect to pay said note. Section 1689, Civ. Code. Rescission presupposes the existence of an executory contract, while here the contract was fully executed so far as the transfer of the certificate of purchase was concerned. The effect of its assignment, if made pursuant to the statute, was to convey absolutely to plaintiff all interest which defendant had under and by virtue thereof to the land described therein. The transfer and assignment, as averred in the answer, "was made absolutely upon the agreement of the said plaintiff to pay the said note and mortgage as aforesaid and for no other reason or consideration whatever."

Disregarding, as we must, for reasons hereinbefore stated, the conditional delivery as alleged and found by the court, it seems clear that defendant transferred the certificate to plaintiff in reliance upon the latter's promise at a future time to pay the Hannah note. Under such circumstances, the breach of plaintiff's covenant would not warrant a rescission and revesting of the property in defendant under section 1689, Civ. Code, but a cause of action for damages only. Had plaintiff given his promissory note payable at a future date for the purchase price of the certificate and made default in its payment, it could not be seriously contended that defendant would have the right to rescind the contract and have the certificate reassigned him. Lawrence v. Gayetty, 78 Cal. 126, 20 Pac. 382, 12 Am. St. Rep. 29; Hartman v. Reed, 50 Cal. 485.

It is also suggested that the facts found show a parol agreement made by the parties to the effect that plaintiff would reassign and transfer the certificate to defendant, provided the latter would pay the Hannah note, thereby releasing plaintiff from his covenant to pay same, and that pursuant to such agreement defendant made said payment. Assuming this to be true, we are unable to perceive that such fact can avail defendant in securing an affirmation of the judgment. At most, the circumstances constitute a distinct transaction, wholly disconnected from the first, which could be enforced, if at all, by an action for specific performance. But defendant omits to allege the facts, if they exist, which are requisite to a sufficient complaint for specific performance. Stiles v. Hermosa Beach Land, etc., Co., 8 Cal. App. 352, 97 Pac. 91. Moreover, as the property evidenced by the certificate as between the parties is an interest in real estate (section 3514, Pol. Code; McCabe v. Goodwin, 106 Cal. 486, 39 Pac. 941), a parol agreement for its sale and transfer is obnoxious to the provisions of section 1973, Code Civ. Proc. Hill v. Den, 121 Cal. 42, 53 Pac. 642. Nor was there such part performance as to bring the transaction within the rule laid down in section 1741, Civ. Code, for the reason that, while it is found that defendant paid the purchase price, it is not found, though it is an issue raised by the pleadings, that he entered into possession of the land or made improvements thereon.

Judgment and order reversed.

RAULET v. NORTHWESTERN NAT. INS. CO. OF MILWAUKEE. (S. F. 5,039.)

(Supreme Court of California. Jan. 24, 1910.)

1. Insurance (§ 146*) — Construction of Policy.

Contracts of insurance should be considered in view of their general objects and the conditions prescribed by the insurers, rather than on the basis of a strict technical interpretation.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Insurance, Cent. Dig. § 295; Dec. Dig. § 146.*]

2. Insurance (§ 283*) — Construction of Policy—Breach of Conditions — Incumbrances.

In determining whether insured property was incumbered within the condition of the policy, the court should look at the circumstances surrounding the execution of the instrument sought to be considered an incumbrance, at the situation of the parties, and at what was done under it to determine its true character, and is not concluded by the mere fact that it is called a chattel mortgage or is in the form usual to chattel mortgages.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Insurance, Cent. Dig. § 639; Dec. Dig. § 283.*]

3. Insurance (§ 283*)—Breach of Condition—Incumbered Property—Chattel Mortgage.

An instrument in the form of a bond to become effective on the nonpayment of rent, and creating a lien on personal property for such rent, is not a "chattel mortgage" within the provisions of an insurance policy, rendering the same void "if the subject of insurance be personal property and be or become incumbered with a chattel mortgage," where no rent was due and unpaid at any time, and the risk was not increased by such instrument.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Insurance, Cent. Dig. §§ 639–641; Dec. Dig. § 283.*]

4. Insurance (§ 283*)—Breach of Condition—Incumbered Property.

Property which is under a contract subject to a lien for unpaid rent is not "incumbered" within a policy of insurance thereon, providing that it should be void "if the subject of the insurance be personal property and be or become incumbered with a chattel mortgage," where no rent was due and unpaid at any time, and the value of the property was many times the amount of the insurance.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Insurance, Cent. Dig. § 639; Dec. Dig. § 283.*]

5. Insurance (§ 632*)—Action on Policy—Pleading—Allegations as to Location of Property.

A complaint alleging that on a date specified "the said property was totally destroyed by fire; * * * that said property insured as aforesaid and described in said insurance policy consisted of household and kitchen furniture contained * * * in the five-story brick building occupied only as stores and lodgings," describing the building by street and number—sufficiently alleges the location of the property at the time of its loss.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Insurance, Cent. Dig. § 1595; Dec. Dig. § 632.*]

6. Insurance (§ 665*)—Premium—Time for Payment—Evidence.

Evidence held to show that credit was given insured for the payment of premium on fire insurance.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Insurance, Cent. Dig. § 1715; Dec. Dig. § 665.*]

7. Insurance (§ 665*)—Premium—Waiver of Payment—Evidence.

Evidence held to show that the payment of the premium for which credit had been given until after loss was then waived on the agreement that it should be deducted from the face value of the policy.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Insurance, Cent. Dig. § 1716; Dec. Dig. § 665.*]

8. Insurance (§ 645*)—Action on Policy—Pleading—Variance.

Though the complaint on a policy alleges that it was issued "in consideration of the stipulations herein and of $24 premium," evidence that credit for the premium was given insured does not constitute a variance as the policy may be construed to mean a promise to pay the premium.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Insurance, Cent. Dig. § 1642; Dec. Dig. § 645.*]

9. Insurance (§ 186*) — Construction of Policy—Intent of Parties.

The conduct of the parties may be considered when construing an insurance policy as to the payment of the premium or extending credit therefor.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Insurance, Cent. Dig. § 396; Dec. Dig. § 186.*]

10. Insurance (§ 646*)—Premium—Extending Credit—Evidence.

Where a policy is delivered without payment of the premium, it may be assumed that credit for the premium was extended to insured.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Insurance, Cent. Dig. § 1657; Dec. Dig. § 646.*]

11. Insurance (§ 670) — Construction of Policy—Payment of Premium—Credit—Findings.

In aid of a finding by the court that "the payment of the premium was not made a condition precedent to defendant's liability thereunder," the rule will be applied that "every indulgence not inconsistent with the plain meaning of the contract must be shown the insured."

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Insurance, Cent. Dig. § 1787; Dec. Dig. § 670.*]

12. INSURANCE (§ 349*)—PAYMENT OF PREMIUM—CONDITIONS PRECEDENT.

Though payment of the premium is expressly provided as the consideration for the policy, it is not a condition precedent to the operation of the policy and to any recovery on it.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Insurance, Cent. Dig. § 891; Dec. Dig. § 349.*]

13. INSURANCE (§ 645*)—ACTION ON POLICY—WAIVER OF CONDITIONS — ISSUES AND PROOF.

In an action on a policy, the allegations of the answer that plaintiff did not at any time before the destruction of the property pay or offer to pay the premium, or any part thereof, and that the premium was unpaid at the time the property was destroyed, rendered admissible evidence of a waiver of prepayment, though the complaint alleged payment of the premium.

14. INSURANCE (§ 282*)—BREACH OF CONDITION—OWNERSHIP OF PROPERTY.

Where insured was individually the owner of the property, subject only to her right and duty as executrix to hold temporary possession for the purpose of administration of her deceased husband's estate, she had the only insurable interest, and the validity of the policy was not affected by a provision therein that it should be void "if the interest of insured be other than unconditional and sole ownership."

15. DESCENT AND DISTRIBUTION (§ 74*)—WHEN PROPERTY VESTS.

Title to property vests in the heir or devisee from the moment of the death of the ancestor or testator.

16. INSURANCE (§ 138*)—CONTRACT OF INSURANCE—VALIDITY.

The rule that it must be presumed that persons are familiar with the contracts to which they are parties, and, in the absence of fraud, are bound by the provisions therein, should not be strictly applied to insurance policies.

17. INSURANCE (§ 389*)—CONDITIONS OF POLICY—WAIVER—INCUMBRANCE OF PROPERTY.

Even if an instrument providing for a lien on personal property for unpaid rent of the premises on which it is situated constitutes an incumbrance within a condition of the policy of insurance, such condition is waived where the policy is issued without any inquiry as to whether the property is incumbered and no representations were made in respect thereto.

18. PLEADING (§ 36*) — CONCLUSIVENESS OF ALLEGATIONS.

That plaintiff alleged performance of the conditions of her contract of insurance does not prevent her showing that defendant waived the condition against incumbrances.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Frank J. Murasky, Judge.

Action by Rosalie Raulet against the Northwestern National Insurance Company of Milwaukee. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Aitken & Aitken, for appellant. J. C. McKinstry (Orville C. Pratt, of counsel), for respondent.

MELVIN, J. After this cause was decided by the District Court of Appeal a rehearing was granted in order that this court might further examine the authorities and consider the arguments with reference particularly to two questions: (1) Was the chattel mortgage which was given to secure the payment of rent, the sort of incumbrance contemplated by the terms of the policy? (2) Assuming that it was, did the conduct of the defendant corporation at the time of the making of the contract of insurance amount to a waiver of the clause in the policy with reference to chattel mortgages?

To the first question the learned District Court of Appeal returned an affirmative answer, basing its conclusion in part upon sections 2920, 2958, and 2884 of the Civil Code, which prescribe the form of a chattel mortgage, and provide that a lien may be created to take immediate effect as security for the performance of obligations not then in existence. In the opinion of the District Court of Appeal cases are also cited with approval in support of the view of that court. Among these are Continental Insurance Co. v. Vanlue, 126 Ind. 140, 26 N. E. 120, 10 L. R. A. 843; Lee v. Agricultural Ins. Co., 79 Iowa, 379, 44 N. W. 683; Peet v. Dakota, etc., Ins. Co., 7 S. D. 410, 64 N. W. 206. The question is one of some difficulty, and, in view of the authorities cited, we would be loath to disagree with the learned District Court of Appeal if we were not convinced that the practice of this court has been to consider contracts of insurance in view of their general objects and the legitimate conditions prescribed by the insurers, rather than upon a basis of strict technical interpretation. The true rule has been recently expressed by this court as follows in Clayburgh v. Agricultural Ins. Co., 102 Pac. 813: "The language employed in the policy is to be given a reasonable construction, in view of the purposes, as well of the entire contract, as of the particular condition under discussion. The general object of the policy is to indemnify the insured against loss or damage by fire. The company, agreeing to furnish this indemnity in return for a certain premium, seeks to limit its risk by various provisions. Generally speaking, their purpose is to avoid liability in the event of the occurrence of circumstances which would naturally tend to increase the hazard beyond that which was in the contemplation of the parties when the insurance was effected. The insurer seeks to guard itself against libility in the event that the condition of the insured property should so change that the risk upon such property in its altered condition, would presumably not have been assumed for the premium paid." Keeping in mind the foregoing canon of interpretation and examining the phraseology of the policy, we find no difficulty in agreeing with the contention of respondent's counsel that: "The court was entitled to look at the circumstances surrounding the execution of the instrument, at the situation of the parties to it, and at what was done under it, to determine its true character; and was not concluded by the bald fact that it was labeled 'Chattel Mortgage' or was in the form usual to chattel mortgages, and also to examine into the theory of the provision against chattel mortgages, the reason for its insertion, the evils or added risks to the insurer that it was designed to guard against, and, after having made this examination, to determine whether the instrument before it was of such nature as to violate the true intent of that provision." The chattel mortgage here considered was in substance a bond, to become effective in the event of the nonpayment of the rent. We are just as much entitled to consider its true essence as we would be to determine in a controversy relating to real property that a deed absolute in form was in realty a mortgage. The clause in question provided that the entire policy should be void "if the subject of insurance be personal property and be or become incumbered with a chattel mortgage." It will be seen that the policy prohibits not the mere existence of a chattel mortgage, but that condition in which the property should be "incumbered" with such a mortgage. Whatever may be the definition of the word "incumbered" when matters of title are considered in connection with contracts of sale viewed as an insurable risk, Mrs. Raulet's personal property never was "incumbered." Its value was many times the amount of the insurance. The value of the furniture purchased after the date of the chattel mortgage and before the issuance of the policy of insurance was found by the court to be equal to twice the sum demanded in the suit. The appellant's risk was never increased one iota by the so-called chattel mortgage. In Caplis v. American Fire Ins. Co., 60 Minn. 376, 62 N. W. 440, 51 Am. St. Rep. 535, while the alleged lien considered was not in terms a chattel mortgage, but was a stipulation in the lease that the lessor should have a first lien on all buildings for unpaid rent and taxes, the court did interpret this provision in the standard form of policy, saying: "The clause must be construed as simply guarding against the common, ordinary chattel mortgage and instruments of the same general nature, use, and purposes." The instrument here considered is of no greater dignity than the lease which was the subject of discussion in the Minnesota case, and the language is used for no different purpose. We think, therefore, that case is authority for the conclusion which we have reached. See, also, Place v. St. Paul Title Ins. & Trust Co., 67 Minn. 126, 69 N. W. 707, 64 Am. St. Rep. 404; Allen v. Hudson River Mut. Ins. Co., 19 Barb. (N. Y.) 446. The case of Continental Ins. Co. v. Vanlue, supra, is not strictly in point here, because in that case the mortgage was given to secure the payment of an annuity by Vanlue to his grantor of one-half the net income of the farm; such promised division of profits being the consideration of the conveyance to him. The court properly held that, although the payments were to be made at stated intervals and no default had ever occurred, the lien was continuing, and was strictly within the terms of the policy. The wisdom of such conclusion will more fully appear when we reflect that the mortgage provided for a foreclosure upon any default in the stipulated payments. Naturally any arrearage would put the mortgagor in danger of losing his whole property, and would greatly increase the "moral hazard." In that very case, although the policy was sufficiently comprehensive to include all liens, it was held not to be violated by the existence on the record of a lien of replevin bail which had been discharged but not satisfied of record at the date of the issuance of the contract of insurance. The case is really in line with our decision that we must regard an alleged lien with reference to its actual effect upon the risk assumed by an insurer. See, also, Smith v. Niagara Fire Ins. Co., 60 Vt. 682, 15 Atl. 355, 1 L. R. A. 216, 6 Am. St. Rep. 144. In Lee v. Agricultural Ins. Co., supra, the mortgage had been given to secure the plaintiff as surety for the assured for $125 borrowed money—quite different from the purely contingent obligation in the case at bar. Peet v. Dakota Fire & Marine Ins. Co., 7 S. D. 410, 64 N. W. 206, does in principle sustain appellant's position, but it differs from the case at bar in the circumstance that any violation of the lease would deprive the lessor of all interest in the property. The lease provides that "in case of violating these covenants, or any of them, said lessee and his assigns shall forfeit said lease and improvements, and lessors, without notice, may, either with or without any writ or legal process, at their option, re-enter and hold said premises and improvements, buildings, etc., from which time all claim by the lessee shall fully cease." In view of the foregoing discussion, we hold that the so-called mortgage did not render the policy void. After a careful consideration of the question of waiver, we are convinced that the conclusion of the learned District Court of Appeal upon this point is correct, and we hereby adopt the decision of said court upon that point, and, indeed, in all particulars, except the matter discussed in the foregoing paragraphs. Said decision, so far as applicable, is as follows: "The appellant contends that the judgment and the order denying its motion for a new trial should be reversed for the following reasons: '(1) There being no allegation as to the location and use of the property at the time of the fire, the complaint does not state a cause of action and the demurrer should have been sustained. (2) The policy never took effect, as the premium was never paid. (3) Plaintiff was not the sole and unconditional owner of the property. Her interest was concealed and misrepresented in respects made essential by the policy, and was not truly stated therein, although a true statement thereof was warranted. (4) The property was incumbered by a chattel mortgage in violation of a condition precedent. The invalidity was not waived by issuing the policy, in ignorance of the breach of the condition; the burden being on plaintiff to disclose the incumbrance. It could not have been waived except in writing. (5) The policy was avoided by false swearing by the insured.'"

As to the complaint, it is asserted that "there is no allegation that at the time of the fire the property was contained in the described building or that the building was at said time 'occupied only as stores and lodgings.'" To the effect that these allegations are material citation is made of Allen v. Home Ins. Co., 133 Cal. 29, 65 Pac. 138, and Arnold v. American Ins. Co., 148 Cal. 660, 84 Pac. 182. In the former it is said: "The principal contention under this head is that the complaint does not allege that the building at the time of the fire was occupied as a dwelling house. It was in the contract between the insurer and the insured that the premises were insured while occupied as a dwelling house. It was essential for plaintiff to prove that the fire occurred while the premises were occupied as such dwelling house. If it was essential to prove such fact, it was essential to allege it. * * * The allegation was not merely a condition precedent as referred to in section 457 of the Code of Civil Procedure. It went to the very essence of plaintiff's right to recover." In the Arnold Case, supra, it is declared: "That the houses were occupied as dwelling houses at the time of the fires, and that the furniture was at such time contained in the specified house were essential to any liability on the part of defendant, and therefore essential to the statement of a cause of action. Not being alleged, they must be taken as having no existence." It is also rightly held that the defect is not cured by verdict and judgment since there was "an entire absence of both direct and implied allegation of a material fact."

But in the case before us the location and use of the property are at least fairly implied, and the complaint in that respect meets the demand of the policy that the insurance shall extend "to the following described property while located and contained as described herein, and not elsewhere, to wit: * * * All while contained in the five-story brick building, occupied only as stores and lodgings and situate Nos. 566-74 north side of Geary street between Mason and Jones streets, San Francisco." Turning to the complaint, we find these allegations: "That on the 19th day of April, 1906, the said property was totally destroyed by fire, and plaintiff was thereby damaged in the sum of $15,000; that said property insured as aforesaid and described in said insurance policy consisted of household and kitchen furniture, etc., contained in the five-story brick building occupied only as stores and lodgings, and situate Nos. 566-74 north side of Geary street," etc. The location and use, it is manifest, appear as in the policy, but appellant refers the allegation to the time when the policy was issued, and not when the property was destroyed. This is, however, an unwarranted construction of the language used. At most it could only be said that the complaint is uncertain in this respect. But it is not even uncertain. The foregoing allegations mean simply this: "The property insured and described in the policy was destroyed by fire on the 19th day of April, 1906. It consisted of household and kitchen furniture, etc. It was contained in the five-story brick building which was occupied only as stores and lodgings and was situated Nos. 566-74 north side of Geary street," etc. No one would have much difficulty in determining from the foregoing where the property was located at the time of the fire, or that it was used in connection with the said stores and lodgings.

Appellant assails the finding of the court that "the payment of the premium was not made a condition precedent to defendant's liability thereunder, and that the true consideration upon which the defendant executed and delivered the said policy to the said plaintiff was not the payment of the said $24 premium, but was plaintiff's promise to pay the said $24 to defendant on demand." It is asserted that actual payment of the premium was made by the terms of the policy a condition precedent to its operation, and therefore to any recovery under it. In support of this position the following is quoted from Bergson v. Builders' Ins. Co., 38 Cal. 541: "The principal, and perhaps the only, consideration moving from the insured, is the payment of the premium, and upon that the promise of indemnity rests. The policy in this case, which is in the usual form in that respect, states that the company in consideration of the premium therein mentioned insures the persons named against loss or damage by fire, etc. It is no answer to say that a credit was given to the assured for the premium, at the time the policy was issued, for the payment of the premium is a condition precedent to the right to recover for a loss." The provision in the policy before us is:

"In consideration of the stipulations herein contained, and of twenty-four dollars premium," the defendant company insures, etc. There is no recital that the premium was paid, and it is admitted and found that it was not. The plaintiff testified that Mr. Quarre, her insurance broker, "sent me a letter from the insurance company after the fire, asking the payment of $24 premium on account of the insurance company. I went to the office of the Northwestern National Insurance Company in Oakland, Mr. Pon and I, and they told me 'Never mind'; they didn't pay the premium. They will keep that on the $2,000. I was in Oakland with my broker and I asked one gentleman to pay the premium because Mr. Quarre never asked me to pay the premium before, never sent me any bill. I was ready to pay, but no one sent me the bill before." It further appears that on June 1, 1906, a bill for the premium was sent to the plaintiff by the defendant. The foregoing, although somewhat incomplete, is sufficient to support the conclusion that credit was given for the premium, and that after the loss the payment of said premium was waived, and it was agreed that it should be deducted from plaintiff's claim to the face value of the policy. There was no objection to the evidence tending to show the credit given or the waiver, but it is insisted that plaintiff must stand or fall upon the allegations of the complaint, that these show performance of the conditions of the policy which include payment, and it is argued that proof of waiver or nonpayment presents a fatal variance in the light of the Bergson Case, supra, and other authorities upholding the rule, as stated in 19 Cyc. 923, that "plaintiff cannot, either generally or specifically, allege performance of the conditions of the contract and support such allegations by proof of waiver." But, as pointed out by respondent, the phrase "in consideration of twenty-four dollars premium" involves a latent ambiguity. It is manifest that it may be construed as indicating payment or the promise of payment of the premium as the consideration. Hence it was proper for the court to consider the conduct of the parties as indicative of their understanding of this provision. "The contemporaneous and practical construction of a contract by the parties is strong evidence as to its meaning if its terms are equivocal." Keith v. Electrical Engineering Co., 136 Cal. 181, 68 Pac. 599. If plaintiff had understood payment to be the consideration and had intended to rely upon it, there would have been no such unconditional delivery of the policy without prepayment. From this latter circumstance the court was justified in concluding that the defendant extended credit, as within common knowledge is usually done in favor of responsible parties. To the aid of the court's finding may be summoned, also, the rule of construction generally recognized and well established that "every indulgence not inconsistent with the plain meaning of the contract must be shown the assured." It is the law, also, that, even though payment of the premium is expressly provided as the consideration, it is not a "condition precedent to the operation of the policy and to any recovery on it." It is held in Farnum v. Phœnix Insurance Co., 83 Cal. 246, 23 Pac. 869, 17 Am. St. Rep. 233, virtually overruling the Bergson Case, supra, as stated in the syllabus, that "An express provision in a policy of insurance that the company shall not be liable on the policy until the premium is actually paid is waived by the unconditional delivery of the policy to the assured as a completed and executed contract under an express or implied agreement that a credit shall be given for the premium, and the company is liable for a loss which may occur during the period of credit." To the same effect are Griffith v. Life Insurance Co., 101 Cal. 627, 36 Pac. 113, 40 Am. St. Rep. 96, and Berliner v. Travelers' Ins. Co., 121 Cal. 451, 53 Pac. 922. In the latter it is said: "It is also contended that evidence of a waiver of payment was not admissible under the complaint; that payment of the premium is alleged, and that, if the policy was delivered without payment, the facts showing that defendant was estopped from relying upon the failure to pay should have been alleged. It is true that payment is alleged, but it is also alleged that the insured performed all the conditions on his part, and defendant accepted performance thereof and delivered the policy. This was certainly sufficient as a pleading, and, the policy having been delivered, it is immaterial, so far as plaintiff's right to recover is concerned, whether the premium was paid or a credit given; the delivery of the policy as an executed contract being all that it was essential to allege or prove." Thus is completely answered appellant's contention as to the variance between the complaint and the findings and the authorities apparently to the contrary, cited from other states, do not declare the law as applicable here.

Again, the issue as to payment was directly presented by the allegation of the answer "that said plaintiff did not at any time, or at all, before the destruction of the property, pay or offer to pay to the defendant the said premium of $24 or any part or portion thereof, and said premium was wholly unpaid at the time when said property was destroyed by fire." This is clearly a matter of defense. It is deemed denied and it could be met by proof of payment or of any circumstance, such as waiver, excusing payment.

The next point made by appellant—somewhat more serious—is based upon the fact that the subject of the insurance was community property and was in possession of plaintiff as executrix of the estate of her deceased husband, Charles M. Raulet, who died September 25, 1904. His will was admitted to probate on November 14, 1904. The plaintiff was the sole devisee and legatee under said will. At the time of the destruction of the property by fire there had been no distribution of any part of the estate. The time for creditors to present claims had expired. Thereafter, on the 8th day of January, 1907, all the property of the estate was duly distributed to plaintiff. It is claimed that the property at the time of the insurance and until distribution after the fire belonged to the estate of Charles M. Raulet, deceased, and therefore the case is brought within the provision of the policy that "this entire policy shall be void if the interest of the insured be other than unconditional and sole ownership." Two cases are cited in support of the proposition that the estate has an insurable interest that is distinct from that of the heirs or devisees and that the latter cannot be said to be the sole and unconditional owners of the property before distribution. In Horton v. Jack, 37 Pac. 652, it appears that the property was community property, and the executrix was the widow of the deceased and his sole legatee. It was held that her taking of the estate property to pay a personal debt was a conversion—"a wasting of the estate which would constitute a devastavit." It did not appear whether or not there were outstanding debts of the estate. In Overton v. Insurance Co., 79 Mo. App. 1, as quoted by appellant: "It was stipulated in the policy that plaintiff was the sole and unconditional owner in fee simple of the property. It was further stipulated that, if the interest of the assured in the property be not truly stated, the policy should be void, and that the policy was made and accepted subject to such stipulation. There was no written application for insurance, and nothing was said at the time of the verbal application by either party as to the title. The case shows and in fact concedes that plaintiff was not the sole and unconditional owner. The property was owned by her husband prior to his death, and upon his death descended to his heirs and it had never been partitioned. In such state of facts there was clearly no right of recovery. To sustain the action would be, in the face of the provisions of the contract, without a semblance of excuse or reason in avoidance."

But those cases are not controlling here. There is a vast difference between the case where an executor as the sole heir or devisee converts the property during administration, and where he insures it as the sole and unconditional owner. It is the duty of the executor to hold the property to satisfy the claims of the creditors, and where he converts it the rights of the creditors are obviously prejudiced. But here the plaintiff was individually the owner of the property subject simply to her right and duty as executrix to hold temporary possession for the purposes of administration. As a matter of fact she had the only insurable interest and her title was never disturbed, as is conclusively shown by the decree of distribution afterwards made. In the light of subsequent events, it is clear that, if it could be said that technically she was not the sole and unconditional owner of the property because of her right to its temporary possession as executrix, she had the insurable interest in it, and no one else had any title to it and defendant suffered no prejudice by her representation as to ownership. It is well established in this state that title to property vests in the heir or devisee from the moment of the death of the ancestor or testator. Brenham v. Story, 39 Cal. 179; Bates v. Howard, 105 Cal. 173, 38 Pac. 715; Estate of Packer, 125 Cal. 396, 58 Pac. 59, 73 Am. St. Rep. 58; Martinovich v. Marsicano, 137 Cal. 354, 70 Pac. 459; Civ. Code, §§ 1341, 1363, 1384. In that respect there is no difference under our law between personal and real property.

In Cooley's Briefs on the Law of Insurance, p. 1369, it is stated that: "Insurance policies generally contain a clause reciting that the policy shall be void if the insured's interest is other than sole and unconditional, or entire, sole, and unconditional ownership, and this is not expressed in the policy. * * * Its purpose is to prevent a party who has an undivided or contingent but insurable interest in property from appropriating to his own use the proceeds of the policy taken on the valuation of the entire and unconditional title, as if he were the sole owner, and to remove from him the temptation to perpetrate fraud and crime. It therefore follows that the clause is in most cases held to refer to the character and quality of the title—to the actual and substantial ownership, rather than to the strictly legal title. In other words, the insured's interest must be of such nature that he will sustain the whole loss if the property is destroyed." In Miller v. Alliance Ins. Co. of Boston (C. C.) 7 Fed. 649, it is held that so long as the assured under claim of right had the exclusive use and enjoyment of the insured property without any assertion of an adverse right or interest in it by any other person he had the insurable interest under the sole and unconditional ownership clause. So here, the entire loss was sustained by plaintiff, and it seems to be a narrow view that would defeat the claim on the ground that within the contemplation of the policy she was not "the sole and unconditional owner." In Breedlove v. Norwich, etc., Insurance Society, 124 Cal. 169, 56 Pac. 772, it is said: "Notwithstanding the fact, then, that plaintiff's interest in the property was not that of a sole and unconditional owner, nevertheless she did have an insurable interest which will support her action." However, the judgment in the Breedlove Case was upheld upon the ground of waiver by the insurance company. In Sharp v. Scottish Union, etc., Co., 136 Cal. 542, 69 Pac. 253, it is held, as stated in the syllabus, that: "Where there was no fraud, false swearing, concealment, or misrepresentation by the applicant for a policy of fire insurance which made the loss payable to a mortgagee, and the policy was written by an agent of the company, who delivered it to a representative of the mortgagee, and a full premium was paid and retained by the insurance company without offer of rescission after knowledge of the facts, and the assured person had an insurable interest in the property, though his wife was the owner of an undivided half interest therein, the policy may be enforced by the mortgagee, notwithstanding a clause that, if the interest of the insured be other than unconditional and sole ownership, the policy should be void." While, of course, the case can be differentiated from this, as the facts are somewhat dissimilar, yet it involves a stricter construction of the policy against the insurance company than what is insisted upon here by the respondent. In the Sharp Case is cited with approval the following quotation from Manchester Assurance Co. v. Abrams, 89 Fed. 932, 32 C. C. A. 426: "Sound reason, as well as the weight of authority, inclines us to the view that when the assured has an insurable interest in the property, and in good faith applies for insurance upon the same, and makes no actual misrepresentation or concealment of his interest therein, and the insurance company refrains from making inquiry concerning his interest, and issues a policy to him, and accepts and retains his premium, the company must be presumed to have knowledge of the condition of his title and to assure the property with such knowledge."

In the case at bar there was no actual nor constructive fraud, no intentional misrepresentation nor concealment, no inquiry on the part of the insurance company. The plaintiff was really vested with the title, the entire loss was sustained by her, and it cannot be held that the policy was void by virtue of the sole and unconditional ownership clause. The declaration of the court in the Missouri case cited by appellant must be read in the light of the facts. It seems that the plaintiff there "had at most a life interest in the property, as there were other heirs and she had but a dower right." The case is therefore of little significance here, even granting that it was correctly decided.

The question arising from the chattel mortgage is less free from difficulty. The provision in the policy as to that is: "This entire policy, unless otherwise provided by agreement indorsed hereon or added hereto, shall be void * * * if the subject of insurance be personal property and be or become incumbered with a chattel mortgage." There is also the general provision that "this policy is made and accepted subject to the foregoing stipulations and conditions," etc. There was in fact a chattel mortgage upon the property to secure the payment of the rent for the building, but the court found in relation thereto "that the said instrument executed by plaintiff and her husband to the said Aronson was not a chattel mortgage within the meaning of defendant's policy; that at no time from the date said instrument was executed was there any rent overdue from the lessees above named; that at no time was said instrument considered by said plaintiff as a chattel mortgage; that when the plaintiff applied, through the said George Quarre, to defendant for insurance on the said property, no inquiries were made by the said defendant as to whether or not the said property was encumbered by a chattel mortgage, nor were any representations made by the said Quarre as plaintiff's agent, to the effect that the property was not so incumbered; that the provision in defendant's policy relating to chattel mortgages was not a material part of said policy." The conclusion is therefrom drawn that there was no violation of this provision of the policy, and "that said defendant waived the last mentioned clause by its conduct when application was made therefor; and that defendant is estopped by its own acts from now setting up the said clause as a defense to plaintiff's claim in this action. * * *" We think, however, that under the circumstances it should be held that this provision in the policy was waived by the conduct of defendant. There was no written application for the insurance, and, as we have seen, no actual fraud and no intentional misrepresentation by plaintiff. She was ignorant of this provision in the policy, which was secured by her agent, and no inquiry was made by the company as to the existence of any chattel mortgage.

It must be presumed, ordinarily, that persons are familiar with the terms of written contracts to which they are parties, and in the absence of fraud they are justly bound by the provisions therein, but the rule should not be strictly applied to insurance policies. It is a matter almost of common knowledge that a very small percentage of policy holders are actually cognizant of the provisions of their policies and many of them are ignorant of the names of the companies issuing the said policies. The policies are prepared by the experts of the companies, they are highly technical in their phraseology, they are complicated and voluminous—the one before us covering thirteen pages of the transcript—and in their numerous conditions and stipulations furnishing what sometimes may be veritable traps for the unwary. The insured usually confides implicitly in the agent securing the insurance, and it is only just and equitable that the company should be required to call specifically to the attention of the policy holder such provisions as the one before us. The courts, while zealous to uphold legal contracts, should not sacrifice the spirit to the letter nor should they be slow to aid the confiding and innocent. The defendant should either have made inquiries in reference to the chattel mortgage, required a written application covering by question and answer all the material provisions of the policy, or have consulted the records in the recorder's office where it would have been apprised of the incumbrance. Considering the nature of the contract and the relation of the parties, there should be no difficulty in reaching the conclusion that this provision was waived, and it therefore constitutes no bar to recovery.

In Cooley's Briefs on Insurance, p. 1396, it is said: "The authorities are far from being agreed as to the necessity of disclosure, in the absence of inquiry, when the policy contains a stipulation declaring it void if the property is incumbered, and not so represented to the insurer. It has, however, been held in numerous well-considered cases that even if the policy contains a condition declaring it to be void if the interest of the insured be not fully stated, or if the property is incumbered and not so represented, or if the subject of insurance be personal property and be incumbered by a chattel mortgage, disclosure is not necessary, in the absence of inquiry." And further: "That a disclosure of incumbrances is not necessary under a condition calling for a representation as to title or interest, if not absolute in fee simple, or sole and unconditional, seems to be supported by the weight of authority." In Wright v. Fire Ins. Ass'n., 12 Mont. 485, 31 Pac. 91, 19 L. R. A. 211, the Supreme Court of Montana, discussing a similar provision, says: "According to defendant's position, only one condition of said contract of insurance was ever in force, and that was the clause providing that inasmuch as a portion of the property which defendant pretended to insure was mortgaged—a fact which existed and had not been made a condition of the agreement as negotiated—the policy was entirely void ab initio. If this interpretation is the proper one to be upheld by the court, its result is that plaintiff negotiated for insurance on her property, truly answering to all inquiries that were made concerning it. Defendant promised to place a risk upon it for a certain consideration, and received $105 from plaintiff for a paper which provided that she had no insurance, and this result was not according to the negotiations, because no inquiry was made as to a mortgage. No mention was made that the company would not take a risk on mortgaged property. * * * It seems to us that it would be unjust to the insurer, as well as the assured, to put such a construction on the transaction. It would be imputing turpitude to the conduct of defendant which the transaction hardly warrants, when we consider the conduct of the parties at the time the insurance contract was made as shown by the evidence. It would be assuming that the defendant was in such case obtaining, or attempting to obtain, money of plaintiff, under unscrupulous business methods, which fall but little short of false pretense; for it is proper in considering the effect of defendant's negotiating insurance on property, and receiving consideration therefor, to assume that defendant's managers and agents knew that mortgages, both of real and personal property, are lawful, and that not a few exist, as shown by the public records, and further, that they are fully acquainted with the conditions of the policy proposed to be issued. * * * The situation further involves the misleading of the one pretended to be insured into the belief that the property in question was insured, when in fact it was not, and thus not only so contriving as to get pay for the risk without assuming it, but doing the more grievous wrong of leading the party honestly seeking and paying for insurance into suffering the entire loss of the things proposed to be insured in the transaction. * * * We hold that under the state of facts shown defendant by writing the insurance on said merchandise without inquiry as to the mortgage thereon did consent to take the risk on the goods under mortgage as effectually as if consent had been indorsed on the policy."

In German Mut. Ins. Co. v. Niewedde, 11 Ind. App. 624, 39 N. E. 534, it is held by the Appellate Court of Indiana that "where application for insurance is orally made, and there are no questions asked concerning incumbrances and the insured is unaware that the existence of a mortgage was fatal to his insurance, the insurer will be deemed to have waived a provision for forfeiture by reason of existing incumbrances. Relying upon appellant's failure to make any inquiry, appellee depends upon the policy as an indemnity in case of loss, but when the loss comes discovers that he had no insurance. If the law requires such a holding, then our province is but to declare it. The law, however, does not demand so inexorable adherence to the letter of the contract under all circumstances and all conditions. In quite a number of cases it has been adjudged that the failure of the company to inquire about, or call any attention to, some particular fact, operates to relieve the insured from a forfeiture which would follow his omission to disclose it, under the strict wording of his policy, although the fact was one material to the risk, but not one unusual or extraordinary"; and it is furthermore declared that in determining whether such a harsh and inequitable forfeiture clause is to be deemed waived the courts have generally applied the same liberal rule in favor of the assured as governs in the construction of the contract itself. In Philadelphia Tool Co. v. British-American Assur. Co., 132 Pa. 236, 19 Atl. 77, 19 Am. St. Rep. 596, the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania treated the similar question of waiver of "the sole and unconditional ownership clause," and it said: "The defense now taken is that the policy is partly upon real estate and partly on personal property, for which an entire premium was paid, and that as the assured had no title to the land the policy is void as to it, and being void in part is void in whole, so that no money can now be had. This position rests on one of the almost innumerable conditions, stipulations, and provisos which appear on the policy and which asserts that 'if the assured is not the sole and unconditional owner of the property, or if the building stood on ground not owned in fee simple by the assured, or if the interest of the assured is not truly stated in the policy,' then the policy shall be void. Is this condition applicable to the case presented on this policy? A policy of insurance, like any other contract, is to be read in the light of the circumstances that surround it. This policy was issued without any application or written request describing the interest of the assured in the building. No actual representation of any sort upon the subject, oral or written, is alleged to have been made by or on behalf of the assured. We ought to assume that a policy written under such circumstances was written upon the knowledge of the representative of the insurer and intended to cover in good faith the interest which the insured had in the buildings. * * * We must also remember that this policy is to be interpreted most strongly against the company whose contract it is. Applying these principles to the question now raised, we conclude that the policy written on within the knowledge of the insurer was made in view of the facts of the case, and was intended to cover such interest in the buildings as the insured had." It is clear that the waiver of "the sole and unconditional ownership clause" there involved a wider departure from the letter of the policy than that of the chattel mortgage clause involves under the circumstances disclosed here in view of the fact that nothing was overdue and the property insured was of greater value than the aggregate of the face of the policy and the sum secured by the mortgage. In line with the foregoing are decisions of the courts of Indiana, Kentucky, Montana, Nebraska, Oregon, Vermont, Virginia, and Washington. It is conceded by respondent that holdings to the contrary are to be found in the courts of District of Columbia, South Dakota, and Illinois. These latter may be "well considered cases," as contended by appellant, but they are opposed to what we conceive to be the just and equitable doctrine and we think they should not be followed.

As to the point made by appellant that the waiver could only be in writing as provided by the terms of the policy, the case of Farnum v. Phœnix Insurance Company, supra, seems decisive. A large number of cases are therein cited, and the conclusion is reached that: "An insurance company cannot so limit its capacity to contract by general stipulations against waiver of conditions or that its contracts or waivers must be in writing that it cannot by its agents make an oral contract or oral waiver not forbidden by the statute of frauds. Whether or not any particular agent has the general power of the company to make an oral contract or oral waiver of a condition notwithstanding the provision in the policy requiring a writing is a question of fact." And in Mackintosh v. Agricultural Fire Ins. Co., 150 Cal. 440, 89 Pac. 102, 119 Am. St. Rep. 234, it is held that "general agents authorized to issue and deliver new policies are regarded as having the same power to waive conditions and forfeitures as the companies themselves. The limitations embodied in the stipulation do not prevent them from making new contracts; and waivers constituting a new contract upon sufficient consideration need not be evidenced by writing nor endorsed upon the policy, if made by a general agent having power to make the contract, no matter what limitations or conditions may be expressed in the policy." There is no evidence that the agent here was not a general agent. Indeed, there seems to have been no controversy in the court below as to his authority to bind the company. Iverson v. Metropolitan Life Ins. Co., 151 Cal. 746, 91 Pac. 609, 13 L. R. A. (N. S.) 866, and Cayford v. Metropolitan Life Ins. Co., 5 Cal. App. 715, 91 Pac. 266, are not in conflict with the foregoing. In the former there was a written application made a part of the policy wherein the statements were warranted to be true. It was held that "the written answer of the insured as to whether he had ever had a specified disease is material to the risk assumed by the insurer and in the absence of any fraud on the part of the insurance company, when the application made and signed by the insured provided that only the officers of the home office had authority to determine whether a policy should issue on the application and that they acted on the written statements, answers, warranties, and agreements contained in it in determining that matter, the soliciting agent of the company cannot be deemed to have either actual or ostensible authority to waive such breach of warranty." In the Cayford Case the policy expressly provided that none of its terms could be modified nor any forfeiture waived or premiums in arrears received except by agreement in writing, signed by either the president, vice president, secretary, or actuary whose authority will not be delegated, and it was rightly held that a local collector had no such authority and could not waive any of the provisions of the policy.

The contention of appellant that since plaintiff pleaded performance of her contract she cannot prove waiver is not maintainable. The same principle is involved in reference to the chattel mortgage as to the payment of the premium. The declaration of the Supreme Court in Breedlove v. Norwich, etc., Ins. Co., 124 Cal. 168, 56 Pac. 772, is in point here: "It was incumbent upon the plaintiff to aver a performance of all conditions upon her part to be kept and performed. It was necessary for her then to plead performance of all promissory warranties, but it was not necessary for her to plead the truth of an affirmative warranty of title. Cowan v. Phœnix Ins. Co., 78 Cal. 181 [20 Pac. 408]. Still it was obligatory for plaintiff to show by her pleading that she had an insurable interest, and this she undertook to do by the averment touching her title. Defendant, however, by a separate defense, pleaded the warranty as to title and the falsity of it in avoidance of its liability. Since this new matter is taken as controverted under our laws of pleading, any defense to it by way of replication was open to plaintiff without pleading, and it was therefore permissible for her to show that there never had been such a warranty, and that it had been waived at the time of the delivery of the policy. That the warranty could be waived in the manner indicated is settled in this state." Indeed, as stated in the Cowan Case, supra: "There is no necessity of averring performance by the insured of anything warranted to be true when the policy is issued, for the reason that there is nothing to be performed. When the assured has warranted a thing to exist or a representation to be true at a time when a policy becomes consummated as a contract, he has done all that he can do. * * * Clearly when nothing is required to be performed by him, such an averment by him would be useless and without meaning; whereas, in the case of a promissory warranty, the assured has warranted that he will do something during the existence of the risk, the requisition of averment of such stipulation and of its performance is required. As is said in 2 Wood on Insurance, p. 1136: 'It can readily be determined of what matters performance should be averred by ascertaining what under the policy the assured has stipulated to do, and what he must do in order to recover, and he must aver performance of all such conditions, as when he stipulates to erect a chimney, to keep a watchman, to put in a force pump, to keep water in certain quantities and in certain places or any other matter or thing which the insured has contracted to do.'" The allegation, therefore, that "said plaintiff has performed all of the conditions on her part to be performed as set forth or contained in the said contract or required to entitle her to recover thereon," has reference to the promissory warranties, and does not present an issue as to the chattel mortgage. This issue is presented, however, by the answer, and, as we have seen, being deemed denied, to meet it it was proper for plaintiff to prove the equitable estoppel. In the case of Aronson v. Frankfort Accident & Plate Glass Insurance Company, 9 Cal. App. 473, 99 Pac. 537, it is clear that a promissory warranty is involved as the alleged waiver referred to something to be done by the insured after the accident. It states the law correctly and is in harmony with what we have stated. The court was justified in finding that there was no false swearing in the proof of loss on the part of plaintiff. It is well settled that only willful misstatements in that regard will avoid the policy. West Coast L. Co. v. State, etc., Co., 98 Cal. 502, 33 Pac. 258.

We see no reason to hold that plaintiff did not act in perfect good faith or that she desired to take any advantage of defendant.

The foregoing views are deemed decisive of the case, and render it unnecessary to consider any other alleged error.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

BIG THREE MIN. & MILL. CO. v. HAMILTON et al. (L. A. 2,265.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 27, 1909. On Modification of Judgment, Jan. 26, 1910.)

1. Mines and Minerals (§ 38*) — Public Mineral Lands — Actions to Determine Rights—Sufficiency of Evidence.

In an action to quiet title to mining claims, in which it was in issue whether locations by plaintiff had been forfeited for failure to do the necessary work during the year previous to their location by defendants, testimony by a number of witnesses, who were familiar with the work done and able to estimate its value, held to sustain findings by the jury that the value of the work and improvements done on each of the claims during such year was $35.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mines and Minerals, Cent. Dig. § 106; Dec. Dig. § 38.*]

2. Mines and Minerals (§ 23*)—Public Mineral Lands — Development and Improvement.

Under Rev. St. U. S. § 2324 (U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 1426), providing that, where mining claims are held in common, the necessary expenditure may be made upon any one of the claims, the work must have been done in good faith for the benefit of all claims, and have been such as to have a tendency to develop or benefit the claims other than the one on which the work is done, and the assessment work may be done upon one of a group of claims owned in common, even though the claims are not all adjoining.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mines and Minerals, Cent. Dig. § 54; Dec. Dig. § 23.*]

3. Mines and Minerals (§ 38*)—Public Mineral Lands—Development and Improvement—Question for Jury.

Whether work done on a mining claim is such as to benefit or develop other claims and so satisfy the requirement as to development of such claims is a question of fact.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mines and Minerals, Cent. Dig. § 108; Dec. Dig. § 38.*]

4. Mines and Minerals (§ 38*)—Public Mineral Lands—Actions to Determine Rights —Sufficiency of Evidence.

In an action to quiet title to mining claims, evidence held sufficient to warrant the jury in finding that the work done on one claim was not for the purpose of developing two other claims located by the same persons and had no tendency to develop either of them.

5. Trial (§ 296*)—Actions—Harmless Error—Instructions.

In an action to quiet title to mining claims, any error in an instruction that the necessary work for improvements required to be done annually on a mining claim might be done outside the boundaries of such claim "on one of a group of claims adjoining each other and owned by the same party," as limiting the effect of the work to "adjoining claims," was cured by a later portion of the same instruction that, if the requisite work was done upon the H. claim, the title to which was not in issue, and such work was done "in pursuance of a system that tended to a development of the claims claimed by the plaintiff herein in its complaint," such work was sufficient to prevent a forfeiture of any such claims, as by including the H. claim the claims of plaintiff were adjoining claims, and the effect of the instruction was that work done upon any one of such claims could be applied to any of the others.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 705–713, 715, 716, 718; Dec. Dig. § 296.*]

6. Mines and Minerals (§ 38*)—Public Mineral Lands—Actions to Determine Rights—Instructions.

In an action to quiet title to mining claims, a court in one instruction stated that work outside the limits of a claim must be such as has a tendency to benefit or develop the claim, and, in a subsequent instruction, that, in accordance with instructions theretofore given, the burden of proof was on defendants to show that the necessary work was not done as required by law, and that, in so far as plaintiff's case is made to depend upon work done outside of two claims named, the burden is on plaintiff to show that such work done outside of such claims did actually benefit such claims. Held, that as the first instruction was intended to specifically define the test whether work outside the claim could be counted as sufficient to hold the claim, and the declaration that the work must have a tendency to benefit or develop the claim was found at least six times in such instruction, the latter instruction, which dealt solely with the burden of proof, could not have misled the jury by substituting the expression "actually benefited" for the expression used in the first instruction, "tend to benefit."

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mines and Minerals, Dec. Dig. § 38.*]

7. Mines and Minerals (§ 38*)—Public Mineral Lands—Actions to Determine Rights—Instructions.

In an action to quiet title to mining claims, an instruction that the law requires clear and convincing evidence to effect the forfeiture of a claim duly located and worked in good faith, and that, if the evidence does not satisfy the jury by a clear preponderance thereof that plaintiff failed to perform the necessary work, then it follows that plaintiff did not forfeit its claim, is a correct statement of the law under Code Civ. Proc. § 2061, providing that a preponderance of the evidence is all that is required to establish a fact necessary to be shown in a civil action.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mines and Minerals, Dec. Dig. § 38.*]

8. Mines and Minerals (§ 29*)—Title by Adverse Possession.

To acquire title to a mining claim by prescription, possession of the property must not only be hostile, but must be exclusive, continuous, and uninterrupted for a period of five years prior to the commencement of the action, and any interruption of the adverse possession within the five years prevents the acquisition of title by prescription.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mines and Minerals, Cent. Dig. § 67; Dec. Dig. § 29.*]

9. Mines and Minerals (§ 38*)—Actions to Quiet Title—Evidence of Adverse Possession.

In an action to quiet title to mining claims, evidence held insufficient to show title in defendant by adverse possession.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mines and Minerals, Dec. Dig. § 38.*]

10. Appeal and Error (§ 930*)—Review—Presumptions as to Findings.

Since a general verdict imports findings for the prevailing party upon all material issues, it will be assumed on appeal, in an action to quiet title to mining claims, in which defendant claimed title under prior location and also by adverse possession, and a general verdict was rendered for defendant, that the jury found in favor of defendant as to both defenses.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 3760; Dec. Dig. § 930.*]

11. Appeal and Error (§ 1028*)—Harmless Error—Defenses.

In an action to quiet title to mining claims, defendant claimed title under adverse possession and under prior location. Held that, either defense being sufficient, if either was sustained by the evidence and not affected by any error, the want of evidence to sustain the finding on the other defense or any error committed in regard to it could not have been prejudicial.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 4034; Dec. Dig. § 1028.*]

12. Mines and Minerals (§ 29*)—Public Mineral Lands—Location—Repeal of State Law.

A mining location made while the law of 1897 (St. 1897, p. 214, c. 159) was in force, but invalid for noncompliance with the provisions of that law, is still a valid location, providing the provisions of the mining laws of the United States have been complied with, and there are no intervening rights before the repeal of the state law, and the claim has been occupied, held, and worked up to the time of and after such repeal.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mines and Minerals, Dec. Dig. § 29.*]

13. Mines and Minerals (§ 23*)—Public Mineral Lands—Possession of Claim.

In an action to quiet title to a mining claim, evidence that defendant had continuously, up to and after the repeal of the law of 1897 (St. 1897, p. 214, c. 159), which prescribes the manner of locating mining claims, prosecuted work under a system tending to the development of this claim and other claims which he had located, and that a part of the work had been done within the boundaries of the claim in suit, was sufficient to establish possession of the entire claim to the extent of the visible boundaries.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mines and Minerals, Cent. Dig. §§ 51–59; Dec. Dig. § 23.*]

14. Mines and Minerals (§ 26*)—Public Mineral Lands—Validity of Location.

If a person locates on a mining claim under the law of 1897 (St. 1897, p. 214, c. 159), and erects an initial monument at the place required by such law and posts the required notices thereon and remains in possession, no other person can make a valid entry thereon for the purpose of making another location until the person first locating the claim is in default, and within the 20 days allowed by the law of 1897 for recordation the claim of the locator is valid, and no other entry can be made as the basis for claim of title.

15. MINES AND MINERALS (§ 38*) — PUBLIC MINERAL LANDS—FAILURE TO PAY FOR IMPROVEMENT.

Where necessary improvement work is done on a mining claim, failure to pay for such work will not be considered in an action to quiet title to the claim.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mines and Minerals, Dec. Dig. § 38.*]

16. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1053*)—QUIETING TITLE — HARMLESS ERROR — ADMISSION OF EVIDENCE.

In an action to quiet title to mining claims, the admission, on cross-examination of plaintiff's witness, of evidence that assessment work done on the claims in a certain year was not paid for, is harmless, where the court instructed that whatever work was done during that year in connection with any of the mining claims claimed by plaintiff inured to the benefit of plaintiff.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 4178-4184; Dec. Dig. § 1053.*]

17. MINES AND MINERALS (§ 38*) — PUBLIC MINERAL LANDS—ACTIONS TO DETERMINE RIGHTS—ADMISSIBILITY OF EVIDENCE.

In an action to quiet title to mining claims, in which it was in issue whether the assessment work for a certain year had been performed, evidence that a mill put up on one of the claims was of no value for the purpose of reducing the ore there found is admissible as bearing on the good faith of the parties in erecting the mill, and affidavits of proofs of labor made by two witnesses and duly recorded were also admissible under St. 1891, p. 219, c. 155, making such proofs prima facie evidence of the fact therein stated.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mines and Minerals, Dec. Dig. § 38.*]

18. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1058*)—HARMLESS ERROR—REJECTION OF TESTIMONY.

In an action to quiet title to mining claims, in which the question of the performance of assessment work was in issue, the rejection of affidavits as to labor performed by two witnesses was harmless, where both the witnesses testified fully as to all the material facts stated in their affidavits.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 4195, 4200-4206; Dec. Dig. § 1058.*]

19. WITNESSES (§ 388*)—IMPEACHMENT—PREDICATE.

In an action to quiet title to mining claims, a witness for plaintiff testified that none of the locations claimed by defendant had actually been made as locations of quartz claims prior to a date specified, but that all claims located by defendant theretofore had been located as placer claims, that at that time defendant had not located the R. claim, and that the L. claim, when located by defendant as a quartz claim, was bounded on the south by plaintiff's claim, already located by plaintiff's predecessor in interest, G., which testimony established that G., and not defendant, was prior in time in the location of the R. claim, and that he and his successors, if remaining in possession and working the claim until the repeal of the state law under which it was located (St. 1897, p. 214, c. 159), were entitled to hold the same. To impeach the witness, defendant asked him on cross-examination, over objection, whether he had made certain statement to M.; but the questions did not specify, as required by Code Civ. Proc. § 2052, the time or place of the alleged conversations or the persons present thereat, and the witness denied the statements. M. was subsequently called, and, over the objection that no proper foundation had been laid, testified that the witness had told M. that G. had admitted to defendant that in locating the R. claim he had located upon a claim belonging to defendant, and that he would take his papers off the claim, which he did, and that the witness had also stated that defendant had arrived at the mines one day ahead of G. and placed his papers on the claim. Held, that the admission of his testimony was error, as the statement by the witness that G. had made such an admission tended to throw discredit on the testimony of the witness that defendant never made any location of the R. claim prior to G.'s location.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; N. P. Conrey, Judge.

Action by Big Three Mining & Milling Company against E. M. Hamilton and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed in part, and affirmed in part.

J. W. P. Laird and Wm. Chambers, for appellant. Sherman Page and Roger S. Page, for respondents.

SLOSS, J. Appeal by plaintiff from an order denying its motion for a new trial. The action was brought to quiet plaintiff's title to four quartz mining claims, the "Occidental," the "Rosamond," the "Kid," and the "Home No. 1," together with the "Big Three Millsite." There is no dispute as to plaintiff's ownership of the Home No. 1, and all controversies relating to the ownership of the Millsite were settled by agreement of the parties before the trial. The questions presented upon this appeal relate entirely to the three claims first mentioned, the Occidental, the Rosamond, and the Kid. As claimed by plaintiff, these three, together with the Home No. 1, ran along an easterly and westerly line, end to end. The Occidental lay to the west; adjoining it on the east was the Rosamond; next came the Kid; and adjoining the Kid to the east lay the Home No. 1. Each of the claims, except the Kid, was of the full size permitted by the United States statutes, to wit, 1,500 feet in length by 600 feet in width, or thereabouts. The Kid was a smaller or fractional claim, occupying the space left between the Rosamond and the Home; its end lines constituting the easterly and westerly ends, respectively, of the claims last named. The north line of the Kid, according to plaintiff's testimony, is 64 feet in length, and the south line 87 feet 8 inches.

The allegations of plaintiff's complaint as to the ownership and possession of these claims were denied by the defendants. In addition, separate defenses were set up, whereby title to various portions of the property claimed by plaintiff was asserted by different defendants. The defendant E. M. Hamilton claimed ownership of substantially all of the Rosamond claim, in part by virtue of his prior location of a claim also designated the "Rosamond" (hereinafter referred to as the "Hamilton Rosamond"), and in part by reason of his location of two overlapping claims known as the "Fay No. 1" and the "Lida." The Rosamond, as claimed by this defendant, covered the greater part of plaintiff's Rosamond. The north lines of the two are very nearly identical. The east end line of Hamilton's Rosamond is 542 feet in length, while the west end line is 344.75 feet long. The Fay No. 1 is located to the south of Hamilton's Rosamond and overlaps plaintiff's Rosamond to the extent of 5¼ acres, being nearly all of that portion of plaintiff's Rosamond lying south of the Hamilton Rosamond. The Lida lies to the north and east of both Rosamond claims and overlaps them at their northeasterly corners to the extent of something over three acres. Said Lida claim overlaps the Kid, as claimed by plaintiff, to the extent of .64 of an acre. It should here be said that these statements regarding the location and extent of the Fay No. 1, the Lida, and the Hamilton Rosamond are disputed by appellant, which denies not only the fact of location of these claims, but contends that the Fay and the Lida, if located, did not cover any part of the Rosamond. Title to plaintiff's Rosamond is also claimed by Hamilton by virtue of adverse possession for the statutory period. Title to the Occidental and the Kid mining claims are asserted by various defendants by virtue of relocations made by them following an alleged forfeiture of said claims by plaintiff for failure to do the annual assessment work. The Occidental is claimed by E. M. Hamilton and J. Frank Walters; each asserting ownership to an undivided one-half interest. The Kid is claimed in like manner by D. M. Reck and Roger S. Page.

The case was tried before a jury, which, after hearing a considerable mass of testimony, much of it conflicting, returned a verdict as follows: "(1) With respect to plaintiff's claim of ownership of the Occidental mining claim, we find in favor of defendants. (2) With respect to plaintiff's claim of ownership of the Rosamond mining claim, we find in favor of defendants. (3) With respect to plaintiff's claim of ownership of the Kid mining claim, we find in favor of the defendants." In addition, the jury made answer to nine special issues. We shall have occasion to refer to some of these later.

Before taking up the issues arising with reference to the Rosamond, it will be convenient to consider separately the questions relating to the claims of title made to the Occidental and the Kid by virtue of relocations. The Occidental is claimed by Hamilton and Walters under a location made by them on the 1st day of January, 1905; the Kid by Page and Reck on a location made on the 5th day of March, 1904. The questions presented to the jury with reference to these claims were whether the Occidental had been forfeited by plaintiff by its failure to do the necessary work on said claim during the year 1904, and whether the Kid had been so forfeited by failure to do such work during 1903. On these points the jury found, in answer to the special issues submitted to them, as follows: "What was the value of the work and improvements done on the Occidental mining claim during the year 1904? Answer: $35. What was the value of the work and improvements done on the Kid mining claim during the year 1903? Answer: $35." There can be no question that the findings are fully sustained by the evidence in so far as such evidence related to the work done within the boundaries of the respective claims. A number of witnesses who had first shown their familiarity with the work done and their ability to estimate its value testified that the amount of work done on the claims in the years in question did not exceed the sums found by the jury.

It is claimed, however, by the appellants that, during the year 1904, plaintiff was the owner, not only of the Occidental and Kid claims, but also of the Home No. 1, and that it did work and placed improvements upon this claim to an amount in excess of that necessary to hold all three claims. Where claims are held in common, the expenditure required by the laws of the United States may be made upon any one of the claims. Rev. St. U. S. § 2324 (U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 1426). The work so done, however, must be done in good faith for the benefit of all the claims, and it must be such as to have a tendency to benefit or develop the claims other than the one upon which the work is done. Whether it is so done or has such tendency is a question of fact (Snyder on Mines, § 482; Chambers v. Harrington, 111 U. S. 350, 4 Sup. Ct. 428, 28 L. Ed. 452; Jackson v. Roby, 109 U. S. 440, 3 Sup. Ct. 301, 27 L. Ed. 990; De Noon v. Morrison, 83 Cal. 163, 23 Pac. 374; Mt. Diablo M. & M. Co. v. Callison, 5 Sawy. 439, Fed. Cas. No. 9,886; Book v. Justice Mining Co. (C. C.) 58 Fed. 106; Hall v. Kearny, 18 Colo. 505, 33 Pac. 373), and this question was submitted to the jury in the case at bar. The evidence was such as to fully warrant the jury in finding that the work done on the Home No. 1 was not done for the purpose of developing the Kid or the Occidental, and that such work had no tendency to develop either of them. The appellant offered some testimony in support of its theory that the four claims to which it asserted title were located upon the line of a vein running east and west, that this vein could be traced continuously through the four claims, and that a reasonable and proper mode of developing each of the claims was to enter the vein within the limits of the Home No. 1 and thence drift, along the vein, through the Kid, Rosamond, and the Occidental, with a view to taking all of the ore extracted back to the Home, upon which reduction works had been placed. But as against this there was an abundance of testimony on behalf of the respondents to the effect that there was no such continuous vein, but that, on the contrary, the country was much broken up; that all veins which were discoverable ran from the northeast to the southwest or from the northwest to the southeast; and that such of them as were to be found within the limits of the Home No. 1 passed out of the side lines of that claim without entering either the Kid, the Rosamond, or the Occidental.

But, apart from the question of sufficiency of evidence, it is contended that the court erred in its instructions to the jury regarding the matter of forfeiture by failure to do the annual work. One instruction (numbered 6) reads as follows: "You are instructed that the laws of the United States require $100 worth of work or of improvements annually to be performed or made on a mining claim. Such work or improvements so required by the laws of the United States may be done or made within the boundaries of such claim, or such work may be done outside the boundaries of such claim on one of a group of claims adjoining each other and owned by the same party, if done in pursuance of a system of development and if the same has a tendency to benefit or develop each claim in the group. Work done on one of a group of mining claims which has a tendency to develop or benefit all of the claims in the said group inures to the benefit of each and all of said claims, even though the system adopted may not be the best that could have been devised under the circumstances. Improvements made, such as the construction of roads, mills, or mining machinery for the working and operation of an entire group owned by one party, and which said improvements tend to the benefit of all of the claims in said group, will inure to the benefit of each and all of the claims in said group, even though such improvements be made outside the lines of any of said claims. If you believe that in the year 1904 there was more than $400 worth of work done within the boundaries of Home No. 1 mining claim by the plaintiff in this case, or any one acting under the plaintiff, and with the plaintiff's consent, and that such work was done in pursuance of a system that tended to the development of all of the claims claimed by the plaintiff herein in its complaint, and tended to the development and benefit of all such claims, then the work so performed was sufficient to prevent a forfeiture of any of said claims on account of the annual labor or improvement requirements of the year 1904. You are further instructed that even though the work done on said Home No. 1 claim in 1904 was not of the value of $400, still if you believe from the evidence that improvements were made consisting of a mill, cyanide tanks, and waterworks of as great a value as $400 which, taken in connection with such work as you find to have been done on the claim under such conditions as those above stated, would equal or exceed the sum of $400, and that such improvements were of such a character and so constructed as to benefit and tend to the development of all of said four claims, and each of them, then the court instructs you that upon those facts existing there was no forfeiture of such claims, or either of them, on account of the said annual labor or improvement requirements. It is not necessary that a party in doing work on a claim or on a system for the benefit of all claims held by such party and contiguous to each other shall do the same specifically as annual labor or assessment work; but if such work is done in good faith, and is equal in amount to the work required to be done by the act of Congress, then the same will be sufficient to prevent a forfeiture."

One criticism of this instruction is that the court speaks of work done outside the boundaries of a claim as required to be done on one of a group of claims "adjoining each other." Undoubtedly, the better authority supports the contention that assessment work may be done upon one of a group of claims owned in common, even though the claims are not all adjoining. 1 Snyder on Mines, p. 444; Altoona Q. M. Co. v. Integral Q. M. Co., 114 Cal. 100, 45 Pac. 1047. Accordingly, it is claimed that in this case, inasmuch as the jury found that the plaintiff was not the owner of the Rosamond, it must have concluded from the instruction of the court that it could not consider work done on the Home in connection with the Occidental, since the Occidental was, according to the verdict, not adjoining other claims owned by plaintiff. We think, however, that, in view of the language used by the court in a later part of the same instruction, the inaccurate expression first used could not have influenced the jury to plaintiff's detriment. The court specifically instructed the jury that if the requisite work was done upon the Home, and such work was done "in pursuance of a system that tended to a development of all the claims claimed by the plaintiff herein in its complaint," such work was sufficient to prevent a forfeiture of any of such claims. In view of this language, it is clear that the court had reference to plaintiff's assertion of title to the four claims, rather than to the validity of that title, and that it instructed the jury that work done upon any one of such four claims (which were in fact adjoining) could, under proper conditions, be applied to any one of the four. No prejudice could have resulted from the instruction, limited as it thus was.

It is not disputed that instruction 6 correctly defines the character of the work that may be done upon one claim for the development of another owned in common with it. It states that work done outside the limits of a claim must be such as has a tendency to develop or benefit the claim. It is argued, however, that a subsequent instruction is in conflict with it. Instruction No. 30 reads as follows: "In accordance with instructions heretofore given, the burden of proof is on the defendants to show that the necessary assessment work was not done as required by law on the Occidental claim for the year 1904, and on the Kid claim for the year 1903, but, in so far as the plaintiff's case is made to depend upon work done outside of the Occidental and Kid during said years 1903 and 1904, the burden of proof is on the plaintiff to show that such work done outside of said claims did actually benefit said claims." This instruction is assailed upon the ground that it requires the plaintiff to show that work done outside of the claim actually benefited the claim; whereas, the true rule is the one stated in the prior instruction that it need only tend to its benefit. We need not here enter into any extended discussion of the distinction, if there be any, between the words "actually benefit" the claim and "tend to benefit" the claim. It would seem that a greater burden is imposed upon a party if he be required to show that his work actually benefited the claim than if he be merely called upon to establish that it had a tendency in that direction. But under the familiar rule that the instructions of the court are to be read together and harmonized, if possible, we think there is no conflict between instruction 30 and the earlier one above quoted. The first instruction was intended to define to the jury in specific terms the tests by which they were to determine whether work done outside of the claim could be counted as annual work sufficient to hold it. The rule was set out at considerable length and with clearness. The declaration that the work must merely have a tendency to benefit or develop the claim is found at least six times in this instruction. Instruction 30, the one complained of, is one dealing, not with the question of the character of proof that must be made in such cases, but purely with the burden of proof. At its very beginning it is qualified with the words "in accordance with instructions heretofore given," and then goes on to define that in one state of circumstances the burden of proof is upon the plaintiff and in the other upon the defendants. But in either case such burden is sustained by making proof in accordance with instructions theretofore given. We do not think the jury could have been misled by the omission of the words "tend to."

One further point is made with regard to the instructions on the matter of forfeiture. In instruction 9 the court told the jury that "the law requires clear and convincing evidence to support the forfeiture" of a claim duly located and worked in good faith. It then stated that "if the evidence does not satisfy you by a clear preponderance thereof that the plaintiff failed to perform the necessary work, then it follows that the plaintiff did not forfeit the said claim." We are unable to see any error in this. While it is often said that a forfeiture can be shown only upon clear and convincing evidence, "the proof is made as required whenever it is shown by a preponderance of the evidence that the full amount of annual labor or improvements was not made or expended within a given year." Snyder on Mines, § 726. See further, to the effect that a preponderance of the evidence is all that is required to establish a fact necessary to be shown in a civil action, Code Civ. Proc. § 2061; Ford v. Chambers, 19 Cal. 143; Murphy v. Waterhouse, 113 Cal. 467, 45 Pac. 866, 54 Am. St. Rep. 365.

The foregoing discussion is directed to the contention that work done on the Home No. 1 in 1904 was applicable to the Occidental. It is not necessary to make any additional answer to the point that work done on the Occidental in 1903 was sufficient to prevent a forfeiture of the Kid.

As has been stated, the claim of Hamilton to the ownership of the Rosamond mine rests upon different grounds from those heretofore considered. He asserts title to this property by virtue: First, of adverse possession; second, of locations of three mining claims, the Fay No. 1, the Hamilton and Rosamond and the Lida, covering the territory of plaintiff's Rosamond. We are satisfied that the evidence is insufficient to support the finding that Hamilton had acquired title to this claim by adverse possession. To acquire title by prescription the possession of the property must not only be hostile to plaintiff's title, but must be exclusive, continuous, and uninterrupted for a period of five years prior to the commencement of the action. San Francisco v. Field, 37 Cal. 349, 99 Am. Dec. 278; Unger v. Mooney, 63 Cal. 586, 49 Am. Rep. 100. Any interruption of the adverse possession within the required five years prevents the acquisition of the title by prescription. Cave v. Crafts, 53 Cal. 136; Thomas v. England, 71 Cal. 456, 12 Pac. 491; Bree v. Wheeler, 129 Cal. 145, 61 Pac. 782; Hamilton v. Southern Nev. G. & M. Co. (C. C.) 33 Fed. 562.

It is shown by the testimony of the respondents themselves that the predecessors in interest of plaintiff went upon the Rosamond claim from time to time during the five years preceding the commencement of the action and conducted quite extensive mining operations there. While Hamilton protested against their presence upon the claim and asserted title in himself, his protests were not heeded, and the work continued. It is clear that Hamilton's possession was neither exclusive nor uninterrupted for the period required by statute to vest title in him.

Inasmuch as a general verdict imports findings in favor of the prevailing party upon all material issues, we must assume that the jury found in favor of Hamilton on his claim under prior locations, as well as his plea of title by prescription. In fact, in answer to a special issue, the jury found specifically that the first location on the Rosamond was made by Hamilton on October 26, 1897. Either defense was sufficient in law to entitle the defendant Hamilton to judgment. If, then, either was sustained by the evidence and was not affected by any error, the want of evidence to sustain the finding on the other defense or any errors committed in regard to it could not have been prejudicial. Crosett v. Whelan, 44 Cal. 200; Verdelli v. Gray's Harbor Commercial Co., 115 Cal. 517, 47 Pac. 364, 778.

The facts shown with reference to the locations of the various claims covering the ground included in plaintiff's Rosamond are as follows: Plaintiff offered evidence tending to show that on the 6th day of November 1897, Charles A. Graves and E. C. Johnson, plaintiff's predecessors in interest, located plaintiff's Rosamond by posting thereon a notice which was thereafter recorded and by distinctly marking the claim on the ground so that its boundaries could be readily traced. There was also evidence tending to show that the locators and their successors in interest had thereafter continuously done work upon the claim. On the other hand, the defendants offered evidence sufficient to justify the jury in finding that Hamilton had at a prior date, to wit, on the 26th day of October, 1897, taken steps to locate the claims hereinbefore described under the names of the Lida, the Fay No. 1, and the Hamilton Rosamond by posting notices of location upon said claims and distinctly marking the boundaries thereof after discovering upon each of said claims mineral bearing quartz in place. There is also evidence sufficient to show that after taking these steps Hamilton had continuously, up to the time of the commencement of the action, prosecuted work upon each of the locations. There had not been on his part a compliance with all of the requirements of the statute of 1897 prescribing the manner of locating mineral claims (St. 1897, p. 214, c. 159), nor, for that matter, had plaintiff's predecessors in interest complied with the requirements of that statute. Under these circumstances, the court instructed the jury that "mining locations made while the law of 1897 was in force, but invalid by reason of noncompliance with the provisions of that law, will be valid after the repeal of that law, providing the provisions of the mining laws of the United States have been complied with and there are no intervening rights before the repeal of that law, and provided, further, that the claim has been occupied, held, and worked up to the time of and after such repeal." This instruction was in accord with the rules laid down by this court in Dwinnell v. Dyer, 145 Cal. 12, 78 Pac. 247, 7 L. R. A. (N. S.) 763. In that case it was held that a locator, entering upon unappropriated land of the United States while the act of 1897 was in force and performing all acts necessary to constitute a valid location under the laws of the United States and remaining in possession and working the claim until the repeal of the state statute (in 1899 or 1900), acquired upon the repeal of the state statute the rights incident to a valid location, notwithstanding his failure to comply with the requirements of the state law. Such was the situation of the defendant Dyer in the case cited, and there was sufficient evidence in the case at bar to justify the jury in finding that Hamilton occupied the same position with reference to the claim here in dispute. The evidence regarding Hamilton's possession of the Rosamond claim was, to be sure, sharply conflicting; but he did introduce testimony tending to show that he had continuously, up to and after the repeal of the law of 1897, prosecuted work under a system tending to the development of all three claims, and that a part of this work had been done within the boundaries of the Rosamond itself. This was enough to constitute possession of the entire claim to the extent of the visible boundaries. English v. Johnson, 17 Cal. 107, 76 Am. Dec. 574; Dwinnell v. Dyer, supra. The court did not err in instructing the jury, in effect, that if Hamilton had on October 26, 1897, erected the first or initial monument at the place required by the state law and posted the required notices thereon and remained in possession of the claim, no other person could make a valid entry thereon for the purpose of making another location until Hamilton was in default. Under the state law the notice of location was required to be recorded in the office of the county recorder within 20 days after the posting thereof. Without passing upon the question whether the failure to record the notice within the required time worked a forfeiture (see section 6 of act of 1897), it must certainly be held that, within the 20 days allowed for recordation, the claim of the locator is valid, and no other entry can be made as the foundation or basis of a claim of title. This is the purport and effect of the instruction complained of. Assuming, as we must upon this appeal, that the jury found all controverted questions of fact in favor of the defendants, there is no basis for the claim that the doctrine of Dwinnell v. Dyer protects the plaintiff in its claim. The jury having found that Hamilton took the preliminary steps required to effect a valid location, and that he remained thereafter in possession of the claim, the predecessors of the plaintiff, in attempting to locate the same land within the 20 days allowed to Hamilton for recordation, were entering upon appropriated public lands in the possession of another. Such entry, as is well settled, confers no right to a valid location. Belk v. Meagher, 104 U. S. 279, 26 L. Ed. 735.

Various rulings of the court in admitting and rejecting evidence are assigned as error. We think that none of these affecting the issues concerning the ownership of the Occidental and the Kid claims were of sufficient consequence to justify a reversal. The witness Cochrane, one of the directors of the plaintiff, was asked on cross-examination whether the plaintiff paid for the assessment work that was done on the claims in 1904 by the Dry Process Company, which held under a contract with plaintiff. Over the objection of the plaintiff that the question was immaterial and irrelevant, he was permitted to answer that the plaintiff did not pay for such work. Whether or not the work was actually paid for was a fact entitled to no weight. Snyder on Mines, § 492. But the error in overruling the objection could not have harmed the appellant, inasmuch as the court instructed the jury that whatever work was done by the Dry Process Company in the year 1904 in connection with any of the mining claims claimed by plaintiff inured to the benefit of the plaintiff. It was proper to allow the same witness to testify that the mill which had been put up on the Home No. 1 by the Dry Process Company was of no value for the purpose of reducing the ore there found. This had a bearing upon the question of the good faith of the parties in making the expenditure, and their good faith was a matter proper to be considered by the jury in determining what amount of money had been expended in the development and working of the claims.

The court should have permitted the introduction of affidavits or proofs of labor made by the witnesses Cochrane and Donovan and duly recorded. Such proofs are by statute made prima facie evidence of the facts therein stated (St. 1891, p. 219, c. 155); but, inasmuch as both Cochrane and Donovan had testified fully and in detail to all of the material facts stated in their respective affidavits, no substantial injury could have resulted from the exclusion of their written declarations.

A more serious point arises in connection with the admission of evidence bearing upon the issues as to the locations of the Rosamond, the Lida, and the Fay. N. V. Gray, a witness for plaintiff, gave testimony tending to show that none of the locations claimed by Hamilton had actually been made as locations of quartz claims prior to November 8, 1897; but that all claims located by Hamilton theretofore had been located as placer claims. He further testified that at that time Hamilton had not located the Rosamond as claimed by him, and that the Lida, when located by Hamilton as a quartz claim, was bounded on the south by plaintiff's Rosamond already located by plaintiff's predecessor in interest, Charles A. Graves. This testimony, if true, established clearly that Graves, and not Hamilton, was prior in time in the location of the Rosamond, and that he and his successors, if remaining in possession and working the claim until the time of the repeal of the state law, were entitled to hold the same under the rule declared in Dwinnell v. Dyer. The defendants undertook to impeach Gray by proof of contrary statements made by him to one Moffett. With a view to such impeachment, Graves was asked upon cross-examination whether or not he had made certain statements to Moffett. The questions did not specify, as required by section 2052 of the Code of Civil Procedure, the time and place of the alleged conversations or the persons present thereat. Objection was duly made upon the ground that the proper foundation had not been laid. This objection was, however, overruled, and the witness answered denying the alleged statements. The substance of the matter alleged to have been stated by Gray to Moffett was that Graves had admitted to Hamilton that in locating the Rosamond he had located upon a claim belonging to Hamilton, and that he would take his papers off the claim, which he did. Moffett was subsequently called, and was permitted, over the objection of the plaintiff that no proper foundation had been laid for contradicting Gray in that regard, to testify that Gray had made the statements as claimed by defendants. This was error (Birch v. Hale, 99 Cal. 299, 33 Pac. 1088), and error that cannot be regarded as without prejudice to plaintiff. The statement by Gray that Graves had, at the time of the transaction, admitted locating his Rosamond claim upon ground already owned by Hamilton, had a strong tendency to throw discredit upon the testimony of Gray that Hamilton had never made any location of the Rosamond ground prior to Graves' location. But beyond all this, Moffett was permitted to testify, over the same objection, i. e., that no foundation had been laid, to statements made by Gray which had not in any way been called to the attention of the latter upon his cross-examination. One of these statements was to the effect that Hamilton had arrived at the mines one day ahead of Graves and placed his papers on the claim. This testimony clearly should not have been admitted. It is impossible to determine what effect it may have had on the jury, in leading it to its answer on the very material issue of priority in the location of the claims.

These errors, together with the insufficiency of the evidence to sustain the finding of title by prescription, will necessitate a new trial of the issues affecting the Rosamond.

The order denying a new trial is reversed as to the issues affecting the Rosamond (as claimed by plaintiff), and in all other respects it is affirmed.

On Modification of Judgment.

PER CURIAM. The appellant shall recover costs of this appeal against the respondent E. M. Hamilton; the amount of such costs to include the clerk's fee for filing transcript, together with such part of the cost of printing transcript as may by the trial court be fixed as the just proportion thereof made necessary by the issues hereby remanded for a new trial.

RATHBUN v. WHITE et al. (Sac. 1,716.)

(Supreme Court of California. Jan. 29, 1910. On Rehearing, Feb. 28, 1910.)

1. TRIAL (§ 235*)—INSTRUCTIONS—EFFECT OF EVIDENCE.

Where, in an action for injuries from an explosion, the evidence was conflicting whether, at the time of the explosion, defendant kept giant powder in his store, in violation of a municipal ordinance setting apart a tract, not including defendant's premises, as the exclusive territory in which giant powder might be stored, and plaintiff showed that giant powder had been in defendant's possession about a week before the explosion, and defendant showed that all the powder had been sold and removed before the explosion, an instruction that, if it was the custom of defendant, in his ordinary course of business prior to the explosion, to store giant powder, the jury could presume that the custom continued, unless defendant rebutted the presumption by a preponderance of evidence, was erroneous because plaintiff must prove the violation by a preponderance of the evidence, and defendant need only meet plaintiff's proof by evidence of equal weight.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 539–548; Dec. Dig. § 235.*]

2. TRIAL (§ 296*)—INSTRUCTIONS—ERROR IN ONE INSTRUCTION CURED BY ANOTHER.

The vice of the instruction was not cured by a general charge that plaintiff must establish the material allegations of the complaint by a preponderance of the evidence, for it at most only produced a conflict in the instructions.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 705–718; Dec. Dig. § 296.*]

3. TRIAL (§ 296*)—INSTRUCTIONS—CONFLICTING INSTRUCTIONS.

Where the different instructions may not be harmonized, and it is impossible to determine which of the conflicting instructions was followed, the error in any of the instructions is prejudicial.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 705–718; Dec. Dig. § 296.*]

4. EXPLOSIVES (§ 8*)—NEGLIGENCE—LIABILITY.

One complying with a municipal ordinance prescribing regulations for the storing of explosives is not relieved from liability for failure to comply with the obligations arising under the general rules of law to use such care in the maintenance and management of one's property as will be ordinarily used by a reasonably prudent man similarly placed.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Explosives, Cent. Dig. §§ 4, 5; Dec. Dig. § 8.*]

5. NEGLIGENCE (§ 108*)—PLEADING—SUFFICIENCY.

It is sufficient to charge negligence by the general averment that defendant negligently did the act which resulted in the damages complained of.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Negligence, Cent. Dig. § 175; Dec. Dig. § 108.*]

6. EXPLOSIVES (§ 8*)—INJURIES FROM NEGLIGENT STORING—RES IPSA LOQUITUR.

The explosion, during a fire in a store, of powder kept by the merchant in quantities dangerous to property and persons in the neighborhood raises a presumption of negligence, under the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur, and the burden of rebutting the negligence is on him.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Explosives, Cent. Dig. §§ 4, 5; Dec. Dig. § 8.*]

7. EVIDENCE (§ 249*)—ADMISSIONS—PARTNERS.

An admission, made by a partner after an explosion of powder on the firm premises, resulting in injury to a person lawfully there, is admissible against him; and, where the declaration was made in the course of the firm business, it is also admissible against the copartner.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. §§ 965, 966; Dec. Dig. § 249.*]

8. EXPLOSIVES (§ 8*)—PERSONAL INJURIES—EVIDENCE.

One suing for personal injuries resulting from the explosion of gunpowder may show that the explosion caused the death of two bystanders occupying a position near him, to illustrate the violence of the explosion.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Explosives, Cent. Dig. §§ 4, 5; Dec. Dig. § 8.*]

9. TRIAL (§ 121*)—IMPROPER ARGUMENT OF COUNSEL.

Where, in an action for personal injuries from the explosion of gunpowder, the evidence showed that the explosion caused the death of two bystanders, the argument of plaintiff's counsel that defendant was guilty of manslaughter in causing the death of the two bystanders was improper.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 294–297; Dec. Dig. § 121.*]

10. EXPLOSIVES (§ 3*)—REGULATIONS FOR STORAGE—CONSTRUCTION.

A municipal ordinance, prohibiting the keeping in any one store of more than 50 pounds of gunpowder, and requiring the powder to be kept in a metal vessel, with the word "Powder" painted on the top or side, which top or side must be kept exposed to view, near the main entry of the store, does not require the box containing powder to be so located as to be visible from the street at times when, in the ordinary course of trade, the store is not open for business.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Explosives, Cent. Dig. § 1; Dec. Dig. § 3.*]

On Rehearing.

11. TRIAL (§ 253*)—INSTRUCTIONS—PRESUMPTIONS.

An instruction, directing the jury to presume the continuance of a course of conduct in violation of law, is erroneous because ignoring the presumption of innocence of wrong declared by Code Civ. Proc. § 1963, subd. 1, which overcomes, even in civil cases, that of the continuance of things once shown to exist, though the latter presumption is a proper matter for consideration.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. § 618; Dec. Dig. § 253.*]

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Yuba County; Eugene P. McDaniel, Judge.

Action by Harry Berton Rathbun against John C. White and others, copartners as White, Cooley & Cutts. From a judgment for plaintiff, and from an order denying a new trial, defendants appeal. Reversed.

Richard Belcher and W. H. Carlin, for appellants. Brittan & Raish and Wallace Dinsmore, for respondent.

SLOSS, J. The defendants were conducting a hardware business in the city of Marysville. One of the buildings occupied by them, known as the tinning and plumbing shop, took fire on the 17th day of December, 1906. Plaintiff was a member of the fire department of Marysville, and was summoned to assist in extinguishing the fire. While he was engaged in this duty, and was stationed on the street in front of the tinning and plumbing shop, an explosion of powder kept by defendants in said building took place. The explosion was of such force as to demolish a part of the building and to inflict bodily injuries upon several persons standing near. Among these was the plaintiff, and he brought this action to recover damages for the injuries sustained by him. Trial resulted in a verdict and judgment in his favor for $2,000. Defendants appeal from the judgment, and from an order denying their motion for a new trial.

At the time of the accident there was in force an ordinance of the city of Marysville regulating the manner of keeping and storing powder and other explosives. The ordinance by sections 1 and 3 set apart a certain tract (not including defendants' premises) as the exclusive territory within which Hercules, dynamite, or giant powder, or other similar explosives, might be stored or kept. Section 2 prohibited the keeping in any one store or building of more than 50 pounds of gunpowder. It further provided that "said gunpowder shall be kept in a strong metal vessel well secured and fastened and with the word 'Powder' distinctly painted upon the top or side of said vessel, such top or side to be kept exposed to view, and said vessel shall always be kept as near the main entrance of the store or building as is practicable."

The ordinance was set forth in the complaint, which alleged in paragraph 3 that the defendants "did negligently keep and store on said premises Hercules, dynamite, giant powder, gunpowder, and nitroglycerin, and other similar highly explosive substances, and also a large quantity of gunpowder, sporting powder, and blasting powder, to wit, more than 50 pounds, and not in a box with its top or side exposed to view, nor as near the main entrance of said building as practicable." It was further alleged in paragraph 7 that, while plaintiff was performing his duties as fireman "the said Hercules, dynamite, giant powder, gunpowder, nitroglycerin, and other similar highly explosive substances, and gunpowder, sporting powder, and blasting powder so stored and kept in said building on said premises, as alleged in paragraph 3 of this complaint, did explode. * * *" These allegations of the third and seventh paragraphs were denied. At the trial much testimony was introduced on the question whether the defendants had violated the ordinance, either by keeping Hercules, dynamite, or giant powder or other similar high explosives at all (their premises being without the territory where such keeping was permitted), or by keeping gunpowder in excess of the amount allowed, or without compliance with some of the required precautions.

There was a particularly sharp conflict over the question whether, at the time of the explosion, the defendants were keeping giant powder. The plaintiff offered testimony tending to show that giant powder had been in the defendants' possession about a week before the fire. The defendants, not disputing this, contended and offered evidence tending to show that all such powder had been sold and removed from their premises before the date of the explosion. The court, at the request of plaintiff, gave two instructions numbered 3 and 4 bearing upon this issue. It will be sufficient here to quote No. 4 (No. 3, so far as concerns the points to be discussed, was similar in general effect) as follows: "If you believe a preponderance of the evidence shows that it was the custom of defendants or their ordinary course of business, prior to the explosion, to keep or store giant powder or blasting powder in said plumbing and tinning shop building or any vessel therein, then I instruct you to presume that that custom and course of business of so keeping and storing such powder continued as long as it is usual for things of that nature to continue, unless defendants rebut this presumption by a preponderance of evidence." This was erroneous. In the first place, it directed the jury to presume that a course of conduct contrary to and in violation of law continued. There was thus ignored the counter presumption that the defendants were "innocent of crime or wrong" (Code Civ. Proc. § 1963, subd. 1), a presumption which as this court has said, overcomes, even in civil cases, that of the continuance of things once shown to exist. Hunter v. Hunter, 111 Cal. 261, 43 Pac. 756, 31 L. R. A. 411, 52 Am. St. Rep. 180. But, even if it can be said that the presumption arose as stated in instruction 4, the court was clearly in error in stating to the jury, in effect, that this presumption was to prevail unless the defendants should rebut it by a preponderance of evidence. The violation of the ordinance was a part of plaintiff's case. Before he could fasten on defendants any liability based on the ordinance, he was bound to establish its violation by a preponderance of the evidence. The affirmative of this issue might be shown by direct testimony, or by evidence giving rise to an inference or a presumption; but, in whatever way the plaintiff undertook to make this showing, the burden of proof was upon him, and the defendants were not called upon to do any more than to meet his proof by evidence of equal weight. If their showing merely balanced his, they were entitled to a finding in their favor. They were not required to overcome plaintiff's evidence by a preponderance, as this instruction declares. Upon the contrary, the plaintiff was required to sustain his side of the issue by a preponderance of all the testimony. This proposition is so elementary that it cannot be necessary to cite authority in its support. Indeed, the trial court recognized it in other instructions, in which it stated to the jury that the burden rested upon the plaintiff to establish by a preponderance of the testimony every material allegation of his complaint, and that if he failed to do so, the verdict must be for the defendants.

This instruction (No. 4) referred to a vital issue. If the defendants were keeping giant powder in their building at the time of the explosion, their liability for any injury caused by such explosion inevitably followed, inasmuch as the building was outside of the limits within which such powder might be stored. It is difficult to see how any instruction could have more directly prejudiced the case of the defendants than one which virtually required them to prove, by a preponderance of the testimony, that they were not storing giant powder. Nor was the vice of the instruction cured by the general direction that plaintiff must establish every material allegation of the complaint by a preponderance of the testimony. This produced, at most, a hopeless conflict between the various instructions. The different declarations of the court were not capable of being harmonized. In such case it is impossible to determine which of the conflicting rules presented to them was followed by the jury, and the error in any of the instructions must be deemed prejudicial. Estate of Cunningham, 52 Cal. 465; Sappenfield v. Main St. R. R. Co., 91 Cal. 48, 27 Pac. 590.

The ground just discussed will necessitate a reversal. Some of the other points raised may, however, arise upon a new trial, and with this in view they will be briefly noticed.

The defendants requested instructions directing the jury to return a verdict in favor of the defendants if they should find that the latter had in every respect complied with the ordinance. The court, however, modified such instructions by adding thereto the proviso "unless you should find that they negligently stored or kept the same [powder] in a way that directly, naturally, proximately, and materially contributed to said injuries." The defendants complain of these modifications. Considered as an abstract proposition of law, the rule declared by the court was unquestionably sound. The ordinance prescribed certain regulations that must be followed in the storing of explosives. It did not purport to, nor could it, declare that one who observed these regulations, but was otherwise negligent, should be free from liability. Compliance with the ordinance would not relieve from the obligation arising under the general rules of law to use such care, in the management of one's property, as would ordinarily be used by a reasonably prudent man similarly placed. It is contended, however, that the complaint was framed on the sole theory that the defendants had violated the ordinance, and that there was no issue concerning any other negligence. But it will be observed that the portions of the complaint hereinbefore quoted aver that the defendants negligently kept and stored Hercules, dynamite, giant powder, and gunpowder, and that the explosives so kept exploded. It is sufficient, under the rule well settled in this state, to charge negligence by the general averment that the defendant negligently did the particular act which resulted in damage to plaintiff. House v. Meyer, 100 Cal. 592, 35 Pac. 308; Stephenson v. S. P. Co., 102 Cal. 143, 34 Pac. 618, 36 Pac. 407. It may be said that the complaint fails to allege that the negligent act charged (i. e., the keeping of the explosives) was the cause of the explosion and the consequent injury. Smith v. Buttner, 90 Cal. 95, 27 Pac. 29. It is perhaps equally defective in failing to allege any causal connection between the violation of the ordinance and the injury. But it is useless to pursue any discussion based on the form of the pleadings, since they may be amended in advance of another trial. The foregoing suggestions have been made with a view to indicating the propriety of requesting leave to so amend.

Plaintiff's instruction 8 directed the jury that the explosion of powder, kept by the defendants in such quantities as to be very dangerous to property in the neighborhood and to persons rightly in the neighborhood, raised a presumption of negligence, the burden of rebutting which would rest upon defendants. This application of the doctrine res ipsa loquitur was, we think, proper under the circumstances of the case. Judson v. Giant Powder Co., 107 Cal. 549, 40 Pac. 1020, 29 L. R. A. 718, 48 Am. St. Rep. 146. Kleebauer v. Western Fuse Co., 138 Cal. 497, 71 Pac. 617, 60 L. R. A. 377, 94 Am. St. Rep. 62, is not in conflict with this view. The trial court had there instructed the jury, in effect, that the defendant was liable for any injury resulting from the explosion, however caused, of powder kept in a place where, if exploded, it would be likely to injure or damage persons or property in the neighborhood. In other words, it made the person storing powder an insurer, and liable for damage resulting from an explosion, regardless of negligence. This was declared to be erroneous, but the decision did not question the doctrine of the Judson Case that the explosion of powder under the control of the defendant makes out a prima facie case of negligence which must be rebutted by the defendant. We do not understand instruction 8 as going any further than this.

Evidence of declarations, made after the accident by the defendant White, was certainly admissible against the declarant. If the statements were made in the course of the partnership business, they might also be properly introduced against White's copartners. Dennis v. Kolm, 131 Cal. 91, 63 Pac. 141. On the facts disclosed by the bill of exceptions it is difficult for us to say whether White made the admissions in the course of the partnership business. The court below should, in the light of such showing as may be made upon a new trial, pass upon this question, and either admit the evidence generally, or limit its effect by proper direction to the jury.

We think plaintiff was entitled to show that the explosion resulted in the death of two bystanders, occupying a position near that of plaintiff. The extent of plaintiff's injuries was in issue and testimony tending to illustrate the force and violence of the explosion was relevant to this issue. The fact that others similarly situated had sustained injuries sufficiently severe to cause death had a logical tendency to support plaintiff's claim in this regard. Counsel for plaintiff should, however, have restricted himself in argument to such discussion of this fact as bore upon the purpose for which the evidence had been admitted. Statements that the defendants were guilty of manslaughter in causing the death of these two persons were manifestly improper. We are not, however, to be understood as saying that the remarks of counsel would, in and of themselves, furnish ground for a reversal.

The meaning of instruction 5, given at the request of plaintiff, is not quite clear. If the court intended thereby to construe section 2 of the ordinance as requiring the box containing powder to be so located as to be visible from the street at times when, in the ordinary course of trade, defendants' building was not open for business, we think it read into the section a restriction not justified by the language or the reasonable intent of the ordinance.

The foregoing discussion disposes of the important points that seem likely to arise upon a new trial.

The judgment and order appealed from are reversed.

On Rehearing.

In Bank.

PER CURIAM. The petition for a hearing in bank after judgment in department is denied.

The opinion heretofore filed is modified, by striking therefrom the words: "This was erroneous. In the first place, it directed the jury to presume that a course of conduct contrary to and in violation of law continued. There was thus ignored the counter presumption that the defendants were 'innocent of crime or wrong' (Code Civ. Proc. § 1963, subd. 1), a presumption which, as this court has said, overcomes, even in civil cases, that of the continuance of things once shown to exist. Hunter v. Hunter, 111 Cal. 261, 43 Pac. 756, 31 L. R. A. 411, 52 Am. St. Rep. 180. But, even if it can be said that the presumption arose as stated in instruction 4"—and substituting therefor the following: "The presumption that 'a thing once proved to exist continues as long as is usual with things of that nature' (Code Civ. Proc. § 1963, subd. 32), was one that the jury was entitled to take into consideration in determining whether or not the defendants were, at the time of the explosion, keeping giant or blasting powder in contravention of the terms of the ordinance. Inasmuch, however, as the act charged against defendants constituted a violation of law, we think the jury should, in this connection, have been directed that they might consider also the presumption that 'a person is innocent of crime or wrong.' Code Civ. Proc. § 1963, subd. 1. The ultimate fact was to be determined upon a consideration of all of the evidence, including both presumptions. But, conceding that the presumption arose as declared in instruction 4," etc.

MORAN v. BONYNGE (GILMAN et al., Interveners). (L. A. 2,412.)

(Supreme Court of California. Feb. 7, 1910. Rehearing Denied March 9, 1910.)

1. PUBLIC LANDS (§ 144*)—STATE LANDS—RIGHT TO PURCHASE—CONTESTS—"ACTOR."

The rule that each party to a proceeding under Pol. Code, §§ 3414, 3415, to determine the right to purchase state lands, is an "actor" and must state in his pleading facts sufficient to show that he has some right to the land better than that of the adverse party, applies to one who is admitted as an intervener as well as to the original parties.

2. PARTIES (§ 48*)—INTERVENTION—PROCEEDINGS.

The pleading of one admitted as an intervener, under Code Civ. Proc. § 387, because he has an interest in the subject-matter, an interest in the success of one of the parties, or an interest against both, must state facts sufficient to establish the right or interest which he claims, or he has no longer a standing in the court as a litigant where proper objection is made.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Parties, Cent. Dig. § 75; Dec. Dig. § 48.*]

3. PUBLIC LANDS (§ 144*)—STATE LANDS—RIGHT TO PURCHASE—QUALIFICATION OF PURCHASER.

In an action under Pol. Code, §§ 3414, 3415, to determine the rights to purchase state lands, a complaint in intervention by one claiming as assignee of a third person must show that the third person was a qualified purchaser under Pol. Code, § 3495 (St. 1885, p. 207), by showing that he was a citizen of the United States, or that he had filed a declaration of intention to become a citizen, and that he was a resident of the state, and was of lawful age, etc.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Public Lands, Cent. Dig. §§ 392, 394; Dec. Dig. § 144.*]

4. PUBLIC LANDS (§ 144*)—STATE LANDS—RIGHT TO PURCHASE—QUALIFICATION OF PURCHASER.

An averment, in a pleading to determine rights to purchase state lands, that one made application in due form to purchase from the state, and without stating that any affidavit was made or filed in the Surveyor General's office, is insufficient.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Public Lands, Cent. Dig. §§ 392, 394; Dec. Dig. § 144.*]

5. PUBLIC LANDS (§ 144*)—STATE LANDS—RIGHT TO PURCHASE—QUALIFICATION OF PURCHASER.

The fact that the Surveyor General received 20 per cent. of the purchase money on a purchase of state lands, and issued a certificate, does not excuse a party relying on a purchase from alleging facts necessary to show a valid application.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Public Lands, Cent. Dig. §§ 392, 394; Dec. Dig. § 144.*]

6. PUBLIC LANDS (§ 144*) — STATE LANDS — RIGHT TO PURCHASE — QUALIFICATION OF PURCHASER.

To show a right to purchase 640 acres of state lands, it is necessary to allege that the land was not suitable for cultivation.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Public Lands, Cent. Dig. § 392; Dec. Dig. § 144.*]

7. PLEADING (§ 8*)—PLEADING CONCLUSIONS—RIGHT TO PURCHASE STATE LANDS—QUALIFICATION OF PURCHASER.

An averment, in a pleading in a proceeding to determine the rights to purchase state lands, that an application was in due form, and that the applicant became the purchaser and entitled to the possession of the land and to receive a patent therefor in due course, is a mere conclusion of law, and insufficient as against a demurrer.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Pleading, Cent. Dig. § 24; Dec. Dig. § 8.*]

8. PLEADING (§ 8*)—PLEADING CONCLUSIONS—RIGHT TO PURCHASE STATE LANDS—QUALIFICATION OF PURCHASER.

An averment, in such a pleading, that a certificate of purchase in due form was issued, is a mere conclusion of law, and is not the equivalent of an averment of the facts necessary to show a valid application to purchase.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Pleading, Cent. Dig. § 24; Dec. Dig. § 8.*]

9. PARTIES (§ 48*)—INTERVENTION—SUSTAINING DEMURRER TO COMPLAINT IN INTERVENTION—EFFECT.

Where the demurrer to the complaint in intervention was properly sustained, the intervener ceased to have any interest in the subsequent proceedings, and he could not object to the sufficiency of the findings and to the judgment declaring the rights of the other parties to the litigation.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Parties, Cent. Dig. § 75; Dec. Dig. § 48.*]

10. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1040*)—HARMLESS ERROR—SUSTAINING DEMURRER.

Where a complaint in intervention is fatally defective, any irregularity in entertaining and ruling on demurrer thereto is harmless.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 4090, 4092, 4093; Dec. Dig. § 1040.*]

11. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 918*) — PRESUMPTIONS—ABSENCE OF BILL OF EXCEPTIONS.

Where the complaint in intervention was fatally defective, the court on appeal must presume that the refusal of leave to amend was fully justified, in the absence of any bill of exceptions or any facts to the contrary.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 3710–3712; Dec. Dig. § 918.*]

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Kern County; J. W. Mahon, Judge.

Action by T. L. Moran against Mary A. Bonynge, in which Charles H. Gilman and another intervene. From a judgment for defendant, the interveners appeal. Affirmed.

F. D. Brandon and R. P. Henshall, for appellants. George E. Whitaker, Frank H. Short, and Hunsaker, Britt & Fleming, for respondent Bonynge. J. R. Dorsey and Charles G. Lamberson, for respondent Moran.

SHAW, J. The plaintiff's complaint states a cause of action, under sections 3414 and 3415 of the Political Code, to determine the respective rights of the plaintiff and defendant to purchase certain state lands. The contest was referred to the superior court by the State Surveyor General. The defendant appeared and answered setting up and claiming a right to buy the land under a prior application and certificate of the Surveyor General. Gilman and two others obtained leave of court and filed a complaint in intervention, in which they claimed the right to purchase the land, which included an entire section of 640 acres, under a Surveyor General's certificate antedating the claims of both plaintiff and defendant. Demurrers to this complaint filed by both plaintiff and defendant were sustained by the court without leave to amend. No order dismissing the intervention was made. Thereafter there was a trial of the contest between the plaintiff and the defendant, and judgment was given that the plaintiff take nothing, and that the defendant, Mary A. Bonynge, was entitled to purchase the land covered by her certificate. The interveners appeal from this judgment.

The record consists solely of the judgment roll. The only point that need be noticed is the alleged error in overruling the demurrers to the complaint in intervention.

It has long been settled that each party to a proceeding of this character is an actor and must state in his pleading facts sufficient to show that he has some right to the land better than that of the other parties; that if he claims as a purchaser from the state he must allege the facts necessary to give him a right to purchase the land from the state, paramount to the right of his adversaries. Cadierque v. Duran, 49 Cal. 357; Ramsey v. Flournoy, 58 Cal. 261; Aurrecoechea v. Sinclair, 60 Cal. 549; Dillon v. Saloude, 68 Cal. 270, 9 Pac. 162; Cushing v. Keslar, 68 Cal. 477, 9 Pac. 659; Gilson v. Robinson, 68 Cal. 543, 10 Pac. 193; Reese v. Thorburn, 78 Cal. 117, 20 Pac. 131; Prentice v. Miller, 82 Cal. 573, 23 Pac. 189; Anthony v. Jillson, 83 Cal. 300, 23 Pac. 419; Dollenmayer v. Pryor, 150 Cal. 4, 87 Pac. 616. In Cadierque v. Duran, supra, it is said: "When a contest originating in the Surveyor General's office, in relation to the right to purchase lands from the state, is referred to the proper court for determination, if all the parties are applicants for the purchase, each must state, in his pleadings, all the facts upon which he relies as showing his right to become the purchaser, and the steps he had taken to avail himself of and secure his right to make the purchase. If one of the parties merely protests against the approval of the application of another party, he must state the facts constituting the grounds of the contest, as, for instance, that he has acquired the title from the United States, or that he has the right of pre-emption, stating the facts upon which his right is based."

This rule applies to one who is admitted as an intervener as well as to plaintiffs and defendants. An intervener must have an interest in the subject-matter, an interest in the success of one of the parties, or an interest against both, or he cannot be admitted as a party. Code Civ. Proc. § 387. When he is admitted, the pleading which he presents and files must state facts sufficient, if true, to establish the right or interest which he claims; else he has no longer a standing in court as a litigant, if proper objection is made. He stands upon the same footing in this respect as the other parties.

The interveners claim solely as assignees or transferees of one S. Davis. The allegations of the complaint in intervention concerning the right of Davis are as follows: "(2) That on or about the 1st day of August, 1888, one S. Davis made application in due form to purchase from the state of California the land and premises above described, and then paid to the state of California twenty (20) per cent. of the purchase price of such lands, and the first year's interest in advance upon the balance of such purchase money, together with the deposit and filing fee as required by law, and thereafter received from the state of California a certificate of purchase in due form for said lands, dated on the 20th day of March, 1889, and No. 11,487, whereby said S. Davis became the purchaser and entitled to the possession of said land and to receive a patent therefor in due course."

This does not aver that Davis was a citizen of the United States, or that he had filed a declaration of intention to become a citizen, nor that he was a resident of the state, nor that he was of lawful age, nor that there was at the time no adverse occupation of the land, nor that the land was not susceptible of cultivation, nor that Davis had not entered other lands of the same class, which, with the land applied for, would exceed 640 acres. All these facts were necessary to show that Davis was a qualified purchaser, as the law stood at and ever since the time of his application. Pol. Code, § 3495; St. 1885, p. 207. It does not state that any affidavit was made or filed in the Surveyor General's office, but merely avers that Davis "made application in due form to purchase from the state." In Reese v. Thorburn, supra, this was declared to be insufficient as a statement of fact; the court saying: "The facts must be set out in the complaint so that the court can discern that the application is in due form of law, or rather that it complies with the requirements of the law." See, also, Hildebrand v. Stewart, 41 Cal. 392; Woods v. Sawtelle, 46 Cal. 391; Botsford v. Howell, 52 Cal. 158. The fact that the Surveyor General received 20 per cent. of the purchase money and issued a certificate does not excuse the interveners from alleging the facts necessary to show a valid application. Woods v. Sawtelle, supra. It was necessary to allege that the land was not suitable for cultivation, in order to show a right to purchase 640 acres. Polk v. Sleeper, 143 Cal. 73, 76 Pac. 819; Manley v. Cunningham, 72 Cal. 243, 13 Pac. 622. It was also necessary to aver the facts which would make Davis a qualified purchaser. Polk v. Sleeper, supra. The complaint in intervention on these subjects states only that the application was "in due form," and that Davis "became the purchaser and entitled to the possession of said land and to receive a patent therefor in due course." These are bare and general conclusions of law, wholly insufficient in a pleading when challenged by a demurrer. The demurrers were properly sustained.

The interveners cite Bieber v. Lambert, 152 Cal. 562, 93 Pac. 94, and claim that it holds contrary to the above authorities. They misapprehend the effect of that case. It discusses and declares only the effect of the recitals of the certificate of purchase as evidence, when it is given in evidence upon the trial; and what was there said has no bearing whatever upon the question of the sufficiency of a complaint when attacked by general demurrer. Moreover, the complaint of the intervener does not set forth the contents of the certificate, but merely avers that "a certificate of purchase in due form" was issued. This also is a conclusion of law, and clearly not the equivalent of an averment of the facts necessary to show a valid application to purchase.

The demurrers having been properly sustained, the interveners ceased to have any interest in the subsequent proceedings, and their objections to the sufficiency of the findings, and to the judgment declaring the rights of the other parties, are without avail. It being settled that they had no right to purchase, their right to be heard on other points in the case terminated. Ramsey v. Flournoy, supra.

It is also asserted that the demurrers to the complaint were not properly served. Waiving the point that there is no bill of exceptions, and hence that the lack of proper service does not appear in the record before us, it is a sufficient answer to this claim to say that the complaint in intervention is fatally defective, and that this renders any irregularity in entertaining and ruling on the demurrer entirely harmless. We must regard the refusal of leave to amend as fully justified, since there is no bill of exceptions, nor any facts to show the contrary. Incidentally we note that the respondent states in her brief, and appellants do not deny it, that the right of Davis to purchase the land from the state, by virtue of the certificate issued to him, was foreclosed by the judgment of the superior court of Kern county in 1892, and that this judgment has become final. See People v. Davis, 143 Cal. 673, 77 Pac. 651, where the case was finally determined on appeal to this court. Doubtless the court below had its former judgment in mind when it refused leave to amend.

The judgment is affirmed.

DI VECCHIO v. LUCHSINGER et al.
(Civ. 688.)

(Court of Appeal, First District, California. Dec. 17, 1909.)

1. LANDLORD AND TENANT (§ 128*)—LIABILITY OF TENANT.

Where a tenant in a lease of flats, which provided that, until the lessees in possession under monthly tenancies on the date of the execution of the lease, July 27, 1906, should vacate the premises, the lessor would allow the tenant a rebate of a specified sum per day not beyond November 1, 1906, and that on failure of such lessees to vacate, the tenant should take possession with knowledge that the flats were occupied, and one of the lessees retained possession until June 1, 1907, under the claim that he was a tenant for a year, when he was in fact a tenant from month to month, the loss resulting from the failure to oust the lessee must fall on the tenant.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Landlord and Tenant, Dec. Dig. § 128.*]

2. FRAUD (§ 66*)—SPECIAL FINDINGS—GENERAL VERDICT—INCONSISTENCY.

Where, in an action by a tenant for false representations inducing the execution of the lease, the tenant relied on the theory that a lessee in possession at the time of execution of a lease was a tenant for a year, and not from month to month, as represented by the lessor, and the jury specially found that such lessee was not a tenant for a year, a general verdict for the tenant could not be sustained because it was inconsistent with the special finding, since under Code Civ. Proc. § 625, a special finding inconsistent with a general verdict controls.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; John Hunt, Judge.

Action by Ermenegildo Di Vecchio against George H. Luchsinger and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Reversed, with directions.

Alexander D. Keyes, for appellants. Edmund Tauszky, for respondent.

KERRIGAN, J. This is an action for damages for false and fraudulent representations made to induce the execution of a lease. The appeal is from the judgment in favor of plaintiff, taken more than 60 days after its entry, and from an order denying defendants' motion to vacate the judgment, and to direct the entry of a judgment in favor of defendants.

On July 27, 1906, the defendants, George H. Luchsinger, Alvina L. Goodrich, Rose A. Buckingham, and their sister Annie L. Summerhayes, since deceased, leased to the plaintiff certain premises on Golden Gate avenue in San Francisco, consisting of three flats, for the term of five years commencing August 1, 1906, at a monthly rental of $200, payable in advance on the first day of each month. At the date of the execution of the lease each of the flats was in the occupancy of a tenant of the lessors, and the lease provided that until the tenants should vacate the premises the lessors would allow the lessee a rebate of $2.75 per day from the beginning of the lease until the last occupant should vacate, provided, however, that such rebate should not extend beyond November 1, 1906, whether said occupants vacated the premises or not. The lease further provided that the premises were taken subject to the tenancies of the occupants; that in the event said occupants failed to surrender peaceable possession of the premises by September 1, 1906, actions were to be commenced as soon as possible for the purpose of ejecting them, the actions to be in the names of the lessors, but at the expense of the lessees, and they were to be prosecuted with due diligence.

The tenants occupying the lower and middle flats vacated in due time, but one Mrs. Kaiser, who claimed to be a tenant of the upper flat for a year from June 1, 1906, actually remained in possession of it until June 1, 1907.

On October 11, 1906, plaintiff leased the middle and upper flats for the remainder of his five-year term at $164 per month, with the understanding that the tenants were not to pay rent for the upper flat until they obtained possession. They had been informed that Mrs. Kaiser was a tenant from month to month. It was further stipulated in the lease that, as soon as possession of the upper flat could be had, it would be given to them; that in the meantime they could take the middle flat and pay therefore $77 a month. This they did. Between the date of the lease last mentioned and July, 1907, rents depreciated from 15 to 20 per cent., and when Mrs. Kaiser finally vacated the upper flat the subtenants refused to accept possession under their lease, whereupon a new lease was made to them, by the terms of which they were to pay plaintiff $128 per month, instead of $164. It is alleged in the complaint that at the time of the execution of the lease to plaintiff, and prior thereto, the lessors represented to him that Mrs. Kaiser was a tenant from month to month at a monthly rental of $42.50, but that in truth and in fact she was a tenant of said premises for the term of one year beginning June 1, 1906, at a monthly rental of $37.50. In their answer defendants admitted that they had informed plaintiff that Mrs. Kaiser was a tenant from month to month at a monthly rental of $42.50, but they denied that the statement was false as charged, or that it was known to them, or any of them, to be false. On the contrary, they alleged that Kaiser was a tenant from month to month at said monthly rental, and did not have a lease for a year. The jury returned a general verdict in favor of plaintiff, assessing the damages at $1,000, for which sum judgment was entered against defendants.

Plaintiff took possession of the premises with knowledge that the three flats were occupied, and if Mrs. Kaiser was not a tenant for one year, but from month to month only, the failure to oust her was the misfortune and loss of plaintiff. The theory upon which the complaint was drawn, and upon which plaintiff's case was tried, was that Mrs. Kaiser was in possession under a lease for one year from June 1, 1906, and was not a tenant from month to month. In harmony with this theory the court instructed the jury "that the plaintiff cannot recover unless he has proved, by a preponderance of evidence, that L. Kaiser was a tenant of the premises No. 955 Golden Gate avenue for a term of one year from the 1st day of June, 1906, to the 1st day of June, 1907, at a monthly rental." The case was tried prior to the amendment of 1909 to section 625 of the Code of Civil Procedure; and, at the request of the defendants, the court submitted to the jury, among others, the following question: "Was L. Kaiser, on the 27th day of July, 1906, in possession of the flat No. 955 Golden Gate avenue, in the city and county of San Francisco, under a lease from the defendants for a term of one year from the 1st day of June, 1906, to the 1st day of June, 1907, at a monthly rental?" To this interrogatory the jury answered, "No."

Defendants contend that the general verdict in favor of the plaintiff and the special verdict are inconsistent, and that the court should have granted the motion to direct the entry of judgment for the defendants. We agree with this contention. It will be observed that the interrogatory just mentioned went only to the duration of Mrs. Kaiser's lease, and did not embrace the question of the amount of the monthly rent, whether it was $37.50 or $42.50. But no evidence was introduced to sustain this issue, and it is wholly immaterial, and so conceded by defendants. The gravamen of the action was whether Mrs. Kaiser was a tenant from month to month only, or under a lease for one year. There is no merit in the suggestion of plaintiff that, notwithstanding that the jury found specially that Mrs. Kaiser was not a tenant under a lease for a year at a monthly rental, they may have believed she was a tenant for the term mentioned at a yearly rental, because it is admitted by the pleadings that she was in possession under a monthly rental. There is no escape from the conclusion that the special findings are inconsistent with the general verdict in favor of the plaintiff, and therefore judgment should have been entered in favor of the defendants. "Where a special finding of facts is inconsistent with the general verdict, the former controls the latter, and the court must give judgment accordingly." Section 625, Code Civ. Proc. See, also, McAulay v. Moody, 128 Cal. 202, 60 Pac. 778.

This point disposing, as it does, of the case, it will be unnecessary to review the many other points discussed in the briefs.

The judgment is reversed and the court below directed to enter judgment upon the special finding referred to in favor of the defendants and against the plaintiff.

We concur: COOPER, P. J.; HALL, J.

FUJISE et al. v. LOS ANGELES RY. CO.

(Civ. 730.)

(Court of Appeal, Second District, California. Dec. 16, 1909. Rehearing Denied by Supreme Court Feb. 14, 1910.)

1. Negligence (§ 65*)—Personal Injury—Contributory Negligence.

The contributory negligence which will prevent recovery of damages for a personal injury must be that of the injured person or some one he controlled.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Negligence, Cent. Dig. §§ 83, 94; Dec. Dig. § 65.*]

2. Negligence (§ 65*)—Contributory Negligence—Relief from Liability—Reason for Rule.

The reason for the rule relieving one from payment of damages for negligence, where the injured party is guilty of contributory negligence, is based on the impossibility of successfully apportioning the damages, and not merely because the injured party contributed to the result by his own negligence or wrongful act.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Negligence, Cent. Dig. §§ 83, 94; Dec. Dig. § 65.*]

3. Negligence (§§ 92, 93*)—Imputed Negligence—Carrier and Passenger—Driver and Occupant of Private Vehicle.

The rule of imputed contributory negligence does not apply to a passenger in a public conveyance, or to one invited to ride in a private conveyance; and neither is chargeable with the negligence of the driver.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Negligence, Cent. Dig. §§ 142–150; Dec. Dig. §§ 92, 93.*]

4. Negligence (§ 92*)—Imputed Negligence—Carrier and Passenger.

There is no distinction in principle whether a passenger be on a public conveyance, like a railroad train, or on an omnibus, or be on a hack hired from the public stand on the street for a drive, and those on the hack do not become responsible for the driver's negligence, if they exercise no control further than to indicate the route they wish to travel, or the places to which they wish to go.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Negligence, Cent. Dig. §§ 142–146; Dec. Dig. § 92.*]

5. Carriers (§ 325*)—Contributory Negligence—Care Required Against Negligence of Another.

The rule against imputed contributory negligence does not absolve a passenger or guest against using ordinary care for his own safety, as no one can be allowed to shut his eyes to danger in blind reliance on the unaided care of another, without assuming the consequences.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Cent. Dig. § 1348; Dec. Dig. § 325.*]

6. Negligence (§ 136*)—Contributory Negligence—Question for Jury.

Whether a person injured in a conveyance has been guilty of contributory negligence in a case wherein there was contributory negligence by the driver not imputable to him is chiefly a question of fact, and whether the injured party used ordinary care must be determined by the jury from the circumstances of each case.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Negligence, Cent. Dig. §§ 333–346; Dec. Dig. § 136.*]

7. Street Railroads (§ 117*) — Collision With Car — Contributory Negligence — Matter of Law.

In an action for death of woman riding with an expressman, and killed in collision with a car which overtook them from the rear, it cannot be said as matter of law that her failure to ascertain the car's position before turning across the track was contributory negligence.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Street Railroads, Cent. Dig. §§ 255–257; Dec. Dig. § 117.*]

8. Street Railroads (§ 119*) — Collision with Car — Action for Death — Special Finding — Consistency with General Verdict.

In an action for the death of a woman killed while riding with an expressman in collision with a car which overtook them from the rear, a finding that she failed to look was not inconsistent with implied finding of the general verdict for plaintiff that it was unnecessary for her to look in exercising ordinary care for her own safety amid the circumstances in which she was placed.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Street Railroads, Cent. Dig. § 270; Dec. Dig. § 119.*]

9. Street Railroads (§ 119*) — Collision with Car — Action for Death—Special Finding — Consistency with General Verdict.

A finding that she did not exercise any care or caution whatever in ascertaining the approach of the car, or to avoid the collision, was not inconsistent with the implied finding in the general verdict that she was not required to exercise any care prior to the collision, her negative reliance on the driver being sufficient.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Street Railroads, Cent. Dig. § 270; Dec. Dig. § 119.*]

10. Trial (§ 365*)—Special Finding—Construction.

In construing a special finding, the entire answer must be construed.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 871–874; Dec. Dig. § 365.*]

11. Negligence (§§ 122, 142*)—Special Finding—Inconsistency with General Verdict—Absence of Evidence.

The burden of showing contributory negligence rests on defendant, and a finding that there is an absence of evidence on this issue cannot be regarded as inconsistent with the general verdict in plaintiff's favor.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Negligence, Cent. Dig. § 229; Dec. Dig. §§ 122, 142.*]

12. Trial (§ 351*)—Verdict—Special Interrogatories—Time for Requesting.

The analogy between a request for instructions and a request for submission of special interrogatories is not so close as to justify application of the rule of practice, adopted in connection with the former, as to the time for presenting instructions.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Dec. Dig. § 351.*]

13. Trial (§ 349*)—Verdict—Special Issues—Submission—Discretion of Court.

Submission of special issues to the jury rests largely in the discretion of the trial judge, where there is neither rule of practice nor statute relating to it.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. § 824; Dec. Dig. § 349.*]

14. Trial (§ 359*)—Verdict—Special Finding—Nature Under Code.

Special findings by the jury, which parties are entitled to have under Code Civ. Proc. § 625, and which by that section control the general verdict, when inconsistent therewith, are not the special verdict of common-law practice, which must be sufficient to support a judgment, but their primary purpose is to determine whether the general verdict is against the law.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 857–860; Dec. Dig. § 359.*]

15. Trial (§ 352*)—Verdict—Special Findings—Form of Interrogatories.

Special findings are addressed to matters relevant to the issues impliedly found in the general verdict, and are subject to the conditions that the questions shall be so framed as to admit of a plain and direct answer, and that answers favorable to the party preferring the request would be inconsistent with the general verdict for his adversary.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 840–842, 844, 845; Dec. Dig. § 352.*]

16. Street Railroads (§ 119*) — Special Questions—Questions Proper for Submission.

In an action for death of a woman killed while riding with an expressman in collision with a car which overtook them from the rear, the court refused to submit questions for special findings as to the motorman's care, requested by defendant, asking whether he sounded his bell and slowed down on approaching the wagon, at what speed he was moving when he first noticed it; whether the driver turned off the track when the car approached, and, if he did, whether he drove far enough to one side to enable it to pass without striking the wagon; whether the motorman was justified in increasing the speed in passing; whether, assuming that the wagon passed far enough to the right to pass the car, the motorman supposed he would be allowed to pass; whether the motorman sounded his gong to give warning that he was about to pass; whether the wagon after leaving the track, turned back across the track in such close proximity with the car that the collision could not have been avoided; and, finally, whether the motorman threw off his current and reversed his car and applied his brakes and tried to stop it. Held, that answers favorable to defendant would have been inconsistent with a general verdict for plaintiff, and hence failure to submit them was error.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Street Railroads, Dec. Dig. § 119.*]

17. Street Railroads (§ 85*)—Operation of Cars—Right to Use Street.

Street cars and citizens traveling in vehicles drawn by horses or other animals both have a right to use the street, but neither has the exclusive right.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Street Railroads, Cent. Dig. §§ 193–195; Dec. Dig. § 85.*]

18. Street Railroads (§ 90*)—Operation of Cars — Collisions with Vehicles — Duty of Motorman.

A motorman is not bound to stop when he sees a man driving in a vehicle along the line ahead of the car, but may continue to run it in a proper manner till he discovers that the driver is unaware or heedless of his danger, when he must use all reasonable care to avoid a collision.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Street Railroads, Dec. Dig. § 90.*]

19. Street Railroads (§ 90*)—Operation of Cars — Collisions with Vehicles—Duty of Motorman.

Seeing one driving along the track ahead, a motorman may assume he will turn aside and out of the way, but cannot rest on the assumption till the car reaches a point where it will be impossible for him to control it, or give warning in time to prevent injury.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Street Railroads, Cent. Dig. §§ 190–192; Dec. Dig. § 90.*]

20. Street Railroads (§ 112*)—Action for Negligence — Collision with Vehicle — Burden of Proof.

Where a motorman's alleged negligence consists of an omission of duty unexpectedly arising, as in case of a vehicle suddenly driven on the track, plaintiff must show that the motorman had an opportunity to become conscious of facts giving rise to the duty, and reasonable opportunity to perform it, before the company can be held liable for negligence.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Street Railroads, Cent. Dig. §§ 227–228; Dec. Dig. § 112.*]

21. Appeal and Error (§ 995*)—Review—Weight of Evidence.

An appellate court will not pass on the weight of evidence to reach a conclusion that uncontradicted evidence establishes a defense.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 3907; Dec. Dig. § 995.*]

22. Trial (§ 260*)—Instructions—Request.

A party's instructions should not be refused, though the same legal propositions are practically covered by instructions given, but stated from the view point of his opponent, and lacking the directness of statement of his theory of the case shown in the instructions refused.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 651–659; Dec. Dig. § 260.*]

23. Negligence (§ 92*) — Imputed Negligence—Driver of Express Wagon.

Where a public expressman drove one along an indicated route to a fixed place, to which she directed him to go, she did not assume such control over him that his negligence could be imputed to her.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Negligence, Cent. Dig. §§ 142–146; Dec. Dig. § 92.*]

24. Street Railroads (§ 118*)—Collision with Car — Action for Death—Instructions—Contributory Negligence.

In an action for the death of a woman killed while riding with an expressman in a collision with a car which overtook them from the rear, defendant was entitled to an instruction that she was required to use ordinary care for her own safety under the circumstances, but not that she must necessarily look or listen, or direct or attempt to control the driver, after having selected one whom she had a right to assume would be competent and prudent, and whom she had not found to be otherwise.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Walter Bordwell, Judge.

Action by Savoro Fujise and another, by guardian ad litem and another, against the Los Angeles Railway Company. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendant appeals. Reversed.

Gibson, Trask, Dunn & Crutcher, for appellant. Ernest E. Wood, for respondents.

TAGGART, J. Action brought by heirs of a deceased person to recover damages for her death alleged to have been caused by the negligence of defendant's employés in operating one of its street cars. Judgment was for plaintiffs for $2,000, and defendant appeals from the judgment and an order denying its motion for a new trial.

Plaintiffs are the husband and children, respectively, of Hideno Fujise, who, while riding in an express wagon on Central avenue in the city of Los Angeles, was thrown from the wagon by a collision between it and one of the defendant's street cars, which was operated upon a track along said street or avenue. The car approached and overtook the wagon from the rear. At the point where the collision occurred market wagons were ranged along either side of the street, engaged in loading with produce, and for this purpose were backed against the curb so that the heads of the horses extended out into the street, and the teams and wagons together occupied a large portion of the roadway between the curb and defendant's double tracks along the middle of the street.

The errors upon which appellant relies for a reversal of the judgment are: That the court erred in refusing to enter up judgment in its favor on the special verdict because it appeared therefrom that the decedent was guilty of contributory negligence, in refusing to submit to the jury certain special interrogatories requested by the defendant, and in giving and refusing to give certain instructions. It is also contended that the evidence fails to show negligence upon defendant's part, and does show contributory negligence upon the part of the decedent and the driver of the express wagon. Plaintiffs' cause of action rests upon the view that at all times after the motorman sounded his gong and the driver of the wagon discovered that he was in the way of the car it was impossible for him to turn out at the right side, and that, as soon as he found he would not be able to reach a place at which he could do this before the car overtook him, he attempted to turn off to the left and the wagon was struck. The driver, S. Igarashi, testified as follows: "I am in the express business for everybody who hires me. On the 8th day of August, 1907, I was taking Mrs. Fujise and her children to the train. I was driving a single wagon of ordinary size. * * * I was driving towards the south on the south side, on the right-hand side. The car came from behind in the rear. When I first saw the car, it was about 150 feet in the rear. I tried to turn on the right-hand side, but found so many wagons that I could not do that, and I turned on the left. The car hit the wagon pretty hard. It hit the rear of the wagon. When the car struck the wagon the position of Mrs. Fujise was turned, you know, turned like this (indicating), and then on that moment she was knocked down on the ground. She afterwards died. * * * When the car struck the wagon, Mrs. Fujise was sitting on the left and that boy (her little boy) was sitting on the right." On cross-examination he testified that the wheel which was struck was the one at the left side of the wagon in the rear, and that he heard the bell and looked back and saw the car. It was running pretty fast. The testimony of the other witnesses for plaintiffs sustained that of the driver of the wagon in substantially every particular.

The motorman's testimony discloses the defendant's theory of the accident. He said: "My car was going south on Central avenue. I saw this wagon driving ahead of me. It was on my track. The car would have hit it, if it had overtaken it. When I first noticed it, * * * the wagon was quite a ways up. I came up close to the wagon. When I got to what I thought a proper distance, I began sounding my gong, sounded it quite often, and threw off the power. I slowed my car down. * * * I rang my gong and applied my brakes. * * * The wagon pulled off to the right. I judged that it was clear of the track. There were a few wagons there on that side, not many. When he pulled off, I fed up again, expecting to go by, expecting him to give me the right of way. If he had stayed where he was, I would certainly have gone by, I am sure of that. When he pulled off down quite a ways, he came up to where there was another team backed up against the curb. I supposed he was going to give me the right of way, but he pulled his horse in a diagonal angle across my track. * * * When I saw him pull his horse's head toward the track, I throwed off again. * * * When he turned off (the first time), I fed up to five points (half speed). * * * I never had it at more than five points along there. When I saw him turn (to the left), I throwed off the power and put on the air. There was nothing else I could have done to stop. * * * I did everything I could as soon as I saw him turn. My car ran about three feet ahead after it hit the wagon. I then backed up. It did not do any damage to the wagon. Right-hand ride of fender hit the left hind wheel, between the felloe and the hub." As the testimony of the driver of the express wagon was corroborated by a number of witnesses who were standing near the scene on the ground, so that of the motorman was corroborated by quite a number of persons who were on the car, by all the passengers who testified at the trial, and it must be conceded that if their testimony had been believed by the jury, they would have found that the wagon was safe and clear from interfering with the car while on the right-hand side of the track, and that the motorman exercised due care in the management of his car when the wagon was turned suddenly across the track.

Defendant requested the trial judge to submit to the jury 27 special issues or questions, numbered consecutively from 1 to 21 and 2a, 14a, 14b, 14c, 14d, and 14e. The request was granted as to Nos. 1, 12, 13, 14, 14b, and 14d, and denied as to the others. The failure to give all of these was excepted to by appellant, who also contends that the answers given to questions 14 and 14b which were submitted entitle it to judgment on the verdict. These two questions were addressed to matters relating to the issue of contributory negligence on the part of the deceased.

In order that contributory negligence shall prevent the recovery of damages for a personal injury, it must appear that the negligence is that of the injured person or of some one over whom he exercised some control.

The foundation of the doctrine is said to rest in the civil law maxim: "The harm I bring upon myself I must bear myself." 1 Beven, Negligence in Law, p. 149. The reason for the rule which so relieves the defendant from the payment of damages for his negligence where the plaintiff has contributed to the injury by his own negligence, as it is applied in this state, is based upon an argument of convenience, to wit, the impossibility of successfully apportioning the damages between the parties, and not for the reason that the law relieves the defendant from responsibility merely because the injured party has contributed to the result by his own negligence or wrongful act. Needham v. San Francisco, 37 Cal. 409, 419. It is only the contributory fault of the injured party, or of some one whose fault is imputable to him, that can excuse the defendant. 1 Shearman & Redfield on the Law of Negligence (5th Ed.) § 65. In the jurisdictions in which this view of imputed contributory negligence has been adopted, it is held that the rule has no application to a passenger in a public conveyance, or to a person riding by invitation in a private conveyance, and that such passenger or person is not chargeable with the negligence of the driver of the conveyance in either case. 1 Thompson on Negligence, §§ 500, 501, 502; Shearman & Redfield, supra, § 57; 7 Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law, p. 447. There is no distinction in principle whether the passenger be on a public conveyance like a railroad train, or on an omnibus, or be on a hack hired from a public stand in the street for a drive. Those on the hack do not become responsible for the negligence of the driver if they exercise no control over him further than to indicate the route they wish to travel, or the places to which they wish to go. Little v. Hackett, 116 U. S. 366, 379, 6 Sup. Ct. 391, 29 L. Ed. 652. On the other hand, the rule does not absolve the passenger or guest from the duty of using ordinary care for his own safety. 1 Thompson on Negligence, § 503; Beach on Contributory Negligence (3d Ed.) § 115. No one can be allowed to shut his eyes to danger in blind reliance upon the unaided care of another, without assuming the consequences of the omission of such care. Shearman & Redfield on Negligence, § 66a. Whether the injured person has been guilty of contributory negligence in a case of this kind is, as in other cases, one chiefly of fact, and whether or not he used ordinary care must be determined by the jury from the circumstances of each particular case. Of course, the acts to be done in the exercise of ordinary care in cases of this character are such as are peculiar to, and which may arise only in connection with, such cases, but the rule as to ordinary care is not changed or different on this account. Bresee v. Los Angeles Traction Co., 149 Cal. 131, 136, 85 Pac. 152, 5 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1059.

It cannot be said in this case as a matter of law that the failure of the deceased to look to ascertain the position of the car "before turning across the track," as found in answer to special interrogatory No. 14, was contributory negligence. As said by the Washington court in the case of Wilson v. Puget Sound Co., 52 Wash. 522, 101 Pac. 53, in relation to the driver of an automobile: "The deceased had a right to assume that the driver was competent, that he knew the capacity of his machine, and that he would not put it in a perilous position." The deceased must be presumed from her residence in Oxnard to have been less familiar with the congested condition of the business streets of Los Angeles, and of the effect thereof, than a public express driver, and in the absence of some unusual peril, apparent to her and not to him, or to which they were equal strangers, it will be presumed that she pursued the safer plan in letting the driver take care of his own horse. It may be stated as a truism that ordinarily two persons cannot drive or control the same horse, team, or vehicle at the same time. The finding that Hideno Fujise failed to look was not inconsistent with the implied finding of the general verdict that it was not necessary for her to look in exercising ordinary care for her own safety amid the surroundings in which she was placed. The finding in answer to special interrogatory No. 14b, "Prior to the collision between the said wagon and the said car, did the said Hideno Fujise exercise any care or caution whatever to ascertain the approach of said car or to avoid the collision?" to wit, "No, no evidence submitted," may be measured by the same rule; that is, that by the implied finding in the general verdict neither care nor caution was required to be exercised by her prior to the time the wagon was struck by the car. In other words, it may be said that the general verdict implied a counter finding that under the circumstances of the case she was not required to exercise any affirmative acts of caution prior to the collision; her negative reliance upon the driver being all that was necessary to constitute ordinary care. However, in construing this finding, we must consider the entire answer, which was, in effect "that there was no evidence of any acts upon her part tending to establish either care or want of care." The burden of showing contributory negligence rested upon the defendant, and a finding that there was an absence of evidence upon this issue cannot be regarded as inconsistent with a general verdict in favor of the plaintiff.

We do not regard the analogy between a request for instructions and a request for the submission of special interrogatories so close as to justify the application to the latter of a rule of practice adopted in connection with the former. Neither does the reason underlying the general rule of practice relating to the time for presenting instructions appear to us to apply with the same force to the matter of requesting special issues to be submitted. While we agree with respondents' position that this is a matter resting largely in the discretion of the trial judge where there is neither rule of practice nor statute relating to it, we are not prepared to say that under the circumstances of this case the trial judge was justified in refusing to submit these issues solely upon the ground that the request for submission was not made in time. It has been held that in the matter of presenting instructions for the jury where there is no rule in regard to the matter a party would have a right to submit his instructions at any time before the jury leaves the box. People v. Williams, 32 Cal. 280, 286. And even rules applying to such matters should be framed and applied in the furtherance of justice and not strictly adhered to where such adherence would work the opposite result. Page 287.

The special findings which the parties were entitled to have made by the jury under the provisions of section 625, Code Civ. Proc., as that section read and was interpreted when this case was tried, were not the special verdict of the common-law practice which must be sufficient to support a judgment, but their primary purpose was to determine whether the general verdict was or was not against law. Larsen v. Leonardt, 8 Cal. App. 226, 228, 96 Pac. 395. They were addressed to matters relevant to the essential issues impliedly found by the jury in reaching a general verdict, and were subject to two conditions: "(1) Is the question so framed as to admit of a plain and direct answer? (2) Would an answer favorable to the party preferring the request be inconsistent with a general verdict for his adversary?" Plyler v. Pac. Cem. Co., 152 Cal. 125, 134, 92 Pac. 56, 60.
